By the Grace of God, of England, France and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, Go.

Nder hope of your Highness Gracious and accustomed Fayour. I have prefumed to prefent here unto your Majesty, Plutarchs Lives Translated, as a Book fit to be protected by your Highness and meet to be let forth in English. For who is fitter to give countenance to so many great States, then fuch an High and Mighty Princels ?- who is fitter to revive the dead memory of their Fame then the that beareth the lively image of their Vertues? who is fitter to Authorize a work of fo great Learning and Wildom , then the whom all do honour as the Muse of the world? Therefore I humbly befeech your Majefty to fuffer the simpleness of my Translarion, to be covered under the ampleness of your Highness protection. For, Most Gracious Soveraign, though this Book be no Book for your Majesties self , who are meeter to be the chief Story , then a Student therein, and can better understand it in Greek; then any man can make it English: yet I hope the common fort of your Subjects shall not only profit themselves hereby, but also be animated to the better service of your Majesty. For among all the prophane Books that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your Highness best knows) that teacheth so much Honour, Love, Obedience, Reverence, Zeal , and Devotion to Princes , as these Lives of Plurareh do. How many examples shall your Subjects read here, of several persons and whole Armies, of Noble and Base, of Young and Old, that both by Sea and Land, at home and abroad, have strained their wits, not regarding their states, ventured their persons, yea cast away their Lives, not onely for honour and fafety, but also for the pleasure of their Prince ?

Then well may the Readers think, if they have done this for Heathen Kings, what should we do for Christian Princes? If they have done this for Glory, what should we do for Religion? If they have done this

To the Reader.

HE profit of Startes, and the praifs of the Anthor, are sufficiently declared by Minor, in the Spisser Reader; is thus I finds not med to make many words thereof. And industry the medit of the Market was the profit and industry from the medit of the Market with your own difference and industry from the medit of the Market. All other learning to private, good and engineering, good suberflowing, good subsets them Elearch. All other learning to private, the start for Twiverfries then Cites, faller of continustation then experience, more continuable with Students then start is the more continuable with the starting all other Books, exhibit the fall of the starting all other Books, as is in heter you see that we would be supposed to the Anthor. I mill not damp has love may decive me, for I must need seve him with whom I have the Anthority in the supposed of the Market. For all there were fain to take their matter, at the fortune of the Gonneries where of they wrete. For all the man being excellent in wis, learning, and expresence, hash chosen By Grain starts. The assumer were jam to large surre master, as now primes y to committee of they wrote, fell site. But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, bath chosen has freight. Afts of the best profest, of the famous of Raisons of the world. But I will leave the judgicularity of his fellow. My onely purpose is to define you to excuse the faults of my translation, which was greatlents, and with the opinion of my diligence and good interes. And so I wish you all the sound in the sound with the opinion of my diligence and good interes. And so I wish you all the profit of the Book, Fare ye well.

HE reading of books which bring but a vain and unprofiable pleasure to the Reader, is justly misliked of wife and grave men. Again, the reading of such as do but onely bring profit, and make the Reader to be in love therewith, and do not ease the pain of the reading by some pleasanness in the same to do seem somewhat barth to divers delicate wits, that cannot tarry long upon them. But such Books as yeeld pleasure and profit, and do both delight and teath, have all that, a man can define why they should be universally liked and allowed for all sorts of men, according to the common faying of the Poet Horace:

That is which matcheth profit with delight;

Dath with britisk in every suits arisely.

have all that a man can deture way they insula be universally liked and allowed of all forts of men, according to the common faying of the Poet Horzee:

That is which mackets profit with delight;

Deth wis the prize is every point aright.

Either of the delight, and delighting the more becaule of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of flories; to have pleafure and profit matched together, which kind of delight, and teaching, meeting in this wile/Arm in Arm, ball more allowance with on writing or integring on the profit in the profit matched together, which kind of delight, and teaching, meeting in this wile/Arm in Arm, ball more allowance with one writing or integring on the man of Hilboriographers, then they are to any other kind of writers i because an Hilbory is an orderly Register of protable phers, then they are to a sy other kind of writers i because an Hilbory is an orderly Register of protable phers, then they are to appeted in times past, to maintain the continual remembrance of them, and to leave for the other two parts should be unperfect, and well near unprofitable: so may it also be fail; that an Hilbory is the very treatury of mans like whereby the notable doings and shyings of men and the wonderful, askeyouture and strange case ("which the long continuance of time bringseth forth") are preferred from the death of soggethiness. Hereupon it rites that Plate the wile faith, that the name of History was goon to the crooting of maners, so shay the second go four memory, which otherwise would be soon lost, and retain little. And we may well perceive thow greatly we be beholding unto it, if we do no more but consider in how boards, and have happened be plunged, if the remembrance of all things that have been done, and have happened before we meet board, we may be soon to so the sound of the plunged, if the remembrance of things past to their fuee the sound of th fome notable qualities, representing unto us the manners of strange Nations, the laws and customs of old time, the particular affairs of men, their confultations and enterprifes, the means that they have used to compais them withal, and their demeaning of themselves when they were come to the highest, or thrown down to the lowest degree of state. So asit is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or war, in publick or private affairs, but that the person which shall have diligently read, well conceived, and throughly remembred Hiftories, shall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counsel whereby to refolve himfelf to take a part, or give advice unto others, how to choose in doubtful and dangerous cafes that which may be for the most profit, and in time to find out to what point the matter will come, if it be well handled : and how to moderate himfelf in prosperity , and how to chear up and bear himself in adversity. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacy, and speed, then the Books of Moral Philosophy do : foramuch as examples are of more force to move , and instruct, then are the arguments and proofs of reason, or their precise precepts, because examples be the very forms of our deeds, and accompanied with all circumstances. Whereas reasons and demonstrations are general and tend to the proof of things, and to the beating of them into understanding and examples tend to shewing of them in practile and execution, because they do not onely declare what is to be done, but also work a oesire to do it, as well in respect of a certain natural inclination which all men have to sol-low examples, as allo for the beauty of Vertue, which is of fuch power, that wherefoever the is feen the maketh her felf to beloved a 'd liked'. Again, it doth things with greater weight and gravity, then the inventions and devices of the Poets: because it helpeth not it self with any other thing then with the inventions and devices of the Poets: Decame it respects not it feet with any other tuning then with the plain truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly enrich things by commending them above the Stars and their deferving because the chief intent thereof is to delight. Moreover, it doth things with more grace and modefly then the Civil Laws and Ordinances do: because it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, then to chastife or punish. And yet for all this, an History allo hash his manner of punishing the wicked, by the reproach of everlafting infamy, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance; which is a great mean to withdraw them from vice, who otherwife would be leadly and wickedly dispoted. Like-a great mean to window the immortal praise and glory wherewith it rewardeth well-doers, is a very lively and tharp four for men of noble courage and gentleman-like nature, to cause them to adventure upon all manner of noble and great things. For books are full of examples of men of high courage and wildom, who for defire to continue the remembrance of their name by the fure and certain record of Histories, have willingly yeelded their lives to the service of the Common weal, frent their goods, full-tained infinite pains both of body and mind in defence of the oppreffed, in making common buildings, in flabiliting of Laws and Governments, and in the finding out of. Arts and Sciences necessary for the maintenance and ornament of mans life; for the faithful registering whereof, the thank is due to Histories. And although true Vertue feek no reward of her commendable doing like a hireling, but con-tenteth her felf with the confcience of her Well-doing : yet not withftanding I am of opinion , that it is good and meet to draw men by all means to good doing; and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their vertuous deeds, feeing that honour doth naturally accompany vertue, as the shadow doth the body. For we commonly see, that not to feel the sparks of defire of honour, is an infallible fign of a bale, vile, and clownilli nature: and that fuch as count it an unnecessary, needles, or unfeemly thing to be praifed, are likewife no doers of any things worthy of praife, but are commonly men of faint courage, whose thoughts extend no further then to their lives, whereof also they have no further remembrance, then is before their eyes. But if the counfel of old men be to be greatly efteemed, because they must needs have seen much by reason of their long life : and if they that have travelled long in strange Countries, and have had the managing of many affairs, and have gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for Sage, and worthy to have the reins of great Governments out into their hands: how greatly is the reading of Hiltories to be effected, which is able to furnish put into their hands:

us with more examples in one day, then the whole courfe of the longest life of any man is able to do?

Infomuch that they which exercise themselves in reading as they ought to do, although they be but young, become such in respect of understanding of the affairs of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they never have removed out of their houses, yet are they advertised, informed, and satisfied of all things in the world; as well as they that have shortned their lives by innumerable travels and infinite dangers, in running over the whole earth that is inhabited: whereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done and came to pass before they were born, continue fill as children, though they be never fo aged, and are but as ftrangers in their own native Countries. To be short, it may be truely said, that the reading of Histories is the School of Wildom, to fashion mens understanding, by considering advisedly the state of the world that is paft, and by marking diligently by what laws, Manners, and Diffipline, Empires, Kingdoms, and Dominions, have in old time been stablished, and afterward maintained and increased: or contrariwise changed, diminished, and overthrown. Also weread, that when soever the right Sage and Vertuous Emperor of Rome, Alexander Severus, was to consult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned Wars, or Government: he always called fuch to counfel, as were reported to be well feen in Histories. Notwithstanding I know there are that will stand against me in this point, and uphold, that the reading of Hiftories can serve to small purpose, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: because skill consisteth in action, and is gendred by the very experience and practife of things that he hath feen with his eyes, and found true by proof, according to the faying of the Ancient Poet

Afranius :

To the Readers.

My name is Skill, my Syre experience hight, And Memory bred and brought me forth to light.

Which thing was meant likewife by the Philosopher that faid, that the hand is the inftrument of skill. By reason whereof it cometh to pass (fay they) that such as speak of matters of Government and state, but specially of matters of war by the book, speak but as book Knights, as the French Proverb termeth them, after the manner of the Grecians, who call him a book Pilot, which hath not the fure and certain knowledge of the things that he speaks of : meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the understanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that consist in the deed doing, where the hand is to be fet to the work: no more then the often hearing of men talk and reason of painting, or the disputing upon colours, without taking of the penfil in hand, can ftand a man in any ftead at all to make him a good Painter. But on the contrary part, many have proved wife men and good Captains, which could neither write nor read. Besides this, they alledge further, that in matters of war, all things after from year to year, by means whereof the fleights and policies that are to be learned out of books, will ferve the turn no more then Mines that are blown up. According whereunto Cambyfes telleth his fon fyrm in Xenophon, that like as in Musick the newest songs are commonly the best liked of for once, because they were never heard of afore : So in the wars, those policies that never were practised afore, are those that take best success, and commonly have the best effect, because the enemies do least doubt of them. Nevertheless I am not he that will maintain, that a wife Governour of a Common-weal, or a great Captain, can be made of fuch a person, as hath never travelled out of his study, and from his book : howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captain General and Lieutenant of the Romans, to make war against King Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the wars, and yet afterward he bestowed so great diligence in the reading of Histories, and in conferring upon every point with the old Captains and men of long experience whom he carried with him, that by the time of his coming into Afa, where he was indeed to put his matters in execution, he was found to be a very fufficient Captain, as appeared by his deeds: infomuch that by those ways, clean contrary to the common order of war, he discomstited two of the most puissant and greatest Princes that were at that time in the Eaf. For his understanding was so quick, his care so vigilant, and his courage so great, that he needed no long training, nor gross instruction by experience. And although 1 grant there have been divers Governours and Captains, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by long continued experience)have done goodly and great exploits : yet can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the gifts of nature with the knowledge of learning and the reading of histories, they might have done much greater things, and they might have become much more perfect. For like as in every other cunning and skill wherein a man intendeth to excell : fo alfo to become a perfect and fufficient perfon to Govern in peace and war, there are three things of necessity required, namely, Nature, Art, and Practice. Nature (in the case we treat of) must furnish us with a good mother-wit, with a body well disposed to endure all manner of travel, and with a good will to advance our felves: Art must give us judgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wife discourses that we have read and double read in good Hiftories : and Practice will get us readiness, affuredness, and the case how to put things in execution. For though Skill be the ruler of doing the deed, yet it is Vertue of the mind which teacheth a man the mean point between the two faulty extremities of too much and too little, wherein the commendation of all doings confifteth. And who oever he is that goeth about to attain to it by the onely tryal of experience, and had rather learn it at his own coft, then at another mans : he may well be of the number of those that are touched by this ancient Proverb, which faith, Experience is the School-miffrie of fools : because mans life is fo short, and experience is hard and dangerous; specially in matters of war, wherein (according to the faying of Tamacheu the Athenian Captain) a man cannot fault twice, because the faults are so great, that most commonly they bring with them the overthrow of the state, or loss of the lives of those that do them. Therefore we must not tarry for this wit that is won by experience, which cofteth fo dear, and is so long in coming, that a man is oft times dead in seeking of it before he have attained it, so as he had need of a second life to employ it in because of the overlate coming by it. But we must make speed by our diligent and continual reading of Histories both old and new, that we may enjoy this happinels which the Poet speaketh of :

> Ahappy wight is he that by mishaps Of others, doth he ware of ofterclaps.

By the way, as concerning those that fay that paper will bear all things: if there be any that unworthily take upon them the name of Historiographers, and do deface the dignity of the story for hatred or favor, mingling any untruth with it:that is not the fault of the History, but of the men that are partial, who do abuse that name unworthily, to cover and cloak their own passions withall, which thing shall never come to pals, if the writer of the ftory have the properties that are necessary required in a story-writer, as thefe : That he fet afide all affection, be void of envy hatred and flattery ; that he be a man experienced in the affairs of the world, of good utterance and judgement, to difcern what is to be faid, and what to be left unfaid; and what would do more harm to have it declared then do good to have it reproved or condemned : for a fruch as his chief drift ought to be to serve the Common-weal, and that it is but as a regifter to fet down the judgements and definitive fentences of Gods Court, whereof some are given actording to the ordinary course and capacity of our weak natural reason, and other some go according to Gods infinite Power and Incomprehensible Wisdom, above and against all discourse of mans understanding, who being unable to reach the bottom of his judgements, and to find out the first motions and grounds thereof, do impute the cause of them to a certain fortune, which is nought else but a fained device of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of fuch brightness, & confounded at the gazing of so bottomless a deep : howbeit, nothing cometh to pass nor is done without the leave of him that is the very right and truth it felf, with whom nothing is past or to come, who knoweth and understandeth the very original causes of all necessity. The consideration whereof teacheth men to humble themselves under his mighty hand, by acknowledging that there is one first cause which over-ruleth nature, whereof it cometh, that neither hardiness is always happy, nor wisdom always fure of good success. These so notable commodities are every were accompanied with fingular delight, which proceedeth chiefly of diverfity and novelty, wherein our nature delighteth, and is greatly defirous of : because we having an earnest inclination towards our best prosperity and advancement, it goeth on still, seeking in it every thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But forafmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content it felf under the cope of heaven, it is soon weary of the things that it had earnestly defired before, and so goeth on wandering in the unskilfulness of her likings, whereof the never ceaseth to make a continual changing untill the have fully fatisfied her defires, by attaining to the last end, which is, to be knit to her chief felicity, where is the full perfection of all goodliness and goodness. This liking of variety cannot be better relieved then by that which is the finder out and the preferver of time, the father of all novelty, and messenger of antiquity. For if we find a certain singular pleasure, in hearking to such as be returned from some long voyage, and do report things which they have seen in strange Countries, as the manners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of lives, differing from ours: and if we be sometime so a raylifed with delight and pleafure at the hearing of the talk of fome wife, difereet, and well-fpoken old man, from whose mouth there floweth a stream of speech sweeter then hony, in rehearing the adventures which he hath had in his green and youthful years, the pains that he hath endured, and the perils that he hath over-passed, so as we perceive not how the time goeth away : how much more ought we to be ravished with delight and wondring, to behold the state of mankind, and the true success of things, which antiquity hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world; as the fetting up of Empires, the autiquiy until and using the firing and falling of Kingdoms, and all things elfe worthy admiration, and the fame lively fet forth in the fair, rich, and tree table of Eloquence? And that fo lively, as in the very reading of them we fee our minds to be fo touched by them, not as though the things were already done and paft, but as though they were even then prefently in doing, and we find our felves carried away with gladness and grief through fear or hope, well near as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithstanding we be not in any pain or danger, but onely conceive in our minds the adversities that other folks have endured, our felves fitting fafe with our contentation and eafe, according to those verses of the Poet Lucretius ;

It is a pleasure for to sit at ease

Upon the Land, and sitely for to see How ether folks are tossied on the Seas,

That with the blushering winds turmoited be.

Not that the sight of others misseries

Doth any way the boness beats design:

But for because it like the Weed car yes.

To see barms free, that on one selects might light.

Also it is seen that the reading of Histories doth so hold and allure good wits, that divers times it not only maketh them to forget all other pleafures, but also serveth very fitly to turn away their griefs, and fometimes also to remedy their diseases. As for example, we find it written of Alphonius King of Naples, that Prince fo greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wildom and goodness, that being fore fick in the City of Capua, when his Phyficians had spent all the cunning that they had to recover him his health, and he saw that nothing prevailed: he determined with himself to take no more medicines, but for his recreation cauled the story of Quintus Curtim, concerning the deeds of Alexander the Great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he took to wonderful pleasure, that nature gathered strength by it, and overcame the waywardness of his difease. Whereupon, having soon recovered his health, he difcharged his Phylicians with fuch words as thefe: Feaft me no more with your Hippocrates and Galen, fith they can no skill to help me to recover my bealth but well fare Quintin Curtim that could fo good skill to help me to recover my health. Now if the reading and knowledge of Histories be delightful and profit able to all other kind of folk: I fay it is much more for great Princes and Kings, because they have to do with charges of greatest weight and difficulties, to be best stored with gifts and knowledge for the discharge of their duties : seeing the ground of stories is, to treat of all mainer of high matters of estate, as wars, battels, Cities, Countries, treaties of peace and alliances; and therefore it feemeth more fill for them, then for any other kind of degrees of men: because they being bred and brought up tenderly; and at their ease, by reason of the great regard and care that is had of their persons (as meet is for so great states to have they take not so great pains in their youth for the learning of things as behooveth those to take, which will learn the noble ancient languages, and the painful doctrine comprehended in Philotophy. Again , when they come to mans effate , their charge callett them to deal in great affairs , fo as there remaineth no exercise of wit more convenient for them, than the reading of Histories in their ownTongue. which without pain is able to teach them even with great plea are and case, whatsoever the painfull Works of the Philosophers concerning the Government of Common wealths, can shew them. to make them skilfull in the well Ruling and Governing of the People and Countries that God hath put under their subjection. But the worst is , that they ever (or for the most part) have such manner of persons about them, as seek nothing else but to please them by all the ways they can, and there are very few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: Whereas on the contrary part, an History flattereth them: ot, but layeth open before their eyes, the faults and vices of fuch as were like them in greatness of Degree. And therefore Denetring Phalering (a man renowned as well for his skill in the good Government of a Common-weal, as for his excellent Knowledge otherwise) counselled Ptolomy , first King of Egypt after the death of Alexander the Great, that he should often and diligently read the Books that treated of the Government of Kingdoms, because (faid he) thou shalt find many things there, which thy servants and familiar friends dare not tell thee: Moreover this is another thing, that fuch great Personages cannot easily travell out of the bounds of their Dominions, to go view strange Countries, as private persons do : because the jealousie of their Estate, and the regard of their Dignity, requires that they should never be in place where another man might command them. And oftentimes for want of having feen the Countries, and known the People and Princes that are their neighbours, they have adventured upon Attempts without good ground: To avoid the which, the instruction they may have by the reading of Histories, is one of the easiest and fittest remedies that can be found. And though there werenone other cause then onely this last, surely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of Histories, wherein are written the Heroicall Deeds of Wife and Valiant Men, specially of Kings that have been before them: the confideration whereof may cause them to be desirous to become like them, specially which were of Stately and Noble Courage: because the seeds of Princely Vertues that are bred with themselves, do then quicken them up with an emulation towards those that have been or are equall in Degree with them, as well in respect of Nobleness of Blood, as of Greatness of State, so as they be loth to give place to any person, and much less can find in their hearts to be out-gone in Glory of Vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alledged, if the thing were not so well known of it felf, that it were much more against reason to doubt of it, than needfull to prove it. Therefore a man may truely conclude, that an Hiftory is the School-Miffris of Princes, at whose hand they may without pain, in way of patime, and with fingular pleasure learn the most part of the things that belong to their Office. Now, according to the diversity of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and manner of writing that it uleth, it hath fundry names given unto it: but yet among the rest, there are two chief kinds. The one, which setteth down mens doings and adventures at length, is called by the common name of an History: The other, which declareth their natures, fayings and manners, is properly named their Lives. And although the ground of them both do close very near in one, yet doth the one respect more the Things, and the other the Persons: the one is more common, and the other more private: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceed from within: The one, the events; the other, the confultations: between the which there is oftentimes great odds, according to this answer of the Persian Siramnes, to such as marvelled how it came to pais, that his devices being fo politick, had fo unhappy fucces: It is (quoth he) because my devices are wholly from mine own invention, but the effects of them are in the disposition of Fortune and the King. And furely among those that ever have taken upon them to write the Lives of Famous men, the chief prerogative, by the judgement of such as are clearest fighted, is justly given to the Greek Philosopher Plutarch, born in the City of Charenes in the Country of Ba-otia, a Noble man, perfect in all rare Knowledge, as his Works may well put men out of doubt, if they lift to read them through, who all his life lorg, even to his old age, had to deal in affairs of the Common weal, as he himfelf witneffeth in divers places, fpecially in the Treatife which he intituled, Whether an old man ought to meddle with the Government of a Common-weal or not: and who had the hap and Honour to be Schoolmaster to the Emperour Trajan, as is commonly beleeved, and as is expresly pretended in a certain Epistle set before the Latine Translation of his matters of State, which (to fay the truth) feemeth in my judgement to be fomewhat fulpicious, because I find it not among his Works in Greek: besides that it speaketh as though the Book were dedicated to Trajan, which thing is manifeltly disproved by the beginning of the Book, and by divers other reasons. Yet notwithstanding, because methinks it is sagely and gravely written, and well-beseeming him, I have set it down here in this place : Plutarch unto Trajan fendeth greeting: "I know well, that the modefty of your nature was not defirous of Soveraignty, "though you have always endeavoured to deferve it by your Honourable conversation; by reason whereof you have been thought fo much the worthier of it, as you have been found the further off "from all ambition. And therefore I do now rejoyce in your vertue and my Fortune, if it be fo " great as to cause you to administer that thing with Justice, which you have obtained by Defert. "For otherwise, I am sure you have put your self in hazard of great danger, and me in perill of "flanderous tongues, because that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common "voice of the people is always wont to cast the faults of the scholars in the teeth of their School-"mafters: As for example, Seneca is railed upon by flanderous tongues, for the faults of his scho-" lar Nero: The scapes of Quintilians young scholars, are imputed to Quintilian himself: and

's Socrates is blamed for being too mild to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you shall do "all things well enough, so you keep you as you are. If you first fet your self in order, and then difpole all other things according to Vertue, all things shall fall out according to your defire.

I have set you down the means in writing, which you must observe for the well governing of your "Common-weal, and have shewed unto you of how great force your behaviour may be in that "behalf. If you think good to follow those things, you have Plutarch for the director and guider " of your life: if not, I protest unto you by this Epistle, that your falling into danger, to the over-"throw of the Empire, is not by the Doctrine of Plutarch. This Epiftle wineffeth plainly, that he was the Schoolmafter of Trajan, which thing feemeth to be avowed by this writing of Suidas: Plutareh being born in the City of Charonea in Baotia, was in the time of the Emperour Trajan, and somewhat before. But Trajan honoured him with the Dignity of Consulship, and commanded the Officers and Magistrates that were throughout all the Countrey of Illyria, that they should not do anything without his Counsell and Authority. So doth Saidas write of him, And I am of opinion, that Trajan being so wise an Emperour, would never have done him so great Honour, if he had not thought himself greatly beholden to him for some speciall cause. But the thing that maketh me most to believe it true, is, that the same goodness and justice appeared to be naturally imprimed in most of $T_{r,ijan}$ (ayings and doings, whereof the pattern and mould (as a man may term it) is cast and set down in Platarchs Morals, so as men may perceive expresly, that the one could well skill to perform rightly, that which the other had taught wifely : For Dion writeth, that among other Honours which the Senate of Rome gave by Decree unto Trajan, they gave him the title of the Good Emperour. And Emropins reporteth, that even unto this time, when a new Emperour came to be received of the Senare, among the cries of good handfell, and the withes of good luck that were made unto him, one was; Happier be thou than Augustus, and better then Trajan. Howsoever the case stood, it is very certain that Plutarch Dedicated the collection of his Aposhtheemes unto him. But when he had lived a long time in Rome, and was come home again to his own house, he fell to writing of this excellent Work of Lives, which he called Parallelon, as much to fay, as a coupling or matching together, because he matcheth a Grecian with a Reman, setting down their Lives each after other, and Comparing them together, as he found any likeness of Nature, Conditions, or Adventures betwirt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worfer, greater or leffer than the other: which things he doth with so goodly and grave Discourse every where, taken out of the deepest and most hidden lecrets of morall and naturall Philosophy, with fo fage Precepts and fruitfull Instructions, with fo effectuall commendation of vertue, and detestation of vice, with fo many goodly allegations of other Authors, with fo many fit comparisons, and with fo many high inventions; that the Book may better be called by the Name of the Treasury of all rare and perfect Learning, than by any another name. Also it is said, that Theodorus Gaza, a Grecian of singular Learning, and a Worthy of the ancient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which faw him to earnestly given to his study that he forgot all other things) What Author he had leverest choose, if he were at that point that he must needs choose some one to hold him to alone, did answer, that he would choose Plutarch, because that if they were all put together, there was no one both fo profitable, and fo pleafant to read, as he. Soffins Senecio to whom he Dedicateth his Work, was a Senator of Rome, as witneffeth Dion, who writeth that the three persons whom Trajan most loved and honoured, were Soffim, Parma, and Celfus, infomuch that he caused Images of them to be fet up. Trust is that he wrote the Lives of many other men, which the spitefulnels of the time hath bereft us of, among which he himself maketh mention of the Lives of Seipo Africanus, and Metel-Ins Numidicus. And I have read a little Epiftle of a fon of his, whose name is not expressed, copied out of an old copy in the Library of St Mark in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, a Register of all the Books that his Father made: and there among the couples of Lives, he setteth down the Lives of Scipio and Epaminondas, and lastly, the Lives of Augustus Cafar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Niro, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But having used all the diligence that I could in fearching the chief Libraries of Venice and Rome, I could never find them our. Onely I drew our certain diversities of readings, and many corrections, by conferring the old written Copies with the printed books: which have stood me in great stead to the understanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I have restored by conjecture, by the judgement and help of fuch men of this age, as are of greatest knowledge in Humane Learning. Yet for all this, there remain some places unamended, howbeit very few, because some lines were wanting in the Originall Copies, whereof (to my feeming) it was better for me to witness the want by marking it with some star, than to guess at it with all adventure, or to add any thing to it. Now finally, If I have overshot my self in any thing, as it is very easie to do in so hard and long a Work, specially to a man of lo small ability as I am: I beseech the Readers to vouchfase for my discharge, to admit the excuse which the Poet Horace giveth me, where he faith :

> A man may well be overfeen In Work: that long and tedious been.

Specially fith that of fo many good men men, and of skill, as have heretofore fet hand to the translating of it, there was never yet any one found that went through with it in any Language, at least-wife that I have feen or heard of: and that such as have enterprised to translate it, specially into

Latine, have evidently witneffed the hardnefs thereof, as they may enfily perceive which lift to confer their Translations with mine. Nevertheless if it so fortune that men find not the speech of this Translation so flowing, as they have found some other of mine, that are abroad in mens hands; the steech the Readersto consider, that the office of a fit Translator consistent not onely in the faithfull expersing of his Authours meaning, but also in a certain refembling, and shadowing out of the form of his style, and the manner of his speaking: unless they will commit the errour of some Painform of his style, and the manner of his speaking: unless they will commit the errour of some Painform of his style is and gross where he should be short; and gross where he should be seed to get a style of the styl

THESEUS.

Ant. Christ.

IKE as the Historiographers which do fet forth the Defcription of the Earth in Figure (my Friend Soffius Senecie) are wont to place in the lowermost part soffius Senecie of the Maps, the far distant Regions unknown unso, them, and to mark in the a Senator of Margen fuch like Norse and Reasions as these: Beyond these Countries are nothing but deep dry sands without water, full of foul ill favoured wenemous beafts, or much mud unnavigable, or Seventa forfaken for cold, or else the Sea frozen with Ice: Even so in this my History, I could speak of strange things, and more ancient, and further off from mean memory. But herein I have compared the Lives of some Noble men, the one with the other, having sollowed all those times, whereof the Monatorius contributes the whole there me may solve for even great liveshood, or rather write at the solution of the so the Lives of some Noblemen, the one with the other, having followed all those times, whereof the Monuments remain yet so whole, that was may speak of very great likelihood, or rather write a very troth. What hath been written before, is but of strange saynings, and full of monstrous fables, imagined and devised by Poets, which are altogether uncertain, and most ontrue. However, the theoretic office set forth the Lives of Lyenigus (which established the Laws of the Lacademonians), and of King Numa Pompilius, methought I might with reason also ascend unto the time of Romalus, sithence I was come to near unto his time. Wherefore having long debated with my self what exceptions the Poets said:

Elbilus the Poets said:

What

What Champion may with such a man compare? Or who (think 1) Shall be against him fet ? Who is fo bold? or who is he that dare

Who is jo boint or who is never after the Defend his force in Judo sprounter met?

In the end I refolved to compare him which did fer up the noble and famous City of Athens, unto him which founded the glorious and invincible City of Rosse, Wherein I would have wished that the Fables of her Antiquity had been fet out fo in our writings, that we might yet bave graced then with fome appearance of Hifforical narration. But if by chance in fome places they range a little too boldly out of the bounds or limits of true appearance, and have no manner of conformity with any credibleness of matter: the Readers incourtefie must needs hold me excused, accepting in good part that which may be written and reported of things fo extreamly old and ancient, Now furely methinks, that Taylors in many things was much like unto Romalist. For being both begotten by flealth and out of lawful Matrimony, they were both bruited to be both of the fred of gods. Both valiant were, as all the word doth know, Bothwere very wife and ftrong befides of body. The one of them built Rows, and the other the City of ATRENS, two of the most noble Cities of the world. The one and the other were ravishers of women, and neither the one nor the other could avoid the mischief of quarrel and contention with their friends, and to defile themselves with the bloud of their nearest kinfmen. Moreover, they fay that both the one and the other in the end did get the hate and ill-will of their Cuizens. At the least if we believe those things which are left written, and carry greatest shew of troth,

The lineage of The few of his Fathers side was descended of the right lineage of Exclusivess the great, and of the first Inhabitants which occupied the Countrey of ATTICA, the which fince were called AUTOCTHONES, as much to fay, as born of themselves. For there is no memory or other mention made, that they Pelept King of came out of any another Countrey then that. And of his Mothers fide he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightieft. King of all the Countrey of Prior onnesses, not to much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his Daughters which were many in number, he bettowed them on the greatest Lords of all the Countrey; his Sons also which likewife were oct, he bettowed them on the greatest zones of an ine country; and one and which internet were many, he dispersed into every City and Free-Town, finding means to make them Governous and Heads of the same. Pithem Grandsather to These on the Mothers side, was one that sounded the little City of TRORERN, and was reputed to be one of the best learned and wifest men of his time. Bus the knowledge and wildome, which only carried estimation at that time, confisted altogether in grave fentences and moral fayings; as those are which wan the Poet Hestodus such fame for his Book entituled. The works and daies, in the which is read even at this prefent this goodly fentence, which they father upon Pitheis: Thou shalt perform thy promise and thy pay

To hired men, and that without delay. And this doth Ariftorle the Philosopher himself testifie : and the Poet Euripides also, calling Hyppolitim the Scholler of the holy Pitheur, doth fufficiently declare of what estimation he was: But Agem desiring (as they say) to know how he might have children, went into the City of DELPROS to the Oracle of Apollo: where by a Nun of the Temple, this notable Prophecy was given him for an anfwer: the which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, untill he was returned again to ATMENS. And because the words of this Prophecy were somewhat dark and hard, he returned by the City Tao-BEEN, to tell it unto Pitheus. The words of the Prophecy were thefe:

O thou which art a gem of perfelt grace, Pluck not the tap out of thy trusty tun, Before thou do return unto thy place In Athens Tower from whence thy race doth run. Pithem understanding the meaning, perswaded him, or rather cunningly by some device deceived him.

in fuch fort, that he made him to lie with his Daughter called Libra . Agem, after he had accompanied with her, knowing that file was Pithem Daughter with whom he had lien, and doubting that he had gotten her with child, left her a Sword and a pair of Shoes, the which he hid under a great bollow oftone, the hollownets whereof ferved just to receive those things which he layed under it, and made no living creature privy to it but her alone; fraightly charging her, that if fhe happened to have a 2010, when he were come to mans eftate, and of ftrength to remove the ftone, and to take those things from under it which he left there; that the thould then fend him unto him by those Tokens, as fecretly as the could, that no body elfe might know of it: for he did greatly fear the Children of one called Pallar, the which lay in wait and spiall by all the means they could to kill him, onely of despite because he had no children, they being fitty brethren, and all begotten of one Father. This done, he departed from her: y Sons. Children, they being may breunen, and an organism of soudily Son, the which from that time was Why Thefau And Adhra within few moneths after was delivered of a goodly Son, the which from that time was Why Thefau And Adhra within few moneths after was delivered of a foodly Sons of knowledge his Father had laved unwas fo called. called The fews: and as forme fay, fo called, because of the Tokens of knowledge his Father had layed under the stone. Yet some others write, that it was alterwards at ATHENS when his Father knew him, and avowed him for his Son. But in the mean time, during his infancy and childhood, he was brought Connider The- up in the house of his Grandfather Pibeus, under the government and teaching of one called Connider, his School-mafter : in honour of whom the ATHENIANS to this day do facrifice a Weather, the day before the great Feaft of Thefeur, having more reason to honour the memory of this Governour, then of a Silanian and of a Parringias, to whom they do honour also, because they painted and cast moulds of the Images of Thefens. Now there was a custome at that time in Gasaca, that the young men after their infancy and growth to mans state, went into the City of DELPHOS, to offer part of after their minancy and good Apollo. Thefew also went thither as others did : and some say that the A custom to their nairs in the Temple of Appendance and the Mental and the state of the Mental and the Action to place where the ceremony of this Offering was made, hathever fince kept the old name (and yet con-offer hairs at place where the certain of the did not flave his head but before onely, as Homer faith, like the fashion Delphor tinuth) The feid. Howbert ne and not mave instruction to the Abantes in old time: and this manner of thaving of hairs, was called for his fake, The feidan The feidmanner of the Abantes, in troth they were the very first that shared themselves after this of sharing. Annua Concerning the they learned it not of the Arabians, as it was thought of fome; neither did The Abases. they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS; but because they were warlike and valiant men, which did joyn neer unto their enemy in battell, and above all men of the world were skilfulleft in fight hand to hand, and would keep their ground : as the Poet Architechus witnesseth in these verses ;

They use no flings in foughten fields to have, Nor bended bows : but [words and trenchant blades. For when fierce Mars beginneth for to rave In bloudy field, then every man invades His fiercest for, and fighteth hand to hand: Then do they deeds, right cruell to recempt. For in this wife, the brave and warlike band Do flew their force, which come from Negropont.

The cause why they were thus shaven before, was, for that their enemies should not have the vantage. The cause of The caule why they were trust in a trust of the head while they were fighting. And for this felf-fame confideration, thairs before. to take them by the him before.

Alexander Mac Describer Mabeards: because it is the easiest hold (and readiest for the hand) a man can have of his enemy in fightgames made the ings to hold him fast by the same. But to return to The sem. Æthra his Mother had ever unto that Macconizat mg, to note into the control of the time kept it fecret from min, who was instituted and the range and man great it out across that beards, he was begotten of Neptume, because the TROEZENIANS have this god in great veneration, and do These said to worthip him as patron and protector of their City, making Offerings to him of their first fruits and be Neptunet they have for the mark and framp of their Money, the three picked Mace, which is the fign of Neptune, Son. they have not the main amount of the prime and luftiness of his youth, and that with the Trazentcalled his Trident. But, after he was come to the prime and numers or ms yourn, and that with the six Coine fitringth of his body he shewed a great courage, joyned with a naturall wisdom and stayedness of the strength of his body he shewed a great courage, joyned with a naturall wisdom and stayedness of the strength of his body he shewed he stayed his stayed his stayed his stayed his stayed he truly the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his Fathers tokens of birked mace. truly the order of his birth, and by whoming was regorder, made introduced in Fathers which he had hidden there, and gave him confield to go by feat to ATHENS unto him. The state of the five adult had been and took his Fathers tokens from under it: Howbeith earlieved for the plainty, that he would not go by fea, notwithshanding that it was a great deal the fafer way, and for the plainty, that he would not go by feat, notwithshanding that it was a great deal the fafer way, and the time. bis Mother and Grandfather both had inftantly intreated him, because the way by land from Troe-ZEN to ATHENS was very dangerous, all the wayes being befet by robbers and murtherers. For the world at that time brought forth men, which for strongness in their arms, for swiftness of their feet, and for a generall frength of the whole body, did far pais the common force of others, and were never weary for any labour or travell they took in hand. But for all this, they never employed these gifts of nature to any honest or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanously to burt and wrong others: as if all the fruit and profit of their extraordinary ftrength had confifted in cruelty and violence only, and to be able to keep others under and in subjection; and to force, destroy, and spoil all that came to their hands. Thinking that the more part of those which think it a shame to do ill . and commend juffice, equity and humanity, do it of faint cowardly hearts, because they dare not wrong others, for fear they should receive wrong themselves; and therefore, that they which by might could have vantage over others, had nothing to do with such quiet qualities. Now Hercules, travelling Hercules a deabroad in the world, drave away many of those wicked theevish murderers, and some of them he stroyer of slew and put to death, other as he passed through those places where they kept, did hide themselves theeves. for fear of him, and gave place: infomuch as Hercules perceiving they were well tamed and brought low, made no further reckoning to purfue them any more. But after that by fortune he had flain Iphitus with his own hands, and that he was paffed over the feas into the countrey of Lydia, where Appendix Annual Appendix a long time, condemning himfelf unto that voluntary pain for the murHeralet ferther he had committed: all the Realm of Lydia during his abode there, remained in great peace with Omphale. and security from such kind of people. Howbeit in GREECE, and all thereabout, these old mischies began again to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before : because there was no man that punished them, nor that durst take upon him to destroy them. By which occasion, the way to go from PELOPONNESUS to ATHENS by land was very perilous. And therefore Pithens declaring unto Thefem, what manner of theeves they were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all travellers and wayfaring men, fought the rather to perswade him thereby to take his voyage along the feas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glory of Hereules noble deeds, had Thefeas following before fecterly fet his heart on fire, so that he made reckoning of none other but of him, and eth Hereules. lovingly hearkned unto those which would feem to describe him what manner of man he was, but chiefly unto those which had seen him, and been in his company, when he had said or done any thing worthy of memory. For then he did manifestly open himself, and he selt the like passion in his heart, which Themistocles long time afterwards endured, when he faid ; that the victory and triumph of Milisades would not let him fleep. For even fo, the wonderfull admiration which Thefens pricketh men Thefeus and Hercules near Kinfmen.

Defice of fame and in the day time, pricked forward with emulation and envy of his glory, he determined with himfelf one day to do the like; and the rather, because they were neer kinfmen, being Cosins removed by the mothers fide : For Libra was the daughter of Pithens, and Alemena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lyfidies, the which was half-fifter to Pitbens, both children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he should be utterly shamed and disgraced, that Hercules travelling through the world in that fort, did feek out those wicked thieves to rid both sea and land of Periphete: Co- of the City of E PID AUR UM, was a robber called Periphete: This robber uded for his ordinary and weapon to carry a club, and for that cause he was commonly surnamed Corpnetes, that is to say, a

them: and that he, farre otherwise, should flye occasion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he should meet on his way. Moreover, he was of opinion, he should greatly shame and dishonour him, whom same and common bruit of people reported to be his father; if in shunning occasion to fight, he should convey himself by sea, and should carry to his true father also a pair of fhoors (to make him known of him), and a fword not yet bathed in bloud. Where he should rather feek caufe, by manifelt tokens of his worthy deeds, to make known to the world of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was defeended. With this determination, Thefeus holderh on his purposed journey with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himself, and to be revenged of those which would take upon them to assault him. The first therefore whom he slew within the territories weapon to carry a cino, and for intercalicine was commonly administration of the country of the him, that he killed him. Whereof he was fo glad, and chiefly for that he won his club, that ever feat. him, that he killed him. Whereot he was to grad, and chically to matter. And like as this spoil of Thefeur carried after he carried it himself about with him, as Herenter did the Lyons kinne. And like as this spoil of Thefeur upon all the Clubbe he the Lyon did winnesse the greatnesse of the beast which Harcules had slain, even so The sees went all wan of Periabout, flewing that this club which he had gotten out of anothers bands, was in his own hands phere 23 Herea invincible. And lo going on further, in the streights of P B L O P O N N E S u s he killed another, called Sinnis, furnamed, Pityceamtes, that is to fay, a wreather or bower of Pine-apple trees: whom he put to death in that felf cruell manner that Sinnis had flain many other travellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practife or exercise: but onely to flow, that clean strength Sinnis Pipo- could do more then either Art or exercise. This Sinnis had a goodly fair daughter called Perigonna, canner a cruell which fled away when she saw her sather slain: whom he followed and sought all about. But she had hidden her felf in a grove full of certain kinds of wild pricking rufhes called Steebe, and wild Spefine. But Theless finding her, called her, and tware by his faith he would use her gently, and do her no hurt, nor displeasure at all. Upon which promise she came out of the bush, and lay with him, by whom she was conceived of a goodly boy, which was called Menalippus. Afterwards Theseus married her unto one Disanus, the some of Eurius the Occhalian. Mealipper of Orthis Mealippus the fonne of Thefem, came foxus: the which with Ornyem brought meninto. Grant decountry of C A R I A, where he built the City of J O X I D E S, And hereof cometh that old ancient ceremony, observed yet unto this day by those of Jo x 1D E 5, never to burn the briers of wild Sperage, nor the Steebe, but they have them in some honour and reverence. Touching the wild Phot the wild favage Sow of Crommyon, otherwise named Phota, that is to say, overgrown with age: she was not a bearlt to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. The fess notwithflanding tarried for her, and killed her in his journey, to the end it flould not appear to the world, that all the valiant deeds he did, were done by computition and of necessity: adding thereto his opinion alfo, that a valiant man should not only fight with men, to defend himself from the wicked; but that he should be the first, to assault and slay wild hurtfull beasts. Neverthelesse others have written, that this Phaa was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her body, which spoiled those that passed by the place called CROMMYONIA, where she dwelt : and that she was surnamed a Sow, for her beaftly bruitish behaviour and wicked life, for the which in the end she was also slain by Thefeas. After her he killed Sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, because he robbed all travellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others fay, for that of a cruel, wic ked, and favage pleasure, he put forth his feet to those that passed by the sea side, and compelled them to wash them: And then when they thought to stoop to do it, he still spurned them with his feet, till he thrust them headlong into the sea; so The seasons the washing down the rocks. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, and defirous (as Simnider faith) to overthrow it that had continued by prefeription of time, did maintain that this Sciron was never any robber, nor wicked person, but rather a pursuer and punisher of the wicked, and a friend and kinsman of the most honest and justest men of GRECE. For there is no man but will confesse, that ARCH was the most vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychrem the SALAMINIAN is honoured and reverenced as a God at ATHENS: and there is no man also but knoweth that Pelem and Telamon were men of fingular vertue. Now it is certain, that this Sciren was son in law to Cychreus father in law of Accus, and grandfather of Pelew and Telamon, the which two were the children of Endisda, the daughter of the faid Sciron, and of his daughter Chariclo. Also it is not very likely, that so many good men would have had affinity with fo naughry and wicked a man: in taking of him, and giving him that which men love best of all things in the world. And therefore the Historiographers say, that it was Arching thin not the first time, when Thefers went unto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron, but that it was many days after, when he took the City of ELEUSIN, which the MEGARIANS held at that time, where he deceived the Governour of the City, called Discles, and there he flew Sciron. And these bethe objections the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter. He flew also Cercyon the ARCADIAN . in the City of ELEUSIN, wraftling with him. And going a little further, he flew Damaster, otherwise fur- Damastes Pronamed Procrustes, in the City of HERMIONIA; and that by stretching of him out, to make him crustes, a crue named Procraftes, in the city of the beds, as he was wont to do unto Arangers that paffed by, muritirer flaid even with the length and measure of his beds, as he was wont to do unto Arangers that paffed by, muritirer flaid even with the length and measure of the least. even with the rengal and manager of Theleus, who punished Tyrants with the felf-lame pain and torment of Theleus. Theleus did that in imitation of Hercules, who punished Tyrants with the felf-lame pain and torment of Theleus. which they had made others fuffer. For even so did Hercules sacrifice Busirus. So he stilled Ambeus ings. in wraftling. So he put Cycrus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus head, from whom this Proverb of Termerus evil came, which continueth yet unto this day : for this Ter- Termerus evil. merus did use to put them to death in this fort whom he met ; to joll his head against theirs. Thus proceeded Thefens after this felf-fame manner, punishing the wicked in like fort, justly compelling them to abide the same pain and torments, which they before had unjustly made others abide. And so he held on his journey until he came to the River of CEPHISUS, where certain persons of the house of the Cephisus a Ri-Physalides were the first which went to meet him, to honour him, and at his request they purified him ver of Baotia. according to the Ceremonies used at this time: and afterwards having made a facrifice of propitiation The Phytaliaccording to the Ceremonies thea at this time; and anterwaves making made a factifice of prophation and the first unto their gods, they made him great chear in their houses; and this was the first notable entertainment he found in all his journey. It is supposed he arrived in the City of Athens, the eighth day of Thessian in the castof the moneth of June, which then they called Cronins. He found the Common-wealth turmoiled their hours. with feditions, factions and divisions, and particularly the house of Ageus in very ill termes also, This factions becaule that Medea (being banished out of the City of Corintal) was come to dwell in Athens, Planaro call-and remained with Agens, whom she had promised oft by vertue of certain medicines to make him cut militabil. to get children. But when she heard tell that Thefeus was come, before that the good king Ageus (who was now, become old, suspicious and afraid of sedition, by reason of the great factions within the City at that time) knew what he was, she perswaded him to poison him at a feast which they Modes perswawould make him as a stranger that passed by. Theseus failed not to go to this prepared feast where- ded Agene to unto he was bidden, but yet thought it not good to disclose himself. And the rather to give Agens poison Theseoccasion and means to know him, when they brought the meat to the board, he drew out his sword us. so though he would have cur withall, and sheweshit unto him. Agens seeing it, knew it straight, Agent acand forthwith overthrew the cup with poison which was prepared for him: and after he had enquired of knowledgesh him and asked things, he embraced him as his fon. Afterwards in the common affembly of the in- Thefeus for his habitants of the City, he declared, how he avowed him for his fon. Then all the people received fon, him with exceeding joy, for the renown of his valiantness and manhood. And some say, that when Ægens overthrew the cup, the poison which was in it, fell in that place where there is at this prefers a certain compals inclosed all about within the Temple which is called Delphinion. For even there in that place, in old time, stood the house of Agens: in witness whereof, they call yet at this present time the image of Mercury (which is on the fide of the Temple looking towards the rifing of the Sun) the Mercury gate of Agens. But the Pallantides, which before flood alwayes in hope to recover the Realm of Athens, at the leaft after Agens death, because he had no children: when they faw that Thefeus was known, and openly declared for his fon and heir, and fucceffor to the Realin, they were not able any longer to bear it, feeing that not only Ægeus (who was but the adopted fon of Pandion, and nothing at all of the blood-Royal of the Eritheides) had usurped the Kingdom over them, but that The feus also should enjoy it after his death. Whereupon they determined The Pallantito make war with them both; and dividing themselves into two parts, the one came openly in arms des take arms with their father, marching directly towards the City: the other lay close in ambush in the village against Ageof GARGETTUS, meaning to give charge upon them in two places at one instant. Now they us and Thefeur. brought with them an Herald born in the Town of AGNUS, called Leos, who bewrayed unto Leos an Herald The fens the fecret and device of all their enterprize. The fens upon this intelligence went forth, and been altered fer on those that lay in ambush, and put them all to the sword. The other which were in Pallas their treason company understanding thereof, did break and disperse themselves incontinently, and this is the to Theseas.

cause (as some say) why those of Pallena do never make affinity nor marriage with those respectively. of AGNUS at this day: and that in the Town when any Proclamation is made, they never speak these words which are cryed every where else throughout the whole countrey of ATTICA, Acouste Leos., (which is as much to fay, as hearken, O people) they do fo extreamly hatethis fame word Leos, for that it was the Heralds Name that wrought them that treason. This done, Thefeus, who would not live idly at home and do nothing, but desirous therewithall to gratifie the people, went his way to fight with the Bull of Marathon, the which did great midfulet to the inhathe Bull of bitants of the country of Trrapolis. And having taken him alive, brought him through the Marathon tobitants of the country of Trrapolis. And having taken him alive, brought him through the Marathon tobitants of the country of Trrapolis. And having taken him alive, brought him through the Marathon tobitants of the country of Trrapolis. And having taken him alive, brought him through the Marathon taken him through the Marathon Delphicus. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to have lodged him, and to have given Thefeas. him good en retainment, it is not altogether untrue. For in the old time, those Towns and villages cur. thereabouts did affemble together, and made a common facrifice which they called Hecalefion, in honour of Jupiter Hecalion, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutive Name, gapiner Hecal Hecalena: because that when she received Theseus into her house being then but very young, tien. the made much of him, and called him by many pretty made Names, as old folks are wont to call young children. And forafmuch as she made a vow to Jupiter to make him a solemn facrifice, if Thefeus remained fafe from the enterprise he went about, and that she died before his return: in recompence of the good chear the made him, the had that honour done unto her by The-feu commandment, as Thiloshopsu hath written of it. Shortly after this exploit, there came certain of King Miner Ambassadors out of Casta, to ask a Tribute, being now the third time that it was The Abraims demanded, which the ATRINIANS payed for this cause. Androgem, the eldest fon of King Mipayed Tibute not, was flain by treason within the countrey of ATTICA: for which cause Minos pursuing the reunto Mast venge of his death, made very hot and tharp Wars upon the Athenians, and did them great King (c Great, land Rose Rose Rose all this the goods did fharolto minish and focuree all the countrey, as well with for the death of Addregors and famine, as also with plague and other milchiefs, even to the drying up of their Rivers. The Athenians perceiving their fore troubles and plagues, ran to the Oracle of Apollo, who answered them that they should appeale Minos, and when they had made their peace with him, then the wrath of the gods would cease against them, and their troubles should have an end. Whereupon the ATHERIAN' fent immediately unto him, and intreated him for peace: which he granted The manner of them, with condition that they should be bound to fend him yearly into Carta, seven young boys, and as many young girls. Now thus far all the Hiftoriographers do very well agree, but in the reft not. And they which feem furtheft off from the troth, do declare, that when these young boys were delivered in Carra, they caused them to be devoured by the Minotaure within the Labyrimb: or elfe that they were shut within this Labyrimb, wandring up and down, and could find no place to get out, untill fuchtime as they died, even famished for hunger. And this Minotante, as Euripides

The Libyrinth But Philocherus writeth, that the Carrans do not confels that, but fay that this Labyrinth was a police in goal or prison, in the which they had no other hurt, faving that they which were kept there under lock and key, could not fly nor flart away: and that Mines had in memory of his fon Androgens, inflicted games and playes of prize, where he gave unto them that wan the victory, those young children of ATHEMS, the which in the mean time, notwithstanding, were carefully kept and young cunuren or a man, the winds man and that at the first games that were kept, one of the Terrat one of Kings Captains called Taurus, who was in best credit with his master, wan the prize. This Taurus was a churlish and naughty natured man of condition, and very hard and cruel to these children of ATHERS. And to verifie the same, the Philosopher Arisonle himself, speaking of the Commonwealth of BOTTISIANS, declareth very well, that he never thought that Mines did at any time Othe Batici want of Athans to be put to death: but faith, that they poorly toyled in Carra, Phi lib. coule the children of Athans to be put to death: but faith, that they poorly toyled in Carra, even to crooked age, earning their living by true and painful fervice. For it is written, that the CRATANS (to fatisfic an old vow of theirs, which they had made of ancient time) fent fometime the first-born of their children unto Apollo in the City of DELFROS: and that amongst them also they mingled those which were descended of the ancient prisoners of Arabas, and they went with them. But because they could not live there, they directed their journey first into Iraly, where for a time they remained in the Realm of Puezia, and afterwards from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of Borrisians. In memory whereof the daughters of the Bottisians in a folemn Sacrifice they make, do use to fing the foot of this Song : Let us to ATHENS go. But thereby we may fee how perilous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmity with a City which can fpeak well, and where Learning and eloquence do flourish. For ever fince that time, Minus was alwayes blazed and difgraced throughout all the Theaters of Arrans. The teffi-King Minus time, Minus was alwayes blazed and dilgraced throughout all the I heaters of Annua. Internet, who calleth him the moft worthy King, doth nothing at all help him, nor the praise defanted by the mony of Hessiadus, who calleth him the moft worthy King, doth nothing at all help him, nor the praise of Homer, who nameth him Jupiters familiar friend, because the tragical Poets got the upper hand in differentiation, notwithstanding all these, and upon their stages where all the Tragedies were plaid, they ftill gave forth many ill favoured words and foul freeches of him, as against a manthat had been most cruel and unnatural. Yet most men think, that Minor was the King that established the Laws, Radamanubus, and Radamanubus the Judge and preferver of them, who caused the same also to be kept and obser-The third time ved. And that to bring the The Athenians 101: the Citizens of Athens began to murmur against Agens, alleaging for their griefs, that he are grieved to who only was the cause of all this evil, was only alone exempted from this grief. And that to bring the government of the Realm to fall into the hands of a stranger his bashard, he cared not though they their Children were bereft of all their natural children, and were unnaturally compelled to leave and forsike them.

These just sorrows and complaints of the fathers whose children were taken from them, did pierce the heart of The feat, who willing to yield to reason, and to run the self same fortune as the Citizens did, willingly offered him(elf to be fent thither, without regard taking to hishap or adventure. For The general control of the Citizens greatly effected of his courage and honourable difposition, and dearly loved him the Children for the good affection he feemed to bear unto the commonalty. But Agent having used many reafons and persuasions to cause him to turn and stay from his purpole, and perceiving in the end there was no remedy but he would go, he then drew Lots for the Children which should go with him. Hellanieus notwithstanding doth write, that they were not those of the City which drew Lots for the that thould go. Children they should fend, but that Mines himself went thither in person, and did choose them, as he The Attentions chofe Thefeus the first, upon condition agreed between them : that is to wit, that the ATBBNIANS should furnish them with a Ship, and that the Children should ship and imbark with him, carrying na Creatin aftip weapons of war; and that after the death of the Minotaure this Tribute flould ceafe. Now before that time, there was never any hope of return, nor of fafety of their children; therefore the ATHE NIAMS alwayes sent a ship to convey their Children, with a black fail, in token of affired loss.

Nevertheless Thefeus putting his father in good hope of him; being of a good courage, and promifing boldly that he would fet upon this Minotaure, Agens gave unto the Mafter of the thip a white fail, Agens giveth commanding him that at his return he should put out the white sail, if his son had escaped; if the matter not, that then he should set up the black sail, to shew him as ar off his unlucky and unfortunate the ship a not, that then he mound at up the chance. Simonides notwithstanding doth fay, that this sail which Agens gave to the Master, white sail, to chance. was not white, but red, died in grain, and of the colour of Scarlet, and that he gave it him to return of Thefignifie afar off their delivery and fafety. This Master was called Phereclus Amarsiadas, as seus. Simonides faith. But Philosorms writeth, that Scirus the SALANINIAN gave to Thefeus a Master called Nausubeus, and another marriner to tackle the sails, who was called Phans because the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practifed to the sea. And this did Scirus, for that one of the Children on whom the Lot fell was his nephew: and thus much the Chappels do testifie, which Theseus built afterwards in honour of Nausthem, and of Pheas, in the village of Phalerus, joyning to the Temple of Seirus. And it is faid moreover, that the feast which they call Cyberness, Joylung to the Feath of Patrons of the fairs, is celebrated in honour of Cyberness, them, Now after the Lots were drawn, These was taking with him the Children allotted for the Tri. games, bute, went from the Pallace to the Temple called Delphinion, to offerup to Apollo for him and for them an offering of supplication, which they call Hiceteria, which was an Olive bow hallowed, Hiceteria offerwreathed about with white wool. After he had made his prayer, he went down to the fea fide to Thefeur takenh imbark, the fixth day of the moneth of March: on which day at this prefent time they do fend their thin with the young girls to the same Temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the gods. Furthermore, after he was arrived in Carra, he slew there the Minotaure (as the gia. most part of the ancient Authors do write) by the means and help of Ariadne: who being faln in Thefens flew fancy with him, did give him a clue of thred, by the help whereof the taught him, how he might the Minoraure easily wind out of the turnings and cranks of the Labyrinth. Ariadne. Thefeue made league with her, and carried away the young children of ATHENS which were kept as hostages, and concluded peace and amity between the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promifed, and sware, they would never make wars against them. They report many other things also touching this matter, and specially of Ariadne: but there is no troth nor certainty in it. For some fay, that Ariadne hung her felf for forrow, when she faw that Thefeus had cast her off. Others write, that the was transported by mariners into the Isle of Naxos, where the was married unto OEnarus the Priest of Bacchus: and they think that Thefeus left her, because she was in love with another, as by these verses should appear:

Agles the Nymph was lov'd of Theseus, Who was the Daughter of Panopeus.

Hercas the Magarian faith, that these two verses in old time were among the verses of the Poet Hefodus, howbeit Pififratus took them away: as he did in like manner add these other here in the description of the hells in Homer to gratifie the ATHENIANS.

Bold Theseus, and Perithous stout, Descended both from gods immortal race, Triumphing still, this weary world about In feats of arms, and many a comely grace.

OEnopion and Others hold opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Thefens: the one of them was named OEno-Staphjus, The pia, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongst others the Poet Jon writeth it, who was born in the Ille of CHIO, and speaking of this City, he saith thus :

O Enopian which was the fon of worthy Theseus, Did cause men build this stately Town, which now triumpheth thus.

Now what things are found feemly in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner fing them. But one Paenon born in the City of AMATHUNTA, reciteth this clean after another fort, and contrary to all other: faying, that Thefeus by tempest was driven with the Isle of CYPRUS, having with him Ariadne, which was great with child, and so fore fea-fick, that she was not able to abide it. In so much

And which hild in the groaning time was come, and the to be layed, they did their belt by all possible means to fave her, but the died notwithstanding in labour, and could never be delivered : So she was honourably buried by the Ladies of CYPRUS. Thefeus not long after returned thither again, who took her death marvellous heavily, and left money with the inhabitants of the Countrey, to facrifice unto her yearly: and for memory of her, he caused two little Images to be molten; the one of copper, The ceremony and the other of filver, which he dedicated unto her.

death, as to the first was given. For they celebrate the Feast of the first with all joy and mirth : where Thefens re- the Sacrifices done in memory of the fecond, be mingled with mourning and forrow. Thefeus then turneth out of departing from the Isle of Carra, arrived in the Isle of Dalos, where he did factifice in the Creta into the Temple of Apollo, and gave there a little Image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then lile of Delos. with the other young boys that he had delivered, he danced a kind of dance, which the Dallans keep to this day, as they fay; in which there are many turns and returns, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of dance, the Crane, as Dicaarcus faith. And

The Coar Dance The feur danced it first about the Altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to fay, horn-staff; because it is made and builded of horns only, all on the left hand well and curioully fer together without any other binding. It is faid also, that he made a game in this Isle of Datos, in which at the first was

And they hold opinion also, that the feaft of boughs which is celebrated at ATHENS at this about increase time, was then first of all instituted by Theseus. It is said moreover, that he did not carry all the alledged for a wenches upon whom the Lots did fall, but chose two fair young boyes, whose faces were sweet and deli-doubt. cate as maidens be, that otherwise were hardy and quick-spirited: but he made them so ost bathe themfelves in hot bathes, and kept them from the heat of the Sunne, and so many times to wash, annoint, fpeech, countenance and fashion of young maids, that they seemed to be like them, rather then young boyes: For there was no manner of difference to be perceived outwardly, and he mingled them with the gyrls, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a proceffion, in which both he and the other young boyes were apparelled then, as they be now which carry boughs on the day of the feaft in their hands. They carry them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne. following the fable that is told of them: or rather because they returned home just at the time and feason, when they gather the fruit of those trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to fay, supper-carriers, which are affiftants to the Sacrifice done that day, in representing the Mothers of those upon whom the Lots did fall, because they in like fort brought them both meat and drink. There they tell tales, for fo did their mothers tattle to their children to comfort and encourage them. All these particularities were written by Demon the Historiographer. There was moreover a place chosen out to build him a Temple in : and he himself ordained, that those houses which had paid tribute before unto the King of CRETA, should now yearly thenceforth become contributaries towards the charges of a Solemn Sacrifice, which should be done in the honour of him: and he did aftign the order and administration of the fame, unto the house of the Physalides, in recompence function the fame in the of the curtefie which they shewed him when he arrived. Furthermore after the death of his Father Physiker, Agent, he undertook a marvellous great enterprife; for he brought all the inhabitants of the whole who were the Province of ATTICA, to be within the City of ATHENS, and made them all one Corporation, first that scawhich were before dispersed into divers Villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be assembled together, when occasion was offered to establish any Order concerning the common State. Many times also they were at variance together and by the ears, making warres one upon another. But Thefembrought The fens took the pains to go from village to village, and from family to family, to let them under the inhabitants stand the reasons why they should consent unto it. So he sound the poor people and private men reasos in he countrey dy to obey and follow his will, but the rich, and fuch as had authority in every village, all against it. of Attica into Neverthelesse he wan them, promising that it should be a Commonwealth, and not subject to the one city: power of any fole Prince, but rather a popular State. In which he would onely referve to himself the charge of the Warres, and the prefervation of the Laws: for the reft, he was content that every Citizen in all, and for all should bear a like sway and authority. So there were some that willingly granted thereto. Others who had no liking thereof, yeelded notwithftanding for fear of his displeasure and power; which then was very great. So they thought it better to confent with good will, unto that he required, then to tarry his forcible compultion. Then he caused all the places where Justice was ministred, and all their Halls of assembly to be overthrown and pulled down. He removed straight all Judges and Officers, and built a town-house, and a Counsell-hall, in the place where the City now ftandeth, which the Athenians call Asty, but he called the whole Corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwards he inflituted the great Feaft and common Sacrifice for all the Countrey of ATTICA, which they call Panathenea. Then he ordained another Feaft also upon the fixteenth day of the moneth of fune, for all fit angers which should come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metacia, and is kept even to this day. That done, he gave over his Regall power according to The contraction is promife, and began to fet up an Effate or policy of a Commonwealth, beginning first with the eth, his king dom, and ma- fervice of the gods. To know the good fuccesse of the fortune of this City: from whence this Answer wom, and make the Oracle of Apollo in Delphos, to enquire of the fortune of this City: from whence this Anliwer was brought unto him:

O thou which art the Sonne of Ægeus, Beget by him on Pithem Daughter dear : The mighty fove, my Father glorious, By his decree hath faid there Shall appear A fut all end of every City here. Which end he will shall also come adown. Within the walls, of this thy stately Town. Therefore shew thou, a valiant constant mind And les no care, nor cark thy heart displease : For like unto a bladder blown with wind Thou halt be tost, upon the surging seas, Yet let not dint of dolours thee disease. For why ? show shalt not perish nor decay , Nor be ore come, nor yet be cast away.

It is found written also, that Sibylla afterwards gave out such a like Oracle over the City of

ATHENS:

The bladder blown may fleet upon the fludde, But cannot fink , nor flick in filthy mudde.

Moreover, because he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his City, he entited many to come and dwell there, by offering them the felf fame freedom and priviledges which the natural born Citizens had. So that many judge, that these words which are in use at this day in ATHENS, when any open Proclamation is made , All people, come je bither : bethe felf fame which Thefeus then cauled to be proclaimed, when he in that fort did gather a people together of all Nations. Yet for Thefen maketh all that , he fuffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge , to be without diffindifference of thos of degrees and orders. For he first divided the Noblemen from Husbandmen and Artificers, flates and deappointing the Noblemen as judges and Magiftrates to judge upon matters of Religion, and touching appointing the Problemen as judges and magnification judge upon matters on Actigion, and toltching grees in his Commonweal, the fervice of the gods: and of them also he did chuse Rulers, to bear civil Office in the Commonweal. weal, to determine the law, and to tell all holy and divine things. By this means he made the Noblemen and the two other effates equall in voice. And as the Noblemen did paffe the other in honour, even fo the Artificers exceeded them in number, and the Husbandmen them in profit. Now that The-Thefeus the first feus was the first who of all others yeelded to have a Commonweal or popular Estate (as Arificele that gave over faith) and did give over his Regall power : Homer himself feemeth to testific it, in numbring the Ships popular State. CIANS, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS People. Moreover The function of the Roll of Manager and Money, which he marked with the framp of an Ox. in memory of the Roll of Manager and Company of the Roll of the R Minor, or elfe to provoke his Citizens to give themselves to labour. They say also that of this Money they were fince called Hecatomban, and Decaban, which fignifieth worth an hundred Oxen, and worth ten Oxen, Furthermore having joyned all the territory of the City of MEGARA unto the Thefeus Coin. countrey of ATTICA, he caused that notable sour-square Pillar to be set up for their confines within the straight of Peloponnesus, and engraved thereupon this superscription, that declareth the feparation of both the countries which confine there together. The superscription is this:

Where Titan doth begin, his beams for to display, Even that way stands Ionia, in fertile wife alway : And where again he goeth, adown to take his rest, There stands Peloponnesus land, for there I count is west.

It was he also which made the Games called Ifthmia, after the imitation of Hereules, to the end that as the GRECIANS did celebrate the Featt of Games called Olympia, in the honour of Japiter, by Herentes ordinance: fo, that they should also celebrate the Games called Ifthmia, by his order and institution, in the honour of Neptune. For those that were done in the Straights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, and had rather form of Sacrifice or of a mystery, then of Games Thefess ered- and open Feaft. Yet fome will fay, that these Games of Ishmia were inflituted in the bonour and ed the Games memory of Sciren, and that Thefens ordained them in fatisfaction of his death; because he was his Tibbusis in the Cofin-german, being the Sonne of Cantthus, and of Heniocha the Daughter of Pitheus. Others say that it was Sinnia and not Sciron , and that for him Thefeu made thefe Games, and not for the memory of the other. Howfoever it was, he specially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they should give unto those that came from ATHENS to see their Games of Ishmia, fo much place to fit down before them (in the most honourable part of the feast place) as the fail of their ship should cover, in the which they came from ATHENS: thus do Hellanicus and Andron Halicarnaffeus write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the fea Major, Philochorus, and some others hold opinion, that he Thefeus journing went thither with Hercules against the AMAZONES: and that to honour his valiantness, Hercules into Mare magave him Antiopa the AMAZONE. But the more part of the other Historiographers, namely Hellani- jus. cus, Pherecides, and Herodorm, dowrite, that Thefeus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, and that he took this AMAZONE prisoner; which is likeliest to be true. For we do not find that any other who went this journey with him, had taken any AMAZONE prisoner besides himself. Bion also the Antique the Historiographer, notwithstanding this saith, that he brought her away by deceit and stealth. For the Amazone 12-AMAZONES (faith one) naturally loving men, did not flee at all when they faw them land in vished by Thetheir countrey, but fent them prefents, and that Thefeus entired her to come into his Ship, who feut, brought him a present : and so soon as she was aboard, he hoysed his fail, and so carried her away. Another Historiographer Menecrates, who wrote the History of the City NICEA in the country of BYTHINIA, faith: That Thefens having this AMAZONE Antiopa with him, remained a certain time upon those coasts, and that amongst other he had in his company three younger brethren of ATHENS, Ennius, Thors, and Solois. This laft, Solois, was marvellously in love with Antiopa, Solois fell in and never bewrayed it to any of his other companions, faving unto one with whom he was most fa- love with Anmiliar, and whom he trufted best: so that he reported this matter unto Antiopa. But she utterly rejected his fuit, though otherwise she handled it wisely and courteously, and did not complain to Thefeus of him. Howbeit the young man despairing to enjoy his love, took it so inwardly, that desperately he leapt into the River, and drowned himself: Which when Thefeus understood, and the salais drowncause also that brought him to this desperation and end, he was very forry, and angry also. Where- ed himselffor upon he remembred a certain Oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commanded to build a City in that love. place in a strange countrey, where he should be most forry, and that he should leave some that were about him at that time, to govern the fame. For this cause therefore he built a City in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, because he built it onely by the commandment of the Nun Pythia. He called the River in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memory of him: Solois ft. and left his two Brethren for his Deputies and as Governours of this new City, with another Gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it cometh, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS call a Pythopolis certain place of their City, Hermus house. But they fail in the accent, by putting it upon the last built by fyllable: for in pronouncing it so, Hermus signifieth Mercury. By this means they do transfer the honour due to the memory of Hermus, unto the god Mercury. Now hear what was the occasion The cause of of the wars of the AMAZONES, which methinks was not a matter of small moment, nor an en- the wars of terprize of a woman. For they had not placed their Camp within the very City of ATHENS, nor the Amazones had not fought in the very place it felf (called PNYCE) adjoyning to the Temple of the Mufes, if against the they had not first conquered or subdued all the country thereabouts: neither had they all come at the first, so valiantly to affail the City of ATHENS. Now whether they came by land from so far 2 countrey, or that they passed over an arm of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being Bosphorus Cimfrozen as Hellanicus faith, it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the mericus an arm very City it felf, the names of the places which continue yet to this present day do witness it, and of the sea. the graves also of the women which died there. But so it is, that both Armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battle. Howbeit at the length Thefens having first made Sacrifice unto Feare the godders, according to the countel of a Prophecy he had received, he gave them Thefeut fightbattle in the moneth of August, on the same day, in the which the ATHENIANS do even at this ethabattle present day solemnize the Feast, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, de- with the Amifirous particularly to write all the circumstances of this encounter, saith; that the left point of their The order of battle bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right point marched by the Amazone the fide of CHRYSA, even to the place which is called PNYCE, upon which the ATHENIANS battle. coming towards the Temple of the Mufes, did first give their charge. And for proof that this is true, the graves of the women which died in the first encounter, are found yet in the great street, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, near unto the Chappel of the little god Chalcodus. And the ATHE. MIANS (faith he) were in this place repulled by the AMAZONES, even to the place where the Images of Eumenides are, that is to fay, of the Furies. But on the other fide also, the ATHENIANS coming towards the quarters of Palladium, Ardettus, and Lucium, drave back their right point even to within their Camp, and flew a great number of them. Afterwards, at the end of four moneths, peace Peace concluwas taken between them by means of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Historiographer ded at four calleth the AMAZONE which Thefeus married, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Nevertheless, some say moneths end, that she was slain (fighting on Thefers side) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memory by the means whereast the Biller thick is indeed to Tamber the Biller this is indeed to the Biller this is indeed the Biller this is indeed to the Bill whereof, the Pillar which is joined to the Temple of the Olympian ground, was fet up in her honour. We are not to marvel, if the history of things so ancient, be found so diversly written. For there are also that write, that Queen Antiopa, sent those secretly which were hurt then into the City of CAL-CIDE, where some of them recovered, and were healed: and others also died, which were buried near to the place called AMAZONION. Howfoever it was, it is most certain that this war was ended by agreement. For a place adjoyning to the Temple of Thefens, doth bear record of it, being called Orcomosium: because the peace was there by solemn oath concluded. And the sacrifice also Orcomosion the doth truly verifie it, which they have made to the AMAZONES, before the Feaft of Thefins, long name of a time out of minde. They of Magana also do shew a Tombe of the AMAZONES in their City, which is as they go from the market place, to the place they call Rhus; where they find an ancient

Tombe, cut in form and fashion of a losenge. They say that there died other of the AMAZONES alfo, near unto the City of CHABRONDA, which were buried all along the little brook passing by the same, which in the old time (in mine opinion) was called Thermodon, and is now named Hamon, as we have elsewhere written in the Life of 'Demosthenes. And it seemeth also, that they did not pass through THESSALY without fighting : for there are feen yet of their Tombes all about the City of Scoruss, hard by the rocks which be called the Doggs-head. And this is that which is worthy memory (in mine opinion) touching the wars of thefe AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth, that the AMAZONES made wars with Thefeus to revenge the injury he did to their Queen Antiopa, refufing her, to marry with Phadra: and for the murder which he telleth that Hercules did, that methinks is altogether but a device of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Thefeus married Phadra, having had before of Antiopa a Son called Hyppolitus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers do not in any thing speak against the tragical Poets, in that which concerneth the ill hap that chanced to him, in the persons of this his Wife, and of his Son: we must needs take it to be lo, as we find it written in the Tragedies. And yet we find many other reports touching the marriages of Thefeus, whose beginnings had no great good honest ground, neither fell out their ends very fortunate: and yet for all that they make no Tragedies of them, neither have they been played in the Theaters. For we read that he took away Auaxo, the TROSZENIAN, and that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he took their Daughters perforce: and that he did also marry Pheribea the Mother of Ajax, and afterwards Pherebaa, and Toppa the Daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much alfo, for that he fo lightly for fook his Wite Ariadne, for the love of Agles the Daughter of Panopeus, as we have recited before. Laftly, he took away Hellen: which ravifiment filled all the Realm of ATTEA with wars, and finally was the very occasion that forced him to forsake his countrey, and brought him at length to his end, as we will tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other Princes of GREECE had done many goodly and notable exploits in the wars, yet Herodorus is of opinion, that Thefeus was never in any one of Thefeur battles them: faving that he was at the battle of the Lapithe against the Centauri. Others say to the con-Thefau battles them: I away that he was at the journey of Colchide with John, and that he did help Meleager to kill the Proveth, Not wild Bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they say) this Proverb came; Not without Thefeus: meaning that such a thing was not done without great help of another. Howbeit it is certain that Thefeus felf did many famous acts, without aid of any man, and that for his valiantness this Pro-Proverb, This verb came in use, which is spoken; This is another Thesens. Also he did help Adrastus King of the is another The. Argives, to recover the bodies of those that were flain in the battle, before the City of THE-BES. Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides faith, by force of arms, after he had overcome the THER NS in battle; but it was by composition: And thus the greatest number of the most ancient writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorns writeth, that this was the first treaty that ever was made to recover the dead bodies flain in battle: Nevertheless we read in the histories and gests of Hercules, that he was the first that ever suffered his enemies to carry away their dead bodies, after they had been put to the fword. But wholoever he was, at this day in the village of ELEUTHERES, they do shew the place where the people were buried, and where Princes Tombes are seen about the City of ELEUSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimony hereof, the Tragedy Afchilus made of the ELBUSINIANS, where he caufeth it to be spoken even thus to Thefens himself, doth clearly overthrow the peritioners in Emipides. Touching the friendship betwixt Pirithous and him, it is faid it began thus: The renown of his valiancy was marvelloufly blown abroad through all Gazzes, and Pirithons defirous to know it by experience, went even of purpose to invade his Countrey, and brought away a certain booty of Oxen of his, taken out of the Countrey of MARATHON. Thefeus being advertised thereof, armed straight, and went to the rescue. Pirithous hearing of his coming, fled not at all, but returned back fuddenly to meet him. And so foon as they came to see one another, they both wondred at each others beauty and courage, and so had they no defire to fight. But Pirishous reaching out his hand first to Thefeus, faid unto him , I make your felf judge of the damage you have fuftained by my invafion, and with all my heart I will make fuch satisfaction, as it shall please you to asses it at. Thefeus then did not only release him of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in arms. Here-Thefau fwom upon they were presently sworn brethren in the field : after which oath betwirt them, Pirishous married Deidamia, and fentto pray Thefeus to come to his marriage, to vifit his Countrey, and to make merry with the Lapithe. He had bidden also the Centeurs to the feath: who being drunk, committed many lewed parts, even to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapitha chaftifed them to well, that they flew fome of them prefently in the place, and drave the rest forwards out of the countrey by the help of Thefeus, who armed himself, and fought on their fide. Yet Herodorus writeth the matter fomewhat contrary, faying, that Thefeus went not at all untill the war was well begun; and that it was the first time that he faw Hercules, and spake unto him near unto the City of TRACHING when he was then quiet, having ended all his far voyages and greatest troubles. They report that this meeting together was full of great cheer, much kindness and honourable entertainment between them, and great courtesie was offered to each other. Nevertheless methinks we should give better credit to those writers that say they met many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and received into the brotherhood of the mysteries of Elbusin, by the means of the countenance and favour which Thefeus shewed unto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged of necessity of all his ill deeds and cruelties, before he could enter into the company of those holy mysteries. Furthermore, Theseus was fifty years old when he took away Hellen and ravished her, which wasvery young, and not of age to be married, as Hellanic us faith. Theleas files By reason whereof, some seeking to hide the ravishment of her as a haynous fact, do report it was years old when not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that carried her away, who left her in his cuftody and keeping her away, who left her in his cuftody and keeping her away. and that Thefeus would have kept her from them, and would not have delivered her to her Brethren Caftor and Pollux, which afterwards did demand her again of him. Others again fay, it was her own Father Tyndarus, who gave her to keep, for that he was afraid of Enariphorus the Son of Hippocoon, who would have had her away by force. But that which cometh nearest to the troth in this case, and which indeed by many Authors is testified, was in this fort. Theseus and Perithons went together, to the City of LACEDEMON, where they took away Hellen (being yet very young) The magneeven as the was dancing in the Temple of Diana, furnamed Orthia: and they fled for life. They of Hellows carifor LACEDEMON fent after her, but those that followed went no further then the City of TEGEA, ment.

Now when they were escaped out of the Country of PELOPONNESUS, they agreed to draw Lors Plant Orthit together, which of them two should have her, with condition that whose Lot it was to have her, he should take her to his Wife, and should be bound also to help his Companion to get him another. It was Thefens hap to light upon her, who carried her to the City of APHIDNES, because the was thefanter yet too young to be married. Whither he caused his Mother to come to bring her up, and gave his Hellen in the Friend called Aphidnes the charge of them both, recommending her to his good care, and to keep it City of Aprilfo fecretly, that no body should know what was become of her. Because he would do the like for The fact were Perithous (according to the agreement made betwirt them) he went into Epirus with him to with Feritheas fteal the Daughter of Aidonaus, King of the Molossians, who had furnamed his Wile Pro- bind Efratio ferpina, his Daughter Proferpina, and his Dog Cerberus, with whom he made them fight which fleat Proferies. ferpina, his Daughter Proferpina, and nis Dog Ceroerus, with whom he made menting a winding a mar Aldonear came to ask his Daughter in marriage, promiting to give her to him that should overcome his Ceradulhier. berus. But the King understanding that Perishous was come, not to request his Daughter in marriage, but to fteal her away, he took him Priloner with Thefeus; and as for Perithous, he caused in pieces with him presently to be torn in pieces with his Dog, and shit Theseus up in close prison. In the mean Cerberus. time there was one at ATHENS called Menestheus, the Son of Peteus : which Peteus was the Son Thefeus close of Orneus, and Orneus was the Son of Eritheus. This Menestheus was the first that began to flatter the people, and did feek to win the favour of the commonalty, by fweet enticing words: by which device heftirred up the chiefest of the City against Thesens (who indeed long before began to the weary of him) by declaring unto them how Thesens had raken from them their Royalties and Signiories, and had shut them up in such sort within the walls of a City, that he might the better keep them in subjection and obedience in all things, after his will. The poor inferiour fort of peoples he did stir up also to Rebellion, perswading them that it was no other then a dream of Liberty that was promifed them: and how contrariwife they were clearly dispossessed and thrown out of their own houses, of their Temples, and from their natural places where they were born, to the end onely that of many good and loving Lords which they were wont to have before, they should now be compelled to serve one onely head, and a strange Lord. Even as Menestheus was very hot about this practife, the War of the Tyndarides fell out at that instant, which greatly furthered his pre- The war of tence. For these Tyndarides (to wit the Children of Tyndarus) Castor and Pollux, came down with the Tyndarides a great Army against the City of ATHENS : and some suspect fore that Menestheus was cause of with the Athetheir comming thither. Howbeit at the first entry they did no hurt at all in the countrey, but only demanded restitution of their Sister. To whom the Citizens made answer, that they knew not where she was left: and then the Brethren began to make spoil, and offer war indeed. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who having knowledge (I cannot tell by what means) that the was fecretly hidden in the City of APHIDNES, revealed it unto them. By reason whereof the Tyndarides did always honour him very much, so long as he lived, and afterwards the LACEDEMONIANS, having of burnt and destroyed the whole countrey of ATTICA throughout, they would yet never touch the Academy of ATHENS for Academus fake. Yet Dicearchus faith, that in the Army of the Tyndarides there were Academis why two ARCADIANS, Echedemus and Marathus, and how of the Name of one of them, it was then called fo called. the place of Echedemy, which fithence hath been called Academia: and after the Name of the other, which seems won there was a Village called MARATHON, because he willingly offered himself to be sacrificed before and razed by the battle, as obeying the order and commandment of a Prophecy. So they went and pitched their the Tyntarides Camp before the City of APHINES, and having won the battle and taken the City by affault, they also that the City of APHINES, and having won the battle and taken the City by affault, they food that at the razed the place. Howheir it is not likely to be true, that Thefeus being there, the City of APHIDNES, and his Mother also were taken. But when it was won, they of ATHENS began to quake for fear, and Menestheus counselled them to receive the Tyndarides into the City, and to make them good chear, fo they would make no wars but upon Thefeus, which was the first that had done the wrong and injury; and that to all other else they should shew favour and good will. And so it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to do as they listed, they demanded nothing elfe but that The The Latitus they might be received into their Corporation, and not to be reckoned for strangers, no more than Hereales was : the which was granted the Tyndarides, and Aphidnus did adopt them for his Children, as Pylins had adopted Hercules. Moreover they did honour them as if they had been gods, calling them Anaces. Either because they ceased the wars, or for that they ordered themselves so well, that their whole Army being lodged within the City, there was not any hurt or displeafure done to any person: but as it became those that have the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preferve the good quiet thereof. All which this Greek word Anaco; doth fignifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the Kings Analtes. There are others also who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, because of their Stars which appeared in the air. For the ATTICAN Tongue faith, Anecas, and Anecathen, where the common people fay Ano, and Anothen, that is to fay, carried to La above. Nevertheles Libra, Thefeus Mother, was carried priloner to LACEDEMON, and from thence to TROIA with Hellen, as fome fay: and as Homer himfelf doth winnels in his vertes, where he ons of Homers speaketh of the Women that followed Hellen:

Athra the Daughter dear of Pitheus aged Sire,

And with her fair Clymene she, whose eyes most men desire.

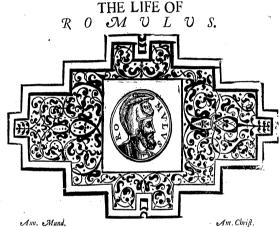

Yet there are other who as well reject these two veries, and maintain they are not Homers: as also they reprove all that is reported of Munyebus: to wit, that Laicide being privily conceived of him by Demophor, he was brought up fecretly by Athra within TROIA. But Hefter the Historian in his thirteenth of his Histories of ATTICA, maketh a recital far contrary to other, faying, that some hold opinion, that Paris Alexander was flain in battle by Achilles and Patroclus in the Country of Thesopinion, that Paris Alexander was flain in battle by Achilles and Patroclus in the Country of Those and that his Brother Hetter took the City of Troezen, from whence he brought away Arbra: in which there is no manner of appearance or likelihood. But Admins King of the Molossians, feating Hercules one day as he paffed through his Realm, defcended by chance into talk of The few and Perithous, how they came to steal away his Daughter secretly, and after told how they were also punished. Hercules was marvellously forry to understand that one of them was now dead, and the other in danger to die; and thought with himfelf that to make his mone vered out of Defaults, it would not help the matter: he belought him only that he would deliver Thefeus for pilon by Htr his fake. And he granted him. Thus Thefeus being delivered of his captivity, returned to ATHENS, and the matter is the belought him only that he would deliver Thefeus to the thing the state of his captivity, returned to ATHENS, and the granted him. where his friends were not alrogether kept under-by his enemies : and at his return he did dedicate to where his rivenes were not an openical kept and arroy in a constant a last in his own honour. And where Hercules all the Temples, which the City had before caused to be built in his own honour. And where first of all they were called The feat, he did now farnamethem all Hercules, excepting four, as Philochorus writeth Now when he was arrived at ATHENS, he would immediately have commanded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found himself troubled much with fedition, because those who had hated him of a long time, had added also to their old cankred hate, a distain and contempt to fear The Athenian him any more. And the common people were now become fo stubborn, that where before they would diffinition to they have done all that they were commanded, and have fpoken nothing to the contrary; now they looked to be born with and flattered. Whereupon Thefens thought at the first to have used force, but he was forced by the faction and contention of his enemies to let all alone; and in the end, defpairing he should ever bring his matters to pass to his desire, he secretly sent away his Children unto the Isle of Eu-BOEA, to Eiphener the Son of Chalcodus. And himself after he had made many withes and curies against the Athenians, in the village of Gargettus, in a place which for that cause to this day is called Araterion, (that is to fay, the place of curlings) he did take the leas, and went into the Isle of Scinos, where he had Lands and Pollettons, and thought allo to have found Friends. Lycomedes reigned at that time, and was King of the Ille, unto whom Thefens made request for fone Land, as intending to dwell there; albeit forme fay that he required him to give him aid against the ATHENIANS. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to enterrain to great a Perforage, or that he did it to gratifie Meinto the Ifle o These crucity all his Country round about: but when he had him there, he threw him down headlong from the top of the Rocks to the bottom, and put him thus unfortunately to death. Yet other write, that he fell down of himfelf by an unfortunate chance, walking one day after supper as he was wont. There was no man King of Athens at that time that did follow or purfue his death, but Menefibe u quietly remained King of ATHENS: and the Children of The few, as private Soldiers followed Elphraor in the Wars of TROIA. But after the death of Menefibeus, who died in the journey to TROY, Thefens Sons returned unto ATHENS, where they recovered their State. Sithence there were many occasions which moved the ATHENI-ANS to reverence and honour him as a demy-god. For in the Battle of Marathon, many thought they faw his shadow and image in arms, fighting against the barbarous people. And after the wars of the Medes (the year wherein Pheden was Governour of ATHENS) the Nun Pithia answered the ATHE NIANS, who had fent to the Oracle of Apollo: that they should bring back the bones of Thefeus, and putting them in fome honourable place, they should preferve and honour them devously. But it was a hard matter to find his grave; and if they had found ir, yet had it been a hard thing to have brought his bones away, for the malice of those barbarous people which inhabited that Isler which were forwild and the like of Scient which is the state of the state of those with the like of Scient which were forwing taken the Island(as we have the like of Scient which were forwing taken the Island(as we have the like of $150 written in his Life) and feeking his grave: perceiving by good hapan Eagle pecking with her beak, and 793, and bring freaping with her claws in a place of fome pretty heighth: ftraight it came into his mind (as by divine inspiration) to search and dig the place, where was found the Tomb of a great body, with the head of a Spear which was of brafs, and a Sword with it. All which things were brought to ATHENS by

Cimon in the Admiral-gally. The ATHENIANS received them with great joy, with processions and goodly Sacrifices, as if Thefeus himfelf had been alive, and had returned into the City again. At this day all these relicks lye yet in the midst of the City, near to the place where the young men do These we Tomb. nse all their exercises of body. There is free liberty of access for all slaves and poor men (that are afflicted and pursued by any mightier than themselves) to pray and sacrifice in remembrance of These who while he lived was protector of the oppreffed, and did courteoully receive their requests and Petitions that prayed to have aid of him. The greatest and most folemn Sacrifice they do unto him. is on the eighth day of October, in which he returned from CRETA with the other young Children of A-THENS. Howbeit they do not leave to honour him every eighth day of all other moneths, either because he arrived from TROEZEN at ATHENS the eighth day of June, as Diodorus the Colinographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meetelf for him, because the bruit ran he was begotten of Meptune. They do facrifice also to Neptune the eighth day of every moneth, because the number of eight is the first cube made of even number, and the double of the first square: which called different doth represent a ftediaftness immoveable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for lists and Gain-this cause we surname Asphalius, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation doth fignifie the lafe keeper and class.

The end of THESEUS Life.

Ann. Mund. 3198.

the stayer of the earth.

HE Historiographers do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for Divers crimiwhat cause the great Name of the City of ROME (the glory whereof is One about the Name of Rome blown abroad through all the world) was first given unto it. For some think that the Pelaigians, after they had overcome the greatest part of the world, and had inhabited and subdued many Nations, in the end did stay themselves in that place where it was new builded; and for their great ftrength and power in arms, they gave the Name of Rome unto the City, as fignifying power in the Greek tongue. Other fay, that after the taking and destruction of TROIA, there were certain TROIANS, which faving themselves from the sword, took such vessels as they found at adventure in the Haven; and were by windes put to the Thus CANE shore, where they anchered near unto the River of Tyber. There their Wives being to fore fea-fick, that possibly they could not any Tybris st. more endure the boifterous furges of the feas, it happened one of them among the rest (the Noblest and wifest of the company) called Roma, to counfel the other Women of her companions, to set their Ships afire; which they did accordingly. Wherewith their Husbands at the first were marvelloully offended. But afterwards, being compelled of necessity to plant themselves near unto the City of Pallantium, they were appealed when they faw things profper better then they hoped for, finding the foil there fertile, and the people their neighbours civil and gentle in entertaining them. Wherefore among other The beginning honours they did to requite this Lady Roma, they called their City after her Name, as from whom came of killing their the original cause of the building and soundation thereof. They say, that from thence came this custom histolle on the continuing yet to this day at ROME, that the Women faluting their Kins olks and Husbands, do kils from the Trethem on the mouth, for fo did thefe TROIA N Ladies to please their Husbands, and to win them again, after they had loft their favours, and procured their displeasures with burning of their ships. Other fay, that Roma was the Daughter of Iralin, and of Lucaria, or elfe of Telephus the Son of Hercules, and Wife of Aneu: other lay, of Afeanius the Son of Aneu, who named the City after her Name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the Son of Oliffes and of Circe) that first founded ROME: other will fay, that it was Romus the Son of Emathion, whom Diamedes fent thither from TROIA. Other write, that it was one Romis a Tyrant of the LATINS, who drave the Thuscans out of flose parts: which departing out of Thessaly, went first of all into Lydia, and afterwards from Lypia into It aly. And furthermore, they who think that Romulus (as indeed it carrieth best likelihood) was he that gave the Name to the City, do not agree about his ancestors. For some of them write, that he was the Son of Aneas, and of Dexistes the Daughter of Phorbus, and that he was Vables of Roredus birth. brought into ITALY of a little Child with his Brother Remus: and that at that time the River of Tyber being overflown, all other Ships were call away, faving the Ship in which the two little Boys were, which by great good hap came to ftay upon a very plain even ground on the bank : and because the Children beyond all hope were faved by this means, therefore the place was afterwards called ROMA. Other fay, that Roma the Daughter of the first Trojan Lady was married unto Latinus the Son of Telemachus, by whom the had Romulus. Other write, that it was Amilia the Daughter of Amau, and of Lavinia, which was begotten with child by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romalus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is faid that there was fometime a King of Alba named Tarchetim, a very wicked and cruel man, in whose house through the permission of the gods, appeared such a like vision: that there rose up in the hearth of his chimney the form and fashion of a mans privy-member, which continued there many days. And they fay, that at that time there was in Thuscane an An Oracle of Oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought unto this wicked King Tarebetius fuch an answer; that he Therefore There of There, from whom they of organization and the state of thould cause his Daughter yet unmarried to have carnal company with the ftrange thing, for she should cause his Daughter yet unmarried to have carnal company with the strange thing, for she should be famous for his valiancy, for strength of body, and his happy success, should be famous for his valiancy, for strength of body, and his happy success, wherein he should exceed all men of his time. Tarchetim told this Oracle unto one of his Daughters, and willed her to entertain this ftrange thing: but fhe diffaining to do it, fent one of her waiting women to undertake the entertainment. But Tarchetius was fo mad at this, that he caused them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddess Vesta appeared to him in his sleep in the night, and charged him he should not do it. Whereupon he did command them to make him a piece of Cloath in the prifon, with promife that they flouid be married when they had finished it. These poor Maids toiled at it all the live long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetiss commandment) that did undo all they had done the day before. In the mean time, this waiting woman that was got with child by this ftrange thing, was delivered of two goodly boys or twins: whom Tarchetiun gave unto one Teratius, with express commandment he should cast them away. This Teratius carried them to the bank of the River: thinker came a fhe-Wolf and gave them fack, and certain Birds that brought little crums and put them in their mouthes, untill a Swineheard perceiving them, and wondring at the fight, did boldly go to the Children, and took them away with him. These lufants being thus preferved, after they were come to mans state, did set upon Tarchettin and sew him. One Promathion an Italian writer, delivereth this ftory thus. But the report that carrieth best credit of all, and is allowed of by many writers, cometh from Diocles Peparethian (whom Fabius Pictor followeth in many things) who was the first that put forththis story among the Grecians, and especially the chiefest points of it. Though this matter be formwhat diversly taken, yet in effect the story is thus. The right line and bloud of the Kings of Alba descended from Aneas, by succession from the Father to the Son : and the Kingdom fell in the end between two Brethren, Nimitor and A-See the frag. mulius. They agreed by Lot to make division between them, whereof the one to have the Kingdom, and the other all the Gold, Silver, ready Money, Goods and Jewells brought from TRO1A. Numitor see and Hall by his Lotchofe the Realm for his portion: Anulius having all the Gold and Treasure in his hands, did find himfelf thereby the ftronger, and fo did eafily take his Realm from him. And fearing left Romalus kin- his Brothers Daughter might have Children which one day might thruff him out again, he made her a Nun of the goddefs Vestas, there to pass her days in virginity, and never to be married: (fone call her Rhea, other Sylvia, and other Ilia) nevertheless not long after the was found Resentar Mo- with child, againft the rule and proteffion of the Veftal Nuns. So nothing had faved her from present death, but the Petition of Antho the Daughter of King Anulius, who entreated her Father for her life : yet notwithftanding fhe was ftraightly locked up, that no body could fee her, nor speak with her, left the should be brought to bed without Amulias knowledge. In the end she was delivered of two fair Boys and marvellous great twins: which made Annulius more afraid than before. So he commanded one of his men to take the two Children, and to throw them away, and deftroy them. Some fay that this fervants Name was Faustulus: other think it was he that brought them up. But whofoever he was, he that had the charge to throw them away, put them in a Trough, and went towards the River with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it rifen fo high, and runing so swiftly, that he durft not come near the waters side, and so they being in the Trough, he laid them on the bank. In the mean time the River swelling still, and overflowing the bank, in such fort that it came under the Trough, did gently list up the Trough, and carried it unto a great plain, called at this prefent Cermanum, and in the old time Germanum (as I take it) because the ROMANS called the Brothers of Father and Mother, Germani. Now there was near unto this Common. place a wild Fig-tree which they called Ruminalis, of the Name of Romulus, as the most part thought: Raminalis.

or elsebecause the beasts seeding there, were wont to come under the same in the extream heat of the day, and there did ruminate, that is, chew their cud in the shadow : or perhaps because that the two Children did fuck the teat of the Wolfe, which the ancient LATINS call RUMA, and they at this day do yet call the goddess on whom they cry out to give their Children suck, Rumilia. The goddess And in their facrifices to her they use no wine, but offer up Milk and Water mingled with Hony. To Rumilja. these two Children lying there in this sort, they write, there came a she-Wolse, and gave them suck, and a Hitwaw also which did help to nourish and keep them : These two beasts are thought to be confecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINS do fingularly honour and reverence the Hitwaw. This did much help to give credit to the words of the Mother, who affirmed she was conceived of those two Children, by the god Mars. Howbeit some think she was deceived in her opinion ; for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforcedid ravish her. Other hold opinion that the Name of the Nurse which gave the two Children suck with her breafts, gave occafion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reason of the double signification thereof. For the LATINS do call with one felf name she-Wolves Lupas, and Women that give their bodies to all comers; as this Nurse the Wife of Faustulus (that brought these Children home to her house) did use to do. By her right Name she was called Acca Laurentia, unto whom the ROMANS do sacrifice yet unto this day : and the Priest of Mars doth offer unto her in the moneth of April, the shed nce yet unto this day. and the Feaft it felf is called Laurentia. It is true that Wife, the they honour also another Laurentia for like occasion. The Clark or Sexton of Hercules Temple, not nursed the they honour alto another Laurentia to the octation, they honour alto another Laurentia to the knowing one day how to drive away the time, as it should seem, of a certain liveliness and boldness, Treins, knowing one day how to give away the time, as it should seem, of a certain liveliness and boldness, Treins, knowing one day how to give a way the time of the did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god Hercules to play at Dice with him, with condition that if he did win, Hercules The Greek did defire the god He fhould be bound to fend him fome good fortune; and if it were his luck to lofe, then he promifed the Hercules he would provide him a very good supper, and would besides bring him a fair Gentlewoman to lye withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearfed, the Sexton first cast the Dice for Hercules, and afterwards for himself. It fell out that Hercules wan, and the Sexton meaning good faith, and thinking it very meet to perform the bargain that himself had made, prepared a good supper, Laurenita and hired this Laurentia the Curtifan, which was very fair, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Feath and hired this Laurentia the Curtifan, which was very fair, but as yet of no great faint to come to he Taurentia. Thus having feafted within the Temple, and prepared a bed ready there, after supper he locked her Curtifan. into the Temple, as if Hercules should have come indeed and lain with her. And it is faid for troth, that Hercules came thither, and commanded her in the morning she should go into the market-place, and falute the first man shemet, and keep him ever for her friend. Which thing she performed, and the first man she met was called Tarrutius, a man of great years, and one that had gathered together Tarrutius. marvellous wealthand riches. He had no children at all, neither was he ever married. He fell acquainted with this Laurentia, and loved her so dearly, that shortly chancing to die, he made her heir of all he had : whereof the disposed afterwards by her last Will and Testament, the best and greatest part unto the people of ROME. Moreover it is reported also, that she now being grown to be famous and of great honour (as thought to be the Lemman of a god) did vanish away suddenly in the felf-same place where the first Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrum; Velabrum; because the Riverbeing overflown, they were often times compelled to pass by boat to go to the market-place, and they called this manner of ferrying over, Velatura. Other fay, that those Tumblers Decade: 110.7. and common Players, which shewed fundry games and pastimes to win the savour of the people, were wont to cover that passage over with canvas clothes and vails, by which they go from the marketplace to the Lifts or shew-place where they run their Horses, beginning their race even at that place; and they call a vail in their tongue Velum. This is the cause why the second Laurentia is honoured at ROME. Faustulus chief Near-heard to Amulius, took up the two Children, and no body knew it, as fome fay; or as others report (the likest to be true) with the privity and knowledge of Numitor Amulius Brother, who fecretly furnished them with money that brought up the two young Children. It is faid also they were both conveighed unto the City of the GABIANS, where they were brought up at school, and taught all other honest things, which they use to teach the Sons and Romulas and Children of good and Nobleman. Further they say, they were Named Remus and Romalus, be-Remus and they were found sucking on the teats of a Wolfe. Now the beauty of their bodies did tion. presently shew, beholding only but their stature and manner of their countenances, of what nature and lineage they were: and as they grew in years, their manly courage encreased marvel loully, so as they became stout and hardy men, insomuch as they were never troubled or astonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romelus had more wit and understanding than his Brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deal with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limits of their Paftures, it was eafily discerned in him, that he was born to command, and not to obey. For this cause they were both exceedingly beloved of their companions, and of those which were their inferiours. As for the Kings Heardimen, they paffed not much for them, faying that they were even like themlelves, and so feemed not to care a pin for their anger or dipleasure, but wholly gave themselves to all gentlemanly exercises and trades, thinking to live idly and at ease without travel, was neither comely nor convenient: but to exercise and harden their bodies with hunting, running, pursuing murderers and theives, and to help those which were oppressed with wrong and violence, should be credit and commendation to them. By reason whereof, in very short time they grew to great fame and renown. And it fell out by chance there arose some strife and variance between the Heardsmen of Amalius, and the Heardsmen of Numitor: insomuch as those that were Numitor's carried away by force some Cattle of the others. The other side would not bear that, but pursued fast after, and beating them well-favouredly, they made them take their legs, and brought back again the greatest part of the Cattle they had carried away with them. Whereat Numitor stormed marvelloufly, but yet his men feemed to make but little account of it, and purposing revenge, they gathered about them a good company of vagabonds (that had neither home nor refting place) and certain fugitive bondmen which they enticed ill-favouredly, encouraging them to steal away from their Masters. Thus one day whilest Romulius was busie about some Sacrifice (being a devout man and religious, and well given to ferve the gods, and to learn to divine and tell beforehand what things should happen and come to pass) it happened the Heardmen of Numitor to meet Remus very flenderly accompanied, fo they fell upon him fuddenly: blows were dealt roundly on both fides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the end proved the stronger part, and took Remus by force, and carried him straight before Numitor alledging many complaints and matters against him. Numitor durst not punish him of his own authority, because he seared his Brother Annlius, who was fomewhat terrible: but went unto him, and earnestly belought him to do him juffice, and not to fuffer him being his own Brother, to receive such injury of his men. There was not a man in the City of ALBA, but did greatly millike the injury done to Numitor: and fpake it openly, that he was no person to be offered such a wrong. Insomuch as Annilius moved herewith, did deliver Remus into his hands, to punish him as he thought good. Whereupon Numisor carried him home with him. But when he had him in his house, he began to consider better of him, with admiration how goodly a young man he was, how in heighth and strength of body he passed all the rest of his people, and perceiving in his face an affured conflancy, and bold fledfarf courage that yeilded not, nor was abafiled for any danger he faw towards him: and hearing also the report of his acts and manhood to be answerable to that he saw: (being chiefly moved in mine opinion, by some secret inspiration of the gods, which ordain the depth of great matters) began partly by conjecture, and partly by chance to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his Father and Mother: fpeaking to him in a more gentle wife, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make the troth from thee, for thou feemest to be more worthy to be King then thy Brother Amelius. For Untill now we thought we had been the Children of two of the Kings fervants, to we are now falfly accused unto thee, and by malicious surmised tales are wrongfully brought in danger of our lives: we intend to discover our selves, and to declare strange things unto thee, whereof the present perill we now stand in, shall plainly prove the troth. Men say that we have been begotten miraculously, fostered and given suck more strangely, and in our tender years were sed by Birds and wild Beafts, to whom we were cast out as a prey. For a Wolfe gave us suck with her teats, and an Hitwaw (they fay) brought us little crums, and put them in our mouths, as we lay upon the bank by the River, where we were put in a Trough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of Copper, upon the which are some Letters engraven half worn out, which peradventure will one day ferve for fome tokens of knowledge (unprofitable for our parents) when it Numitors wif- shall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing these words, with the age the young man feemed to be of, and confidering well his face, did not reject the hope of his imagination that fmiled on him, but handled the matter fo, that he found means to speak secretly with Faullalus care his Daughter, notwithstanding at that time she was kept very straightly. Faulfulus in the mean to fave Remus. time hearing that Remus was prifoner, and that the King had delivered him already into the hands of his Brother Numitor to do juffice, went to pray Romalus to help him, and told him then whose Children they were: for before he'had never opened it to them but in dark speeches, and glauncing wise, and fo much as fufficed to put them in some hope. So Faustulus taking the Trough with him at that time, went unto Numitor in all hafte, as marvelloufly afraid for the prefent danger he thought Remus in. The Kings fouldiers which warded at the gates of the City, began to gather forme fulpicion to Faufti-lus manner of coming: and he made himself to be the more suspected, being questioned with about the cause of his repair thither, that he faultred in his words; besides they espited his Trough which he carried under his cloak. Now amongst the Warders, there was by chance one that was the man to whom the Children were committed to be east away, and was present when they were left on the bank of the river to the mercy of Fortune. This man knew the Trough by and by, as well by the fashion, as by the Letters graven upon it: who mistrusted straight that which was true indeed. So lie did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Faustutus with him to have him confess the troth. Faustulus being in this perplexity, could not keep all close upon examination, but did utter out somewhat of the matter, and he told not all. For he plainly justified the Children were alive: yet he faid they were far from the City of ALBA, where they kept beafts in the fields. And as for the Trough, he was going to carry it to Ilia, because she had divers times prayed him to let her see and seel it: to the end she might be the more assured of her hope, who promised her that one day she should see her Children again. So it chanced unto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth unto those that are troubled, and do any thing in fear or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to fend one presently (who in all other things was a very honest man, but a great friend of his Brother Numitors) to ask him if he had heard any thing that his Daughters Children were alive. This person being come to Numitors house, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witness thereof, and of the good hap discovered unto Numitor; whereupon he perswaded him how to set upon his Brother, and to dispatch the matter with speed. So from that time forward, he took their part. On the other fide also the matter gave them no leisure to defer their enterprise, although they had been willing: for the whole case was somewhat blown abroad. So Romelus then got straight a power, and drew very near the City, and many of the Citizens of ALBA went out to joyn with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (over and beside those Citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were divided by hundreds, and every hundred had his Captain who marched before his Band, carrying little bundles of grass or of boughs tied to the end of their poles. The LATINES call these bundles Manipulos, whereof it cometh that yet at this day in an Army of the ROMANS, the Souldiers which are all under one Enfign, are called Manipulares, Munipulsees So Remus stirring up those that were within the City, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the whereof so Tyrant Amulius fell in such fear and agony, that without providing any thing for his fafety, they called. came upon him suddenly in his Pallace, and slew him. Thus you hear how near Fabius Pictor and Amultus slain; Diocles Peparethian do agree in reciting the story, who was the first (in mine opinion) that wrote the foundation of the City of ROME: howbeit there are that think they are all but fables and tales devifed of pleasure. But methinks for all that, they are not altogether to be rejected or discredited, if we will confider Fortunes strange effects upon times, and of the greatness also of the ROMAN Empire; which had never atchieved to her present possessed power and authority, if the gods had not from the beginning been workers of the same, and if there had not also been some strange cause, and wonderful foundation. Amulius being now flain as before, and after that all things were appealed and reduced to good order again, Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the City of ALBA, being no Lords thereof, nor also would be Lords of it, so long as their Grandfather by the Mother side was alive. Wherefore after they had restored him to his estate, and had done the honour and duty they The building ought unto their Mother, they purposed to go and build a City in those places where they had been of Rome. first brought up, for this was the honestest colour they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peradventure they were enforced fo to do whether they would or not, for the great number of banished men, and fugitive flaves which were gathered together by them for their firength, who had been utterly loft and cast away, if they had been once discharged by them. Therefore it was of necessity that they should dwell by themselves, separated in some place, to keep this number together and in some order. For it is true, that the inhabitants of the City of ALBA would not suffer such banished persons and runagates to be mingled amongst them, nor would receive them into their City to be tree among them. All which appeareth sufficiently: first, because they took away Women by force: and fo not of infolency, but of necessity, when they found no man that would bestow any of them. It is manifest also they did greatly honour and make much of the Women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their City began a little to be fetled, they made a Temple of refuge for all fu- Afilent Tem? gitives and afflicted persons, which they called the Temple of the god Asilaus: where there was ple a Sanctufanctuary and fafety for all forts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the Temple: for any for all hambon is used alledged, they could not deliver any bondman to his Matter, nor Delvoy to his Credition, milled perform lanctuary and latery for all oris or people that repaired thinks, and collection to his Creditor, nilhed perform whom it was alledged, they could not deliver any bondman to his Mafter, nor Debtor to his Creditor, nilhed performs whom it was alledged, they could not deliver any bondman to his Mafter, nor Debtor to his Creditor, and figures. nor the murtherer to the Justice, that was fled thither for succour, because the Oracle of Apollo the Delphian, had expresly enjoyeed them to grant fanctuary to all those that would come thither for it. So by this means in short space their City slourished, and was replenished: where at the first foundation of it, they say there was not above One thousand Houses, as more at large hereaster shall be declared. When they came now to the building of their City, Romulus and Remus the two bre-Strife between thren fell suddenly at strife together about the place where the City should be builded. Remus his Brother chose another place very strong of situation, upon Mount Remonstrum. Aventine, which was called after his name Remonium, and now is called Rignarium. Notwithstanding in the end they agreed between themselves, this controversie should be decided by the flying of Birds, which do give a happy divination of things to come. So being fet in divers places by themselves to make observation, some say that there appeared unto Remus six, and to Romulus twelve Vultures. Others fay that Remus truly faw fix, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he faw twice as many: but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelve indeed unto Romulus: and this is the cause why the ROMANS at this day in their divinations and soothsayings of the flying of Birds, do marvelloully observe the flying of the Vulturs. It is true which the Historiogra- The Romans pher Herodotus Ponticus writeth; that Hercules rejoyced much when there appeared a Vulture to observe the him, being ready to begin any enterprise. For it is the fowl of the world that doth least hurt, and flying of Vulnever marreth nor destroyeth any thing that man doth fow plant or fet, considering that she feedeth on carrion only, and doth never hurt nor kill any living thing. Also she doth not prey upon dead fowl, for the likeness that is between them: where the Eagles, the Dukes and the Sakers, do murther, kill, and earthofe which are of their own kind. And yet as Afchylus faith,

The Prognosticators also think, that fuch things which are not ordinary, and but feldom feen, be not natural, but miraculously fent by the gods to prognofticate fomething. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had cast a ditch, as it were for the wall about his City, Remus did not onely fcorn it, but hindred also his work, and in the end for a mockery leapt over Remus flain by his Wall. To conclude, he did for much, that at the laft he was flain there by Romulus own hands, as fome fay: or as other hold opinion, by one of his men, which was called Celer. In this Fight they flew Faustulus, and Plistinus also his brother, who had holpen him to bring up Romulus. How-Soever the matter sell out, this Celer absented himself from Rome, and went into the Countrey of Romulus or THUSCANE. And they say, that men which are quick and ready upon a fodden, took their names Celens, where- ever after of him, and were called Celeres. As amongst others, Quintus Metellus after the death of Centres, where-Gladiatores) fighting at the sharp, they surnamed him Celer, for that the ROMANS marvelled how he could prepare his things in lo short a time. Furthermore, Romulus having now buried his Brother, and his other two bringers up (called foster fathers) in the place they call Remonia, began then to build and lay the foundation of his City, fending for men out of THOSCANE, who did name and teach him particularly all the Ceremonies he had to observe there, according to their Laws and Ordinances, as a great holy Mystery. And first of all they made a round Dirch in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did cast their chiefest and best things, which men use lawfully for good, and naturally as most necessary. After that they did throw also into it, a little of the Earth, from whence every man came, and mingled these all together. This Ditch in their Ceremonies is called the World, in Latine Mundus, even the felf-fame name the Latines call the Univerfal. About this Dirch they did trace the compass of the City they would build, even as one would The World. draw a circle about a center. This done, the Founder of the City taketh a Plough, to which he faftneth a Culter or Plough-share of brass, and so yoaked in the Plough an Ox and a Cow, he himself holding the Plough, did make round about the compass of the City a deep Furrow. Those which followed him, had the charge to throw the Turves of Earth inward into the City, which the Ploughfhare raised up, and not to leave any of them turned outward. The Furrow thus cast up was the whole compals of their Wall, which they call in Latine Pomarium, by shortning of the Syllables, for post murum, to wit, after Wall. But in the place where they determined to make a Gate, they did take off the Plough-share, and draw the Plough, with leaving a certain place unbroken up: whereupon the ROMANS think all the compals of their Walls holy and facred, except their Gates. why fo called. For if their Gates had been hallowed and fanctified, they would have had a conscience through them to have brought in, or carried out of the City, any things necessary for the life of man, that The Walls The Feaft day had not been pure and clean. Now they believe certainly, that this Ceremony of the Foundation of of Romer four-their City was made the one and twentieth of April: because the Romans do yet keep that day dation the 21 holy day, and call it the Feaft of the Nativity of their Countrey. On which day they did not in old time facrifice any thing that had life, as efteeming that day (which was the Nativity of their City) to be most meet to be kept clean and pure from being polluted or defiled with any blood. Notwithof April. standing before Rome was builded they had another Feast, called the Shepheards or Heards-mens Holy-day, which they did celebrate upon the fame day, and called it Palilia. Now at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMANS is clean contrary to the GRECIANS: yet for all this, they hold opinion for certainty, that the day on which Romulus founded his City, was affu-The Feast redly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada, that is to fay, the thirtieth day. that he had founded his City, he first and foremon did divide in two companies all those that were of The Roman age to carry Armour. In every one of these Companies there were three thousand Footmen, and Legion 3000 three hundred Horsemen: and they were called Legions, because they were forted of the chosen Horsemen. men that were picked out amongst all the rest for to fight. The remain after these was called Populiss, Romains initia which fignifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred Counsellors of the best and honestest turath a Commen of the City, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called momentality men of the City, which the cancer ratherms, as one would fay, the Councel of the Ancients. So they were called Patricians, as fome tricing and will fay, the Councel of the Fathers lawful children, which few of the first Inhabitants could show. Sanators to It may be, some will say this name was given them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the Sanctuary of their City, which word they use at this day in the self-same signification: as one that followed Evander into ITALY, was called Patron, because he was pitiful, and relieved the poor and little children, and fo got himself a name for his pity and humanity. But methinks it were more like the troth to fay, that Romulus did call them fo, because he thought the chierest men should have a fatherly care of the meaner fort : considering also it was to teach the meaner fort, that they should not fear the authority of the greater, nor envy at the honours they had, but rather in all their causes should use their favour and good will, by taking them as their Fathers. For even at this present, strangers call those of the Senate, Lords or Captains: but the natural ROMANS call them, Patres Conferenti, which is a name of Father-head and Dignity without envy. Patres that It is true, that at the beginning they were onely called Patres, but fithence, because they were many friend joyned unto the first, they have been named Patres Conscripti, as a man should say. Fathers of record together: which is the honourablest Name he could have devised to make a difference betwise the Senators and the People. Furthermore, he made a difference between the chiefer Citizens, and the bafer People, by calling the better fort Patroni, as much to fay, as Defenders: and the meaner Patroni, C. fort Clientes, as you would fay, Followers, or men protected. This did breed marvellous great love control. and good will among them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutual courtefies and pleasures : for the Patrons did help the Clients to their Right, defended their Causes in judgment, gave unto them counsel, and did take all their matters in hand. The Clients again enterchangeably humbled themselves to their Patrons, not onely in outward honour and reverence towards them, but otherwise did help them with money to marry and advance their daughters, or else to pay their Debts and Credit, if they were poor or decayed. There was no Law nor Magistrate that could compell the Patron to be a Witness against his Client : nor yet the Client to Witness against his Patron. So they increased and continued all other Rights and Offices of amity and friendfhip together, faving afterwards they thought it a great fhame and reproach for the better and richer, The shame of to take reward of the meaner and poorer. And thus of this matter we have spoken sufficiently, the Romans to Moreover, four moneths after the foundation of the City was laid, Fabius writeth, there was a great take gifts of ravishment of women. There are some which lay it upon Romulus, who being then of nature war-poor men. like, and given to Prophecies and Answers of the gods, foretold that his City should become very great and mighty, to as he raifed it by Wars, and encreased it by Arms: and he sought out this co-Tour to do milchief, and to make War upon the SABYNS. To prove this true, some say he caused lour to do milchief, and to make War upon the SABYNS. 10 prove this true, folie by the cantel the ravifle-certain of their Maids by force to be taken away, but not past thirty in number, as one that rather ment of the ment of the fought cause of Wars, then did it for need of Marriages: which methinks was not likely to be true; Sabyne wo but rather I judge the contrary. For feeing his City was incontinently replenished with people of men. all forts, whereof there were very few that had Wives, and that they were men gathered out of all Countries, and the most part of them poor and needy, so as their neighbours distained them much, and did not look they would long dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their Maids and ravishing them, to have an entry into alliance with the SABYNS, and to entice them further to join with them in Marriage, if they did gently entreat these Wivesthey had gotten, enterprized this violent taking of their Maids, and ravishing of them in such fort. First, he made it to be commonly bruted abroad in every place, that he had found the Altar of a god hidden in the ground, about the raand he called the name of the god, Confus: either because he was god of Counsel; whereupon the vishment of ROMANS at this day in their Tongue call Confilium, which we call Counsel : and the chief Magi- the Sabyus ftrates of their City Confules, as we fay Counsellors. Other fay, it was the Altar of the god Nep- Daughters, tune, furnamed the Patron of Horses. For this Altar is yet at this day within the great Lifts of the Neptune the City, and ever covered and hidden, but when they use the running Games of their Horse-race. O- god of horsether fay, because Counsel ever must be kept close and secret, they had good reason to keep that Al- men. tar of this god Confus hidden in the ground. Now other write, when it was opened, Romulus made a Sacrifice of wonderful joy, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in divers places, that at such a day there should be common Plays at ROME and a solemn Feast kept of the god Confiu, where all that were disposed to come should be welcome. Great numbers of People repaired thither from all parts. He himfelf was fet in the chiefest Seat of the Show-place, apparelled fair in Purple, and accompanied with the chief of the City about him. And there having purposed this Ravishment you have heard of, he had given the fign before : that the same should begin, when he should rife up The execution and fold a pleight of his Gown, and unfold the same again. Hereupon his men stood attending with of the Ravishtheir Swords: who fo foon as they perceived the fign was given, with their Swords drawn in hand, The number of and with great shouts and cries, ran violently on the Maids and Daughters of the SABYNS to take the Sabyne them away and ravish them; and suffered the men to run away, without doing them any hurt or women ravish violence. So fome fay, there were but thirty ravished, after whose names were called the thirty ed.

Sextilis, Auguft. Platarch in his Proble. Confuelit. The Sairns what they were.

The number of Lineages of the People of Rome. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that there were five hundred and feven and twenty: and Tuba, fix hundred fourfcore and three. In the which is fingularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he himself did take then but onely one of the Maids, named Hersilia: that afterwards was the onely cause and mediation of peace betwixt the Romanus Wife. SABYNS and the ROMANS. Which argueth plainly, that it was not to do the SABYNS any hurt, nor to fatisfie any difordinate luft, that they had fo forcibly undertaken this ravishment : but to join two Peoples together, with the straightest bonds that could be between men. This Herstlia as some say, was married unto one Hostilius, the noblest man at that time amongst the ROMANS: or as others write, unto Romulus himfelf, which had two Children by her. The first was a Daughter, and her name was Prima, because she was the first : the other was a Son, whom he named Aollins, because of the multitude of People he had affembled together in his City, and afterwards he was furnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodorus the TROEZENIAN writeth; wherein not withfranding called Addiss there be divers that do contrary him. Among those which ravished the Daughters of the SABYNS, it is faid there were found certain mean men carrying away a marvellous passing fair one. These met by chance on the way certain of the chief of the City, who would have taken her by force from them; which they had done, but that they began to cry, they carried her unto Talassius, who was a young man marvellously well beloved of every body. Which when the other underflood, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: infomuch as there were fome which fuddenly turned back again, and did accompany them for Talassius sake, crying out aloud, and often on his The cause why name. From whence the custom came, which to this day the ROMANS sing at their Marriages, the Rossias do Taluffins, like as the GRECIAN: fing Hymeneus. For it is faid he was counted very happy that fing the Name he met with this Woman. But Sextius Sylla, a CARTHAGINIAN born, a man very wife, and well learned, told me once it was the cry and fign which Romulus gave to his men to begin the Ravishment: whereupon those that carried them away went crying this word Talassius, and that from thence the Custom had continued, that they fing it yet at their Marriages. Nevertheless the most part of Authors, specially Juba, thinks it is a warning to remember the new-married-women of their work, which is to fpin, which the GRECIANS call Talassia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greek. And if it be true the ROMAN's used this term of Ta-Liffin, as we of GREECE do use, we might by conjecture yield another reason for it, which should carry a better likelihood and proof. For when the SABYNS after the Battle had made peace with the ROMANS, they put in an Article in favour of the Women in the Treaty, that they should not be bound to ferve their Husbands in any other work but in spinning of Wool. Ever fince this Custom hath grown, that those which give their Daughters in Marriage, and those who lead the Bride, and such as are present at the Wedding, speak in sport to the new married Wise, laughing, Talaffius: in tokenthat they do not lead the Bride for any other work or service, but to spin Wool. Thereof this hath been the use to this day, that the Bride doth not of her self come over the threshold of her Husbands door, but she is holfed prettily into the House: because the SABYNE women at that time were fo lift up, and carried away by force. They fay also, that the manner of making the shed of the new wedded Wives hair, with the Iron head of a Javelin, came up then likewife: this Story being a manifest token that these first Marriages were made by force of Arms, and as it were at the Swords point : as we have written more at large in the Book, wherein we render and shew the causes of the ROMANS Fashions and Customs. This Ravishment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the Moneth called Sextilis, and now named August: on which day they yet celebrate the Feaft they call Confualia. Now the SABYNS were good men of War, and had great numbers of People, but they dwelt in Villages, and not within enclosed Walls: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did fear nothing, and as those who were descended from the LACE-DAMONIANS. Nevertheless they seeing themselves bound and tied to peace by Pledges and Hostages, that were very near allied unto them, and searing their daughters should be ill intreated, sent Ambassadors to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers and perswasions, that their Daughters might be delivered unto them again, without any force or violence, and then afterwards, that he would cause them to be asked in Marriage of their Parents, as both Reason and Law would require, to the end that with good will and confent of all Parties, both Peoples might contract Amity and Alliance together. Whereunto Romulus made answer, he could not restore the Maids which his People had taken away and married : but most friendly he prayed the SABYNS to be contented with their Alliance. This answer being returned, and not liked, whilst the Princes and Commonalty of the Acron ling of SABYNS were occupied in confultation, and about the arming of themselves: Acron King of the the Contactor Centnesses (a man exceeding couragious and skilful in Wars, and one that from the beginmileth War ning miftrufted the over-hold and flour Enterprizes that Romains was likely to attempt) confidering with Romains. the late Ravishment of the SABYNS Daughters, and how he was already greatly dreaded of his Neighbours, and somewhat untolerable, if he were not chastisfed and brought lower, first began to invade him with a puiffant Army, and to make hot and violent Wars upon him. Romulus on the other fide prepared also, and went forth to meet him. When they were come so near together, that they might fee one another, they fent defiance to each other, and prayed that they two might fight man to man amidst their Armies, and neither of theirs to stir a foot. Both of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his Prayerunto Jupiter, did promise and make a Vow: That if he did A rea thin in give him the victory to overcome, he would offer up to him the Armour of his Enemy, which he did. For first he slew Acron in the Field, and afterwards gave Battle to his men, and overthrew them also. Lastly he took his City, where he did no hurt nor yet displeasure to any, saving that he commanded them to pull down their Houses, and destroy them, and to go dwell with han at ROME: where they should have the felf-same Rights and Priviledges which the first Inhabitants did enjoy. There was nothing more inlarged the City of ROME then this manner of policy, to join always unto it those she had overcome and vanquished. Romulus now to discharge his Vow, and in fuch fort that his offering might be acceptable to Jupiter, and pleasant to his Citizens to behold, did cut down a goodly straight grown young Oak, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his Camp did lie: the fame he trimmed and fet forth after the manner of victory, hanging and tying all about it in fair order, the Armour and Weapons of King Acron. Then he girding Regulation his Gown to him, and putting upon his long buth of hair a Garland of Lawrel, laid the young unith Oak upon his right shoulder, and he first marched before towards his City, and sung a royal Song of Victory, all his Army following him in Arms unto the City in order of battle: where his Citizens received him in all passing wife and triumph. This noble and stately entry ever since hath given them. The beginning minds in fuch fort, and in statelier wife to make their triumph. The offering of this Triumph was de- of triumph. dicated to Jupiter furnamed Feretrian : because the Latine word Ferire fignifieth to hurt and kill : and the Prayer Romulus had made, was, he might hurt and kill his Enemy. Such Spoils are called trian in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore faith Varro, that opes fignific riches. Howbeit methinks it were Spolia opima: more likely to fay, that they were so named of this word opus, which betokeneth a deed, because he must needs be the chief of the Army, that hath slain with his own hands the General of his Enemics, and that must offer the Spoils called Spolia opima, as you would say, his principal Spoils and Deeds. This never happened yet but to three Roman Captains onely : of the which Romulus was the first, who flew Acron King of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Coffus was the fecond, who killed To- Three Romans lumnius, the General of the Thus cans. Clodius Marcellus was the third, who flew Britomar- only obtained tus, King of the GAULES, with his own hands. And for the two last, Coffus and Marcellus, they footla opinal. made their entry into the City, carrying their Triumphs upon Chariots triumphant: but Romulus did not fo. Therefore in this point Dionysius the Historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into Rome upon a Chariot triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the son of Ben Tarquinius maratus, who first did set out Triumphs in so stately and magnificent show. Other hold opinion it Priscusthe first was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that ever entred upon triumphant Chariot. Concerning that triumph-Romulus, his Statues are yet to be feen in Rome, carrying his Triumph afoot. So they fought a Battle, in which they took the overthrow: Fidena, Cruand left their Cities to the spoil of Romulus, their Lands to be given where he thought good, and stumerium, and and ten titel Charles to the John E. Romalus then did give their Lands among his Citizens, except of Antemas, those Lands which did belong to the Fathers of the Maidens that they had taken away and ravished. Romalus. For he was contented that the Fathers of them thould keep still their Lands. By and by the other The Sabras led SABYNS stomaching thereat, did chuse them a General called Tatins, and so went with a puissant by Tatins, went Army toward the City of Rome, whereunto to approach at that time it was very hard, the Castle to befrege the Army toward the City of Rome, whereant to approach a that the Rome, within which there was City of Rome, or Keep of their City being feated where at this day the Capitol standeth, within which there was City of Rome. a great Garrison, whereof Tarpeius was Captain, and not his Daughter Tarpeia, as some will say, trayeth the who fet out Romulus as a fool. But Tarpeia the Captains Daughter, for the defire she had to have Cattle, and all the gold Bracelets which they did wear about their arms, fold the Fort to the SABYNS, and letteth in the asked for reward of her Treason, all they did wear on their left arms. Tatius promised them unto Salyns her: and the opened them a Gate in the night, by the which the did let all the SABY NS into the Caffle. Antigonus then was not alone, who faid, He loved those which did berray, and hated them Antigonus and that had betrayed; nor yet Cafar Augustus, who told Rymitalces the THRACIAN, That he Augustus Caloved Treason, but he hated Traytors. And it is a common affection which we bear to wicked perfons, whilft we frand in need of them: not unlike for all the world to those that have need of the Aft findlinde gawl and poyfon of venemous Beafts. For when they find it, they are glad, and take it to serve their turn; but after their turn is ferved, and they have that they fought, they hate the cruelty of fuch Beafts. So played Taring at that time. For when he was gotten into the Caftle, he commanded the SABKINS (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not stick to give her all they wear on their left arms, and to do as he did: who taking from his own arm first, the Bracelets which he wore, did cast it to her, and his Target after : and so did all the rest in Note the relike forth informuch as being borne down to the ground by the weight of Bracelets and Targets, the ward of Treadied as pressed to death under her burden. And the Poet Simylus also doth dote most, who faith Tarpeia fold the Capitol not to the Sarras, but to the King of Gaures, with whom the was in love, as in these Verses doth

And a little after, in speaking of the manner of her death, he saith also: Yet lo : the Gaules, those worthy men of might, Threw her not down into the waves of Po, But from their Arms, wherewith they wont to fight, They cast their Shields upon her body so, That the Supprest with Such an heavy weight, (Ah wofull Maid) to death was fmother'd straight.

This Maiden therefore being buried in the same place; the whole Hill was called afterwards Tarpeim after her name, which continued untill Tarquinim the King did dedicate all the place to Jupiter: for then they carried her bones into fome other place, and fo it loft her name. Unless it be that rock of the Capitol, which at this present time they call Rupes Tarpeia, from the top whereof they were wont in old time to throw down headlong all wicked Offenders. When the SABYNS now had gotten this hold, Romalus being exceeding wroth, fent them a defiance, and bad them Battle if they durst. Tatim straight refused not, considering if by mischance they were diffressed, they had a fure refuge to retire unto. The place between the two Armies where the Fight should be, was all round about environed with little hills. So as it was plain, the Fight could not be but sharp and dangerous, for the discommodiousness of the place, where was neither ground for any to fly, nor yet the ngitt or twist Romalus any space for any long chace, it was of so small a compass. Now it fortuned by chance, the River of Tyber had overflown the banks a few days before, and there remained in it a deeper mud than men would have judged, because the ground was so plain, and was even where the great Marketplace of ROME standeth at this day. They could discern nothing thereof by the eye, because the upper part of it was crufted, whereby it was the more ready for them to venture upon, and the worfe to get out, for that it did fink underneath. So the SABYNS had gone upon it, had not Curtius danger been, which by good fortune flayed them. He was one of the nobleft and valiantest men of the SABYNS, who being mounted upon a Courler, went on a good way before the Army. This Courfer entring upon the crufted mud, and finking withall, began to plunge and ftruggle in the mire: whereat Cartius proved a while with the spur to stir him, and get him out, but in the end seeing it would not be, he left his back, and faved himself. The same very place to this day is called after his name, Lacin Curtins. The SABYNS then scaping thus this danger, began the Battle. The Fight did grow very cruel, and endured to great a while, the Victory leaning no more to the one Curtius Lake. fide than to the other. There died in a small space a great number of men, amongst whom Hossilius was one, who as they say, was the Husband of Hersilia, and Grandsather to Hossilius that was King . The Sabyns give battle to of the ROMANS after Numa Pompilim. Afterward there were (as we may think) many other Encounters and Battles between them . howbeit they make mention of the last above all the rest, where-Hoftilius flain. in Romalus had so fore a blow on his head with a ftone, that he was almost felled to the ground, insomuch as he was driven to retire a little out of the Battle. Upon which occasion the ROMANS gave back also, and drew towards Mount Palatine, being driven out of the Plane by force. Romulus began now to recover of the blow he had received, and fo returned to give a new onfer, and cryed out all he might to his Soldiers to tarry, and shew their face again to their Enemy. But for all his loud crying, they left not flying still for life, and there was not one that durst return again. Whereupon Romulus lifting up his hands straight to Heaven, did most fervently pray unto Jupiter, that it would please him to flay the flying of his People, and not duffer the ROMANS Glory thus to fall to their utter destruction, but to repair it by his savour again. He had no sooner ended his Prayer, but divers of his men that fled, began to be afhamed to By before their King, and a fudden boldness came upon them, and their fear therewithall vanished away. The place they furt stayed in, was where as gathering themselves together again, they repulsed the SABYNS even to the place they call now Regia, and unto the Temple of the Goddels Vefta: where both the Battles being prepared to give a new Charge, there did fall out before them a strange and incredible thing to see, which stayed them that they fought not. For of the SABYNE Women whom the Romains had ravished; fome ran of the one fide, other of the other fide of the Battles, with Lamentations, Gryes, and Shouts, stepping between their Weapons, and among the slain Bodies on the ground, in such fort that they feemed out of their wits, and carried as it were with fome Spirits... In this manner they went to find out their Fathers and their Husbands, some carrying their suckling Babes in their arms, other having their hair loofe about their eyes, and all of them calling, now upon the SABYNS, now upon the ROMANS, with the gentleft names that could be devifed: which did melt the hearts of both Parties in fuch fort, that they gave back a little, and made them place between both the Battles. Then were the Cryes and Lamentations of every one plainly heard. There was not a man there but it pitied him, as well to fee them in that pitiful cafe, as to hear the lamentable words they spake adding to their most humble Petitions and Requests that could be anyway imagined, palling wife Perswasions and Reasons to induce them to a Peace. For what offence (say they) or

For then you came not to our rescue when we were Virgins untouched, nor to recous from you. For them when they wickedly affaulted us, poor fouls but now ye came to take the Wivefrom their Husbands, and the Mothers from their little Children. So as the help ye think to give us now doth grieve us more, then the forfaking of us was forrowfull to us then. Such is the love they have born unto us, and fuch is the kindness we bear again to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other caufe then for us, yet were it reason ye should let fall your Armes for our sakes (by whom you are made Grandfathers and fathers-in-law, Coufins and Brothers-in-law) even from those against whom you now bend your force. But if all this war began for us, we heartily befeech you then that you will receive us with your Sons-in-law, and your Sons by them, and that you will reftore unto us our Fathers, our Brethren, our Kinsfolks and Friends, without spoyling us of our Husbands, of our Children, and of our joyes, and thereby make us woful Captives and Prifoners in our minds. These requests and perswasions by Herfilia, and other the SABYN Women being heard, both the Armies stayed, and held every body his hand, and straight the two Generals imparled together. During which parle they brought their Husbands and their Children, to their Roundes and Fathers and their Brethren. They brought meat and drink for them that would eat. They dreffed Tativa imparts up the wounds of them that were hurt. They carried them home with them to their Houses together. They shewed them how they were Mistresses there with their husbands. They made them see how greatly they were accounted of and efterned; yea how with a Wedlock-love and reputation they were honoured. So in the end peace was concluded between them, wherein it was articled. That Peace between were honoured. So in the end peace was concluded octween them, wherein it was article a track the Roman the Sabyn women which would remain with their husbands should tarry fill, and be exempted and the Sabyn the Saby the SABYN women which work or fervice (as above recited) fave only fpinning of Wool. And that the SABYNS gairties, why and ROMANS should dwell together in the City, which should be called ROME, after Romains to called name: and the Inhabitants should be called Quirites, after the name of the City of Tatius King of the SABYNS, and that they should reign and govern together by a common consent. The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this day Comitium: because that Coire, in the La-Comitium. tine Tongue fignifieth to affemble. So the City being augmented by the one half, they did chufe of the SABYNS another hundred new PATRICIANS, unto the first hundred of the ROMANS that were cholen before. Then were the Legions made of 6000 Footmen, and 600 Horlemen. After they The Roman divided their Inhabitants into three Tribes, whereof those that came of Romalus, were called Ram-Legion 6000 Legion Good nenfis after his name: those that came of Tation were called Tationfes after his name: and those that Foomen, and were of the third flock, were called Lucrenfes, as from the Latine word Lucin, called with us a Grove 600 Hortewere of the third stock, were caused Lincremies, as it out the Launic world Links, cance with the afterwards were men. in English, because thickness great number of people of all forts did gather, which afterwards were The Romans made Citizens of ROME. The very word of Tribus (which fignifiesh bands, wards, or hundreds) Tribus. doth witness this beginning of ROME from Wards or Hundreds. For hereupon the ROMANS call those at this day, their Tribune, which are the chief heads of the people. But every one of these principall Wards had afterwards ten other paron ar. Wards under them, which some think were called after the names of the thirty SABYN women that were ravished : but that seemeth false , because many of them carry, the names of the places they came from. Howbeit at that time many Honour given things were stablished and ordained in honour of the women: as to give them place, the upper hand to women. in meeting them : the upper hand in streets: to speak no foul or dishonest word before them, no man to unwray himself, or shew naked before them; that they should not be called before criminal Judges fitting upon Homicides and murderers: that their children should wear about their necks a kind of Jewell, called Bulla, fashioned in manner like these water bubbles that rise upon the water when it beginneth to rain: and that their Gowns should be garded with Purple. Now the two Kings did not flyaight confer together to foon as any occasion of business was offered them, but either of them did first counsell alone with his hundred Senators, and afterwards they did all affemble together. Taim dwelt in the place where now is the Temple of Juno Moneta: Romalus in the place Taim and Rocalled at this prefent, The stairs of the fair bank then, The descent of Mount Palatine, as they mutat palaces. go to the Show place or great Lifts, where they fay was fometime the holy Cornell-tree, whereof they make fo great account. Romalus one day defirous to prove his ftrength, threw (as it is faid) The holy a dart from Mount Aventine toward Mount Palatine; the staff whereof was of a Cornell-tree; and Comell-tree, the Iron of it entred to deep into the ground, being a lufty fat foyl, that no man could pull it out, although many proved it, and did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth Trees, did so nourish the end of this staff, that it took root, and began to spread branches: fo that in time it became a fair great Cornell-tree, which the Successors of Romaius did inclose with a wall, and did keep and worship it as a very holy thing. If by chance any went to see it, and found it looked not fresh and green, but like a Tree withered and dried away for lack of moysture: he went away straight as one asraid, crying to all he met (and they with him went crying still) in every place, Water, water, as it had been to have quenched a fire. Then ran they thither out of all Quarters with Veffels of water, to water and moift the Tree. In the time of Caim Cafar, who caused the stairs about it to be repaired, they say the Labourers raising the place,

Now the SABYNS received the Moneths after the manner of the fed the Romans ROMANS, whereof we have written sufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus again used the Sa-BYNS shields: and both he and his people changed the fashion of their Armour and Weapons they used. For the ROMANS before did carry little Shields, after the fashion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their Holy-dayes and Sacrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them , which either the one or the other people observed before , but they added thereunto Fealts, Matro- fome other new. As that which they call Matronalia, which was inflitted in honour of the Woreans, outers men, because by their means peace was concluded. And that also of Carmentalia, in the honour natia, Carmenta of Carmenta, whom some suppose to be the Goddels of Fate or Destiny : because she hath rule and power over the Nativities of men : by reason whereof the mothers call upon her often, and reverence her very much. Other fay, she was the wife of Evander the ARCADIAN, who being a Prophetels inspired by the god Phabus, gave the Oracles in Verse; whereupon she was surnamed Carminia, because that Carminain Latine fignifieth Verses: for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicofrata. Howbeit there are some which give another manner of derivation and interpretation of this word Carmenta, which is the likelier to be true : as if they would fay, Carens mente; which fignifieth wanting wit, for the very fury that taketh them when they are inspired with the propheticall spirit. For in Latin Carere betokeneth to lack : and Mens signifieth wit. As for the Feast of Palilia, we have told of it before: but the Feast of Lupercalia, confidering the time of celebrating thereof, it feemeth it is ordained for a purification. For it is celebrated on the unfortunate days of the Moneth of February, which are called the purging days. The days in the old time on which they did celebrate the fame, were called Februata. But the proper name of the Feaft, is as much to fay, as the Feafts of Wolves. Wherefore it feemeth to be a Feaft of great antiquity, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Ewander: albeit the name of Wolves is as common to the females, as the males, and so it might perhaps be called, by reason of the Wolf that brought up Romulus. For we fee those which run up and down the City that day, and they call Luberci, do begin their course in the very place where they say Romulus was cast out. Howbert, many things are done, whereof the original cause were hard now to be conjectured. For Goats about a certain time of the year, are killed; then they bring two young boyes, Noble-mens fons, whose foreheads they touch with the knife beblouded with the bloud of the Goats that are facrificed. By and by they dry their foreheads with wooll dipped in milk. Then the young boys must laugh immediately after they have dried their foreheads. That done, they cut the Goats skins, and make thongs of them, which they take in their hands, and run with them all about the City stark naked (faving they have a cloth before their fecrets) and so they ftrike with these thongs all they meet in their way. The young wives never shun them at all, but are well contented to be striken with them, believing it helpeth them to be with child, and also to be easily delivered. There is another thing yet in this and do facrifice Feast, that these Lupercians which run about the City, do also facrifice a dog. Concerning this Feaft, the Poet named But as doth write somewhat in his Elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond Customs and Ceremonies of the Romans, he doth fay, that Romulus after that he had flain Amulius, did run straight with great joy to the very place where the wolf gave him and half dimension in the first fuck, in memory of which running, he faith this Feaft of Lupercalia was celebrated: and that the Noblemens younger fons do run throcy the City, striking and laying on them that they meet in their way with their Goat-thongs, in token that Remus and Romuliu ran from ALBA unto that place, with their drawn fwords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a bloody knife, is in remembrance of the danger they flood in at that time to have been flain. Last of all, the drying of their foreheads with wooll, dipped in milk, is in memory of the milk they sucked of the Wolves. But Caim Acilim writeth that Remm and Romalm before Rome was built, did happen to lose their beafts on a day, and after they had made certain Prayers unto Faunus for the finding of them, they ran here and there flark naked as they went a feeking of them. for fear they should have been troubled with overmuch hear and sweating. And this is the cause he saith, why the LUPERCIANS do at this day run about naked. And if it be true, they make this Sacrifice for a purging, a man might fay they might offer up a dog for that purpole, as the GRE-CIANS in their Sacrifices of purgation, do use to carry out all their dogs. And in many places they do observe this Ceremony, to drive out the dogs, which they call Periscylacismes. Otherwise, if it be of a thankfulnels to the Wolf that gave Romalus luck, and faved him from perishing, that the ROMANS do folemnize this Feast: it is not impertinent they should facrifice a dog, because he is an enemy to the Wolves. Unless a man would fay, it was to punish this beast which troubleth and letteth the Lupercians when they run. Some fay also it was Romulus, who first instituted it a Religion to keep holy fire, and that first ordained holy Virgins, which are called Vestales : other do ascribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithstanding it is most certain otherwise, that Romelus was a very devout Nuns and ho- man, and greatly skilfull in telling of things to come by the flying of birds, for which cause he did orly fire inflitudinarily carry the Augurs crooked staff, called in Latin Litum. It is a rod crooked at the end, wherewith the Augurs or Soothfayers when they fit down to behold the flying of birds do point out & mark the quarters of the Heaven. They carefully kept it within the palace: howbeit it was loft in the time of wars with the GAULES, when the City of ROME was taken. Afterwards when these barbarous people were chased & driven out, it was found again (as it is faid) all whole, within a great hill or heap of ashes, having no manner of hurr, where all things elfe about it had been confumed and marred with the fire.

He is faid to have made certain Laws, among which there is one that feemeth fomewhat hard, Romalus laws which is: that the man is fuffered to put away his wife, and in some case to give her nothing: and like liberty is not given to the wife to put away her Husband. As if the may be proved to have confented to the poyloning of her children, or to have counterfeited her husbands keyes, or to have committed adultery. But if he put her away for any other cause, then the one half of the Goods is adjudged to the wife, and the other moity to the Goddes Ceres: and he that putteth away his wife after this fort, is commanded further to facrifice to the Goddels of the Earth. This also was notable in Rom lus, who having ordained no pain nor punishment for Parricides (that is, for those that kill their Parents) called yet all murther Parricide, to fhew how deteftable that murther was; and as for their Parents) cancer yet at the participation of Parriciae, ne thought a diversity of the World. Romnlus caused the body of Tatius to be straight taken up, and buried him very honourably in Mount AVENTINE, about the place now called ARMILUSTRIUM. Further he Armitustrium. never shewed any countenance to revenge his death. There are some Historiographers that write, that those of the City of LAURENTUM being affraid at this murder, did deliver forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the Ambassodors. He notwithstanding did let them go again, saying: One murther was requited by another. This gave some occasion of speech to think, he was glad he was murther was required by another the Sabyns neither stirred nor rebelled for all this, but some of them bedience to were afraid of him for the great love they bare him, other for his power he was of, and other for the Romalus. honour they gave him as a god, continuing still in duty and obedience towards him. Divers strangers allo had Romulus valiantly in great honour: as amongst others, those who then were called the ancient LATINES, which fent Ambaffadors to him to make league and amity with him. He devised to take the City of FIDENA which was near to ROME. Some fay he took it upon a fudden, having fent Romandus took before certain Horf-men to break down the hooks and hinges with force, which the Gates hang dent. by : and himself came after with the rest of his army, and stole upon them, before the City mistrusted any thing. Other write that the FIDENATES first invaded his Country; and foraged unto the very Suburbs of ROME, where they did great harm: and how Romulus laid an ambush in their way, as they returned home, and flew a great number of them. When he took their City, he did not raze it, but made a Colony of it (as a place to fend the over-increase of Rome unto) whither he sent afterwards two thousand five hundred ROMANS to inhabit there: and it was on the thirteenth day of April, which the ROMANS call the Ides of the same Moneth. Not long after there rose such a great Plague at Plague in ROME, that men died fuddenly, and were not fick: the Earth brought forth no fruit: brute It trained blood Beafts delivered no increase of their kind: there rained also drops of blood in ROME, as they say, In- at Rome. fomuch as befides the evils men felt in this extremity, they fell in a marvellous fear of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiving the like hapned to the Inhabitants of LAURENTUM, then every man judged it was the very vengeance and heavy hand of the gods: who plagued and punished these two Cities for the murder committed upon Tatim, and the Ambassadors that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both fides were apprehended and executed: and these plagues by and by ceased both in the one and the other City. Romulus befides, did purifie the Cities with certain Sacrifices that he devised, which they keep still at this day, at the gate called Ferentia. But before the plague ceased, the CAMERIANS came to affault the ROMANS, and had overcome all the Countrey, supposing they should not be able to withstand them, because they had been so fore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithstanding, Ron ules fet upon them with his Army, and wan the field of them, in which conflict there were flain about 6000 men. After the battell done, he took their City, and conveyed to ROME the ken by Roma one half of the Inhabitants that remained. After this, he fent twice as many ROMANS as there were lust. naturall CAMERIANS left at CAMERINE, to dwell there among them. This was done the first day of August: so great was the multitude of the Inhabitants of ROME that had increased in 16 years from the first foundation of the City. Among other spoiles he got there, he carried away a Chariot of brass with four horses, which he caused to be set up in the Temple of Vul an, and his own Statue upon it, and Victory crowning him with a Garland triumphant. His power being grown thus great, his weak Neighbours did submit themselves unto him, being contented to live in peace by him. His stronger Neighbours were atraid of him, and envied much his greatness, and did take it no good policy to suffer him thus to rise in the face of the World, and thought it meet speedily to daunt his glory , and clip his wings. The first of the Thuscanes that bent their power against him , were the VEIANS, who had a great Countrey, and dwelled in a strong and mighty City. To pick a quarrell to him, they fent to have delivered to them the City of FIDENA, which they faid belonged unto them. This was thought not onely unreasonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, considering that all the while the FIDENATES were in War and danger, the THUSCANES never came to their aide, but had suffered them to be slain, and then came to demand their Lands and Tenements, when other had possession of them. Therefore Romalus having given them an Answer full of mockery and derifion, they divided their power into two Armies, and fent the one against them of FIDENA, and with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went against the City of FIDENA prevailed, and killed there two thousand ROMANS: the other was overthrown and discomfitted by Romulus, in which there died eight thousand VEIANS. Afterwards they met again somewhat near the City of the FIDENATES, where they fought a battell, and did confels the chiefest exploit was done by Romulus own hands that day, who shewed all the skill and valiantness that was to be looked for in a worthy Captain. It seemed that day, he far exceeded ble valiantness the common fort of men, in strength of body and feats of Armes. Nevertheless that which some fay, is hardly to be credited: and to be plain, is out of all compass of belief and possibility. For they write, there were fourteen thousand men slain at that Battell, and that more then half of them were flain by Romalus own hands: and the rather, for that every man judgeth it a vain brag and oftentation which the MESSENIANS report of Aristomenes, who offered in Sacrifice to the gods three hundred Beafts of Victory, as for fo many LACEDEMONIANS himself had flain in the Battell. Their Army being thus broken, Romalus fuffered them to fly who by swiftnels could fave themselves, and marched with all his power in good array towards their City. The Citizens then confidering their late great loss and overthrow, would not hazard the danger of withstanding him, but went out all together, and made their humble petition and suite for peace. All was granted them for a hundred years, fave they should forgo their Territory called Septemagium, that was the seventh part of their Countrey : and yeeld to the ROMANS all their falt-houses by the Rivers fide, and deliver fifty of their chiefest Citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entry and Triumph into Rome for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the fame moneth, leading in his Triumph many prisoners taken in those Wars: and among others, the Generall of the VEIANS, a very ancient man, who fondly behaved himself in his charge, and shewed by his doings, that his experience was far short for his years in the Wars. And from thence it cometh, when they offer to the gods to give thanks for his Victory, that even at this day, they bring to the Capitoll through the Market-place, and old man apparelled in a Purple Robe, and with a Jewell called Bulla about his neck, which the Gentlemens young Children wear, about their necks: and an Herauld goeth hard by him, crying, Who buyeth, who, the SARDIANIANS? because they hold opinion the Thus CANES are come of the SARDIANIANS, and the very City of VEIES standeth in the Countrey of Thuscane. This was the last War that Romalus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almost to all those, who by sudden prosperity and fortunes speciall favour, are raised to high and great estate. For trust-Profestive in- ing to prosperity and good success of his acts, he began to be more strange and stately, and to carcreate of pride ry a fowerer countenance then he was wont to do before: leaving to be after his old manner, a courteous and gracious Prince: and gave himself in fashions to be somewhat like a Tyrant, both for his Apparell, and flately port and Majesty that he carried. For he ware ever a Coat of Purple in grain and upon that, a long Robe of Purple colour : and gave audience, fitting in a wide Chaire of Celeres Romu- Estate, having ever about him young men called Celeres, as we would say, flights, for their swiftness and speed in executing of his Commandments. Other there were that went before him, who carried as it were Tipftaves in their hands, to make the People give room, and had Leather Thongs about their middle to bind fast streight, all the Prince should command. Now in old time the LATING faid, Ligare was to bind : but at this present they say Alligare, from whence it cometh that the Uthers and Serjeans are called Littorer. How beit methinks it were more likely to fay, they had put to a c, and that before they were called Litures, without a c. For they be the very fame which the GRECIANS call Liturgus, and be in English, Ministersor Officers: and at this day, Leitos, or Leos in the GREER Tongue fignifieth the people. Romulus now after his Grandfather Numitor was dead at the City of ALBA, and that the Realm by inheritance fell to him: towin the favour of the People there, turned the Kingdom to a Common-weal, and every year did chuse a new Magutrate, to minister justice to the SABY NS. This president taught the Noblemen of Rone to feek and defire to have a free Estate, where no Subject should be at the commandment of a King alone, and where every man (hould command and obey as should be his course, Those which were called Patricians in ROME, did meddle with nothing, but had onely an honourable Name and Robe, and were called to Councell rather for a fashion, then to have their advice or counfell. For when they were affembled together; they did onely hear the Kings pleasure and commandment, but they might not speak one word, and so departed : having no other preeminence over the Common-wealth , faving they were the first that did know what was done. All other things thereby did grieve them less. But when of his own meer Authority, and as it were of himself, he would as pleafed him , befrow the conquered Lands of his Enemies to his Souldiers, and restore again to the VETA WS their Hoftages as he did : therein plainly appeared , how great injury he did to the Senate. Whereupon the Senators were suspected afterward that they killed him, when within few days after it was faid, he vanished away so strangely, that no man ever knew what became of him.

Therefore fome have thought that the Divis opiniwhole Senators fell upon him together in the Temple of Vullan, and how after they had cut him in one of Rusaulan pieces, every one carried away a piece of him, folded close in the skirt of his Robe. Other think death. alfo. this vanishing away was not in the temple of Vultan, nor in the presence of the Senators only. but they fay that Romulus was at that time withour the City; near the place called the Goats Marth, where he made an Oration to the People, and that fuddenly the weather changed, and overcast so terribly, as it is not to be told nor credited. For first, the Sun was darkned as if it had been very night; this darkness was not in a calm or still, but there fell horrible thunders, boysterous winds, and flashing lightnings on every side, which made the people run away, and scatter here and there but the Senators kept still close together. Afterwards when the lightning was past and gone, the day cleared up, and the Element waxed fair as before : then the people gathered together again, and fought for the King, asking what was become of him. But the Noblemen would not fuffer them to enquire any further after him, but counfelled them to honour and reverence him as one taken up into Heaven: and that thenceforth in flead of a good King, he would be unto them a mercifull and gracious god. The meaner fort of people (for the most part of them) took it well , and were very glad to hear thereof, and went their way worthipping Romulus in their hearts, with good hope they should prosper by him. Howbeit some seeking out the troth more eagerly, did cumber fore and troubled the PATRICIANS, accuring them, that they abufed the common People with vain and fond perswassions; whilst themselves in the mean time had, murdered the King with their own hands. While things were thus in hurly burly, fome fay there was one Julius Proculus, the noblest of all the PATRICIANS, efteemed for a marvellous honest man, and known to have been very familiar with Romalus, and came with him from the city of ATBA: that stepped forth before all the People, and affirmed (by the greatest and holiest Oaths a man might swear) that he had met Romulus Fulius Procutive on the way, far greater and fairer, then he had feen him ever before, and armed all in white Ar- met with Romour , shining bright like fire : whereat being affraid in that fort to fee him , he asked him yet : O mulus after his mour, mining origin the first whereas oring animal institution for him, in assection yet. Vanishing.

Romalist Oriacredit and shame, by thy vanishing? To whom Romalus gave this answer: Procelus, it hath pleased eletoProculus, the gods from whom I came, that I should remain among men so long as I did: and now having built a City, which in glory and greatness of Empire shall be the chiefest of the World, that I should return again to dwell with them, as before, in Heaven. Therefore be of good comfort, and tell the ROMANS, that they exercifing prowels and temperancie, shall be the mightiest and greatest People of the World. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These words seemed credible to the ROMANS, as well for the honesty of the man that spake unto them, as for the solemn outles he made before them all. Yet I wot not how, honoured as a some Celestial Motion, or Divine Inspiration helped it much : for no man said a word against it. And god, fo all suspicion and accusation laid aside, every man began to call upon Quirinus, to pray unto him, and to worship him. Truly this tale is much like the talesthat the GRECIANS tell of Aristeas the Aristeas aPro-Proconnessan, and of Cleemedes the Aftypalaian. For they say, that Arifteas died in a Fullers work connessan tahouse, and his friends coming to carry away his body, it fell out they could not tell what became of ken out or mens fight at it : and at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake ter he was with him, and how he kept his way towards the City of CROTONA. It is faid also that Cleemedes dead. was more then a man naturally strong and great, and therewithall mad, and furious hasty. For after Chomeles Amany desperate parts he had plaid, he came at the last on a day into a School-house full of little children, the roof whereof was born with one pillar, which he did hit with fo terrible a blow of his fift, ly out of mens that he brake it in the midft, so as the whole roof fell and dashed the poor children in pieces. The fight, being people ran straight after him to take him: but he threw himself forthwith into a Chest, and pulled the talt locked in lid upon him. He held it to faft down, that many striving together all they could to open it, they were a chest. not able once to ftir it. Whereupon they brake the Cheft all in pieces, but they found the man neithe Prophetels answered them in this Verse: Cleomedes the last of demy gods.

The report goeth also that Alemenes corpse did vanish away, as they carried it to buriall, and how in Alemenes body ftead thereof they found a stone laid in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other such wonders, vanished out that are far from any appearance of truth: onely because they would make men to be as gods, and of the beere. equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reprove and deny Divine Power, it were a lewd and wicked part : even so to compare Earth and Heaven together, it were a meer folly. Therefore we must let fuch Fables go, being most certain that, as Pindarus saith, it is true:

ther quick nor dead. Whereat they were marvellously amazed, and fent to Apollo Pythia, where

Each living Corps most yeeld at last to death, And every life must lees his vitall breath: The foul of man , that onely lives on hie, THESEUS.

The foul eter-

And is an image of Exernise.

For from Heaven it came, and thither again it doth return, not with the body, but then foonest, when the foul is furtheft off and feparated from the body, and that the is kept holy, and is no more defiled with the flesh. It is that the philosopher Heracliess meant, when he said . The dry light, is the best soul which slyeth out of the body, as lightning doth out of the cloud: but that which is joyned with the body being full of corporall pallions, is a grofs vapour, dark and maftle, and cannot ned with the body being into or corporan pantons, as a gross vapour, tark and maints, and cannot flame, arife or shoot out like lightning. We must not believe therefore, that the Bodies of noble and vertuous men, do go up together with their fouls into Heaven, against the order of nature. But this we are certainly to believe, that by the vertues of their fouls (according to Divine Nature and Juffice) they do of men become Saints, and of Saints half Gods, and of half Gods, entire and perfect Gods: after that they are perfectly (as it were by Sacrifice of purgation) made clean and pure, being delivered from all pain and Mortality, and not by any civil Ordinance, but in troth and pure, pening activetice from an Pani and Storious and Now touching Remulus furname, which afterwards was called Qurinus, fome fay, that it lignifieth as much as Warlike; others think it was fo called because the ROMANS themselves were called Quiries. Others write, that men in old time did call the point of a Spear, or the Dart in tell, Quirie, by reason whereof the image of Juno sure named Quiritides, was fet up with an iron Spear, and the Spear which was confecrated in the Kings

Palace, was ralled Mars. Furthermore it is an use amongst men, to nonour them with a Spear or Dare, which have shewed themselves valiant in the Wars; and that for this cause Romains was furnamed Quirinus, as who would day, god of the Spears and Wars. There was finee built a Temple unto him, in the Hill called Quiring, and so named of him. The day whereon he vanished, is called the flying of the people, or otherwise the Nones of the Goates. For on that day they go out of the City to do Sacrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the Goates Marth, and the ROMANS call a Goat, Capra. As they go thus together, they call with lowd fhouts and cries upon divers Ro-MAN , names , 48 Marcus, Cnew , and Gaise , in token of the flying that was then : and they called one another back again, as they ran away in great fear and diforder. Howbeit other fay, that it is not done to flow the running away, but to hew their freed and diligence, and refer it to the Story.

joyning together, went with a great mighty Army, under the conduct of Living Poshuming, to war against the Romans. This Poshuming brought his Camp as near the City of Rome 2s he could, and fent to the ROMANS by a Trumper to let them understand, how the LATINS were defirous by new Marriages to reftore their old ancient amity and kindred that was neer hand decayed between them : and therefore if the ROMANS would fend them a convenient number of their Daughters and young Widows to marry with them , they would have peace, as they had before time with the SABYNS, upon the like occasion. The ROMANS hereat were so troubled, thinking that to deliver their Women in such fort, was no better then to yeeld and submitthemselves to their Philosis a waite Enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a Waiting-made called Philosis (or as other call her, Tuing maids fud- :ola) gave them counfell to do neither the one nor the other, but toule a policy with them, by means whereof they should scape the danger of the Wars, and should also not be ried nor bound to any Pledge. The Device was , they should send to the LATINS her self, and a certain number of their fairest Bond-maids, trimmed up like Gentlewomen , and the best Citizens Daughters , and that in the night the would lift them up a burning Torch in the air, at which fign they should come armed, and fer upon their Enemies as they lay alleep. This was brought to pass: and the LATINS thought verily they had been the ROMANS Daughters. Philoric failed not in the night to lift up her fign, and to shew them a burning Torch in the top of a wild Fig-tree: and did hang certain Coverlets and Clothes behind it, that the Exemies might not fee the light, and the ROMANS CONtrariwise might discern ir the better. Thereupon so soonas the ROMANS saw it, they ran with all speed, calling one another by their names, and issued out of the Gates of the City with great haste: and fo took their Enemies upon a fudden, and flew them. In memory of which Victory, they do yet solemnize the Feaft called the Nones of the Goats, because of the wild Fig-tree called in Latin Caprificus. And they do feast the Women without the City, under shadowesmade of the boughs of Fig-trees. The Waiting-maids, they run up and down, and play here and there together. Afterwards they feem to fight, and throw stones one at another, as then they did when they holp the ROMANS in their Fight. But few Writers do avow this Tale, because it is on the day time that they call fo each other by their names, and that they go to the place which they call the Goats Marth, as unto a Sacrifice. It feemeth this agreeth better with the first History when they call one another by their names in the night, going against the LATINS: unless peradventure these two things after many years happened upon one day. Furthermore, they fay Romulus was taken out of the World, when he was four and fifty years of age, and had reigned eight and thirty years by accompt.

whom he had delivered from them. Furthermore, he might have gone to ATHENS by fea, and never needed to have travelled, or put himself in danger with these robbers, considering he never received hurr by any of them: whereas Romalus could not be in fafety whilest Amalius lived. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Thesew unprovoked by any private wrong or hurt received, did set commeth a People-pleaser, or a cruell tyram: and so causeth his Subjects to despise or have him.

Hus have we declared all things of Thefem and Romulus worthy memory. But to compare the one with the other: it appeareth first, that Thefew of his own voluntary will, without compulsion of any (when he might with fafery have reigned in the City of TROEZEN, and fucceeded his Grandfather in no small Kingdom) did defire of himself, and rather men are profought meanes to aspire to great things: and that Rommlus on the other vosed to great fide, to deliver himself from bondage and fervitude that lay fore upon Enterprises. him, and to escape the threatned punishment which still did hang over his head, was certainly compelled (as Plato faith) to flew himself Plato in Pha hardy for fear: who feeing how extreamly he was like to be handled. donc. was of very force constrained to feek advantage, and hazard the enterprize of attaining high and great things. Moreover the chiefest act that ever he did, was, when he slew one onely Tyrant of the City of ALBA called Amuliu: where Thefew in his journey onely, as he travelled, gave his mind to great enterprises, and flew Sciron, Scinnis, Procrustes, and Corgnetes. And by ridding them out of the world, he delivered GREECE of all those truell Tyrants, before any of those knew him upon these detestable Thieves and Robbers : Remus and Robulus contrariwise, so long as the Tvrant did them no harm, did fuffer him to oppressand wrong all other. And if they alledge, these were noble deeds, and worthy of memory: that Romulus was hurt fighting against the SABYNS, and that he flew King Acron with his own hands, and that he had overcome and subdued many of his Encmies : then for Thefeus on the other fide may be objected , the Battell of the CENTAURI , the Wars of the AMAZONS, the Tribute due to the king of CRETA: and how he ventured to go himself thither with the young Boyes and Wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering himself to be devoured by a cruell beaft, or else to be flain, and facrificed upon the Tombe of Androgeus, or to become Bond-flave, and tied in Captivity to the vile Service of cruell men and Enemies, if by his courage and manhood he could not deliver himself. This was such an act of Magnanimity, Justice and Glory, and briefly of fo great Vertue, that it is impossible truly to be fet out. Surely me thinks the Philosophers did not ill define Love, when they faid the was a Servitour of the gods, to fave Love the Miyoung folks, whom they thought meet to be preferved. For, the love of Ariadne was in mine opi- nitter of the nion the work of some god, and a mean purposely prepared for Theseus safety. Therefore the gods. woman is not to be reproached nor blamed for the love the bare Thefeus, but rather it is much to be wondred at, that every man and woman in like wife did not love him. And if of her felf the fell in love with him, I fay (and not without cause) she afterwards deserved to be beloved of a god, as one that of her own Nature loved Valiantnesse and Honour, and entertained men of singular value. But both Thefeus and Romulus being naturally given to rule and reign, neither the one nor the other kept the true form of a King, but both of them did degenerate alike, the one changing himself into a popular man, the other to a very Tyrant. So that by fundry humours, they both fell into one mischief and errour. For a Prince above all things must keep his Estate: which is no The office of leffe preferved by doing nothing uncomely, then by doing all things honourably. But he that a Prince. is more fevere or remis then he should be, remaineth now no more a King or a Prince, but beYet me thinks the one is an errour of too much pity and baseness, and the other of too much pride and cruelty. But if we may not charge Fortune with all mischances happening unto men, but that we ought to confider in them the diversities of manners and passions, seeing anger is unreasonable, and wrath rath and patitionate: then can we not cleer the one, nor excuse the other of extreme rage and passion, in the fact committed by one against his Brother, and by the other against his natural Son. Howbeit the occasion and beginning of anger doth much excuse Thefins, who moved with the greatest cause that might be, was put into such choler and passion. But if Romulus variance with his Brother had proceeded of any matter of counfell, or cause of the Commonweal; there is none so simple to think, that his wildom would fo suddenly have fet upon him. Whereas Thefers in contrary manner killed his Son, provoked by those pallions that few men can avoid; to wit, love, jealousie, and falle report of his Wife. Moreover Romulus anger went to the effect; whereof the iffue fell out very lamentable: The fees anger stretched no further then to rough words and old folkes curses in their heat: For it seemeth, cursed Fortune, and nought else was the cause of his Sons only mishap, as fore-spoken and wished for somewhat by his Father. These be the speciall things may be alledged for Thefeus. But for Romulus this was a notable thing in him : First, His beginning being very low and mean, and his Brother and he taken for bondmen, and the Children of Hogheards, before they were themselves all free, they set at liberty in manner all the LATINS, winning at one instant many Titles of glory and honour : as, Deftroyers of their Enemies, Defenders of their Parents, Kings of Nations , Founders of new Cities , and no overthrowers of the old : whereas Thefem of many habitations and houses made onely one, and did overthrow and pluck down divers States, bearing the Names of ancient Kings, Princes, and half-gods of ATTICA. All these also did Roppulus afterward, and compelled his Enemies whom he had overcome, to destroy their own houses, and to come and dwell with their Conquerours: And in the beginning, he never changed nor increafed any City that was built before, but built himself a new city out of the ground, getting all together, Land, Countrey, Kingdom, Kindred and Marriages, without lofing or killing any man : and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poor vagabonds, who had neither Countrey, Land nor houses, and defired nothing elle but to make a People amongst them, and to become Citizens of some City. Also Romalia bent not himself to follow Theeves and Robbers , but subdued by force of armes many Romains love he died: the most part of Authors do charge other with the death of him. But it is certain that eloquent an Oration foever could be made for his excuse; yea though it were before the most favourable judges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN very well perceiving that it was an hard thing to excuse and defend so foul a fault, doth seign that the good old man Agem having news brought him that his Sons Ship was at hand, did run in so great haste to his Castle, to see his Son arrive afar off, that as he ran, his foot hit against something and overthrew him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that never a man feeing him run so hastily to the sea side, did make haste to attend and wait upon him. Furthermore, Thefens faults touching Women and Ravishfeed for his ra- ments, of the twain, had the leffe shadow and colour of honefty: Because Thefens did attempt it enems, of the twam, had the tene madow and colour of nonetty: Decaute 1 notem and attempt it very often: for he ftole away Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the TROEZENIAN. Again, being ftepped in years, and at later age, and apfi marriage, he ftole away Hellen in her minority, being nothing neer to confent to marry. Then his taking of the Daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACEDEMONIANS, and the AMAZONS (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birth and linage of his own Countrey which were at ATHENS, and descended of the Noble race and progeny of Erithems, and of Cecross) did give men occasion to suspect that his womanishness was rather to satisfie lust, then of any great love. Romulus now in a contrary manner, when his people had taken eight hundred or thereabouts, of the SABINE Women to ravish them, kept but onely one for himself that was called Hersilia, as they fay, and delivered the rest to his best and most honest Citizens. Afterwards by the honour, love and entertainment that he caused them to have and receive of their Husbands, he changed this violent force of ravishment, into a most perfect bond and league of amity: which did fo knit and joyn in one these two Nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall love which grew afterwards betwirt those two Peoples, and consequently of the joining of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath given a good testimony of the love, reverence, constancy, kindness, and all matrimoniall offices that he established by that means betwixt Man and Wife: For in two hundred and thirty years afterwards, there was never Man that durft made in Rome forfake or put away his Wife, nor the Wifeher Husband. And as among the GRECIANS, the tor 230 years best learned men , and most curious observers of Antiquities , do know his Name that was the first murderer of his Father and Mother : even fo all the ROMANS knew what he was, which first durit put away his Wife: It was one Spurius Carvilius, because his Wife was barren and had no Children. The effects also do agree with the testimony of the time: For the Realm was common unto the Kings of both Nations; and through the alliance of these Marriages that began first of Ravishments, both Nations lived peaceably, and in equality, under one civill policy, and well governed Commonweal, mighty and puiffant people: he took Cities, and triumphed over Kings and Princes which he had vanquished in battell. And touching the murder of Remus, it is not certainly known of whose hands

Remulus delivered his Mother from apparent death, and restored his Grandsather to the royall Throne of Ana, who before was depoted and brought from a King to fervile obedience, without any regard of honour or dignity; to whom he did many more great pleafures and fervices: Befides

The ATHENIANS contrariwife, by Theless Marriages, did get neither love nor Kindred of any one Theless marriage person, but rather they procured wars, enmitties, and the saughter of their Citizens, with the loss ages cause of in the end of the City of APHIDNES: and yet very hardly, and by the mercy of their enemies bles, (whom they honoured as gods) they escaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the felf act done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the last, that his Mother was not only in danger, but even feelingly suffered like misery and captivity, which Hecuba did afterwards, when the was forfaken of her Son: unless peradventure those things that they write of the imprisonment and captivity of Athra, be found falle and but fables, as for the fame and memory of The few were behoveful, that both it and many other things also, were of no more troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romnius divinements, maketh great difference between him and The fews. Romalus more For Romalus in his birth was preferred by the marvellous favour of the gods: The few to the contrary acceptable to the gods then was begotten against the gods will, as appeared plainly by the answer of the Oracle to Agens, that Theleus, he should not meddle with any Woman in a strange and forreign Countrey.

THE LIFE OF LYCuRGUS.

Ann. Mund. 3046.

Ast. Christ.

Man cannot speak any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the Lawes of the LACEDEMONIANS, but he shall find great contrariety of him amongst the Historiographers. For of his Parentage and travell out of his Countrey, of his Death and making of Laws, of his form of Government and order of executing the fame, they have written diverlly. And yet above all things, concerning him, they agree worst about the time he lived in: For some of them (and Aristotle is of that number) will needs have him to have been in the time of Iphytus, and that he did help him to stablish the Ordinance, that all Wars should ceaseduring the Feast of the games Olympicall: for a testimony whereof, they alledge the Copper coyt which was used to be thrown in those games, and had found graven upon it, the Name of Lieurgus. Others counting the days and time of the succession of the Kings of Lacedenon (as Exatostenes and Apollodorus) say, he was many yeares before the first Olympiad. Timam also thinketh there were two of this Name, and in divers times, howbeit the one having more ellimation then the other, men gave this Lyeurgus the glory of both their doings. Some to Lacedamon, fay the eldeft of the wain was not long after Homes; and some write they saw him. Xénophon shew-rep. eth us plainely he was of great antiquity: faying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were nearest of bloud by descent to Hercules. For it is likely Kenophon means not those Heraclides, which descended from Hercules self : for the last kings of Sparta were of Hercules progeny, as well as the first. Therefore he meaneth those Heraclides, which doubtless were the first and nearest before Herenles time. Nevertheless though the Historiographers have written diversly of him, yet we will not leave to collect that which we find written of him in ancient Histories, and is least to be denied, and by best testimonies most to be proved. And first of all, the Poet Simonides faith, his Father was called Prytanis and not Eunomiss: and the most part do write the Pedigree otherwise, as well of Lycurgus felf, as of Eunomus. For they fay, that Patrocles the Son of Ariftodemus begat Some, and Some begat Eurytion, and Eurytion begat Prytanie, and Prytanie begat Ennomue, and Eunomus begat Polydettes of his first Wife, and Lycurgus of the second Wife, called Dianaffa: yet Entlycides another Writer, maketh Lycurgus the fixt of descent in the right line from Polydettes, and the eleventh after Hercules. But of all his ancestors, the Noblest was Sons, in whose time the City of SPARTA subdued the ILOTES, made them slaves, and did enlarge and increase their Dominion, with the Lands and Possessions they had got by Conquest of the ARCADIANS. And it is said that Sous himself being on a time straitly belieged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard dry ground, where no water could be found, offered them thereupon to restore all their Lands again that he had gotten from them, if he and all his company did drink of a fountain that was there not far off. The A fubtle pro- CLITORIANS did grant unto it, and Peace was also sworn between them. Then he called all his Souldiers before him, and told them, if there were any one amongst them that would refrain from drinking, he would refign his Kingdom to him: howbeit there was not one in all his company that could (or would) forbear to drink, they were fo fore athirft. So they all drank heartily except himself, who being the last that came down, did no more but a little moyst his mouth without, and fo refreshed himself, the enemies selves standing by, and drank not a drop. By reason whereof, he resulted afterwards to restore their Lands he had promised, alledging they had not all drunk. But that notwithstanding, he was greatly esteemed for his acts, and yet his house was not named after his own Name; but after his Sons Name Eurytion; they of his house were called Eurytionides. The reason was, because his Son Enrytion, to please the people, did first let fall and give over the fole and absolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwards marvellous disorder and diffolution, which continued a great time in the City of SPARTA. For the people finding themfelves at liberty, became very bold and disobedient : and some of the Kings that succeeded, were hated even to death, because they would perforce use their ancient authority over the people. Other, either to win the love and good-wils of the people, or because they faw they were not ftrong enough to rule them, did give themselves to diffemble. And this did so much increase the peoples loose and rebellious minds, that Lycurgus own Father being King, was flain among them. For one day, as he was parting a fray between two that were fighting, he had such a wound with a kitchin-knife, that he died; and left his Realm to his eldeft Son Polydettes, who died also soon after, and without Heir of his body, as was supposed. Insomuch as every man thought Lycurgus should be King: and to he took it upon him, untill it was understood that his Brothers Wife was young with Child. Which thing fo foon as he perceived, he published openly, that the Realm belonged to the Child that should be born, if it were a Son. After this he governed the Realm, but as the Kings Lieutenant and Regent. The LACEDEMONIAN'S call the Regents of their Kings that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurem Brothers Widow did fend, and let him fecretly understand, that if he would promise to marry her when he should be King , that the would come before her time , and either miscarry or destroy that she went with. Lycurgus streetably abhorring this brutish and savage unnaturalness of the woman , did not reject her offer made him , but seemed rather to be very glad , then to diflike of it. Nevertheless he sent her word again, she should not need to try masteries, with drinks and medicines to make her come before her time ; for in fo doing , fhe might bring her self in danger , and be cast away for ever. Howbeit he advised her to go her full time , and to be brought abed in good order, and then he would find means enough to make away the Child that should be born. And so with such perswasions he drew on this woman to her full time of delivery. But so soon as he perceived she was near her time, he sent certain to keep her, and to be present at her labour; commanding them, that if the were brought abed of a Daughter, they should leave her with she woman; and if it were a Son, they should forthwith bring it to him, in what place soever he was, and what butiness soever he had in hand. It chanced that the came even about hopper-time and was delivered of a Son. As he was fitting at the table with other Magistrates of the City of a fervants entred the Hall, and preferred to him the little Babe, which he tenderly 1908 in his arms. and faid open to them that were preferr? I Citizens, that there were more that willingly obeyed him for his vertue, then for that he was the Kings Regent, or that he had the government of the whole Realm in his hands. Notwithstanding there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who sought to hinder and disgrace his credit, and chiefly the friends and kindred of the Kings, Mother; whole Power and Honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus authority; infomuch, as a Brother of hers called Leonidus, entring boldly into great words with him on a day, did not flick to fay to his face, I know for a certainty one of these days thou will be King; meaning thereby to bring him in suspicion with the Citizens. Which thing though Lycureus never meant, yet of a fubil and crafty wit, Leonidus thought by giving out fuch words, that if the young King happened to die in his minority naturally, it would be miltrufted that Lycuren had fecretly made him away. The Kings Mother also gave out such like speeches. which in the end did so trouble him, with the fear he had, what event might fall out thereof that he determined to depart his Countrey, and by his absence to avoid the suspition that therein might grow upon him any way. So he travelled abroad in the world as a ftranger, untill his Nephew had Lycargus tragrow upon limitary way. So the third in his Kingdom. He having with this determination taken treys. his journey, went first of all into CRETA, where he diligently observed and considered the manner of their living, the order of the government of their Commonweal, and ever kept company with the best, and ever was conferring with the most Learned. There he found very good Laws in his indgement, which he noted of purpose to carry home to his Countrey, to serve when time should come. He found there other Laws also, but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that above the reft was reputed wife and skilfull in matters of State and Government, who was called Thales; with whom Lycurgus did so much by intreaty, and for familiar friendship, that he perswaded him to go with him unto Sparta. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon Thales a Poet he had that Title and Name; but in effect he sang all that the best and sufficientest Governours of the harper world could devise : for all his Songs were goodly Ditties , wherein he did exhort and perswade the people to live under obedience of the Law, in peace and concord one with the other. His words were fet out with such tunes, countenance and accents, that were so full of sweetness, harmony and piercing, that inwardly it melted mens hearts, and drew the hearers of a love to like the most honest things, and to leave all hatred, enmity, fedition and division, which at that time raigned among them. So as it may be faid, he it was that prepared the way for Lycman, whereby he afterwards reformed and brought the LACED & MONIANS unto reason. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into Asia, with intent (as it is faid) to compare the manner of life and policy of those of CRE- Lycurgus his TA (being then very straight and severe) with the superfluities and vanities of 10 NIA: and Affa.

the reupon to consider the difference between their two manners and governments, as the Physician doth, who to know the whole and healthfull the better, doth use to compare them with the fick and difeafed. It is very likely it was there, where he first faw Homers Works, in the hands of the heirs and fucceffours of Cliophilm : and finding in the fame, as well many sules of policy, as the great pleafure of Poets faining, he diligently copied it out, and made a volume thereof to carry into GREECE. It is true, there was much fame abroad of Homers poefics among the GRECIANS, howbeit there The praife of were few of them brought together, but were featured here and there in divers mens hands, in pam. So the EGYPTIAN Historiographers, and some others also of GREECE do write. He was also in Africa, and in Spain, and as far as India, to confer with the wife men there, that were called the Philosophers of INDIA. I know no man that hath written it, faving Arithocrates, that was Hipparethin fon. The LACEDEMONIANS wished for him often when he was gone, and fent divers and many a time to call him home : who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or majefty of a Prince, whereby they did excell the common people. But as for Lyewyw, they thought of him thus , that he was a man born to rule, to command, and to give order, as having in him a certain naturall grace and power, to draw men willingly to obey him. Moreover the Kings themselves were not unwilling to have him to return home, because they hoped that his presence would somewhat bridle and restrain the people from their infolency and disobedience toward them. Whereupon Lycurges returning home in Lycurgus rethis opinion and affection of men , it fell out that he was no fooner arrived , but he began to devife turneth and this opinion and affection of men; it reli out that he was no sooner arrived; but he began to devite how to after the whole government of the Commonweal; and throughout to change the whole the Commonweal. course and order of the State: thinking that to make only certain particular Lawswere to no pur-wealth. pose, but much like, as one should give some easier medicine, to purge an overthrown body with all humours and diseases. Therefore he thought first that all gross and superfluous humours were meet to be diffolved and purged, and then afterwards to give them a new form and order of government. When he had thus determined with himself, before he would take in hand to do any thing, Lycurgurcounhe went to the City of DEL PHOS: where after he had facrificed to Apollo , he consulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with his glorious title by the Oracle of Pythia: O beloved double at of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craved grace of Apollo to establish good Delphor. Laws in his Countrey, it was answered him: that Apollo granted his petition, and that he should ordain the best and perfectest manner of a Commonwealth, that ever had or should be in the world. This answer did comfort him very much, and to the began to break his purpose to certain of the chief of the Caty; and secretly to pray and exhort them to belp him, going first to those he knew to be his friends, and affect by fittle and little he wan others to him, who joined with him in his enterprise. So when he faw the time fit for the matter he caused thirty of the chiefest men of the City in a morning to come into the market-place well appointed and furnished, to suppress those that would attempt to hinder their purpose. conspiracy or insurrection against his person, and for his safety he fled into the temple of Juno, and Chalceecos, as much to fay, as Junos brafen Temple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth. he waxed bold and came out of the Temple again, and he himself favoured the enterprise, being a Prince of a noble mind , howbeit very foft by nature, as witneffeth Archilam (that was then the other King of LACED&MON) by telling how Charilam answered one that praised him to his face, in saying he was a good man. And how should I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be evill to the evill? In this change of the ftate, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but this chiefest alteration was, his Senate of the Law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to have a regal power and equall authority with the Kings in matters of weight and importance, and was (as Plato faith) to be the healthfull counterpoile of the whole body of the Commonweal. The other State before was ever wavering, fometime inclining to tyranny, when the Kings were too mighty: and fometime to confusion, when the people would usurp authority. Lycarem therefore placed between the Kings and the people, a Councill of Senators, which was as a strong beam, that held both these extremes in an even balance, and gave sure footing and ground to either part to make strong the state of the Commonweal. For the 28 Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) took fometime the Kings part, when it was needfull to pull down the fury of the people : and contrarily, they held fometimes with the people against the Kings, to bridle their tyrannicall government. Aristotle faith, he ordained the number of Senators to be but eight and twenty, because two of thirty that joyned with him as afore, did for fear forfake number of the him at his enterprise. Howbeit Spherm writeth, that from the beginning, he never purposed to have more then eight and twenty to be the Senate, And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, confidering it is compounded of the number of feven, multiplyed by four : and is the first perfect number next to fix being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he chose this number rather then any other, because he meant the whole body of the Councill should be but thirty persons, adding to that number, the two Kings. Lycurgue took so great care to establish well this Councell, that he brought an Oracle for it , from Apollos Temple in DELPHOS. This Oracle is called unto this day Retra, as who would lay the Statute-Oracle : whereof the answer was : When thou haft built a Temple unto Inpiter the Syllanian , and to Minerva, the Syllanian, and divided the people into lineages, thou shalt establish a Senate of thirty Councellours, with the two Kings: and shalt assemble the people at times convenient, in the place between the bridge and the River CNACION. There the Senators thall propound all matters and break up after their affemblies: and it shall not be lawfull for the people to speak one word. In those days the people were ever affembled between two Rivers, for there was no Hall to affemble a Council at large, nor any other place The open prepared for them. For Lycargue thought no builded place meet for men to give good counfell in, or fields appoint to determine angles but wathen a bindernance builded place meet for men to give good counfell in, or neids appoint to determine caules, but rather a hinderance: because in such places, men be drawn so muse on vain things, and their minds be carried away with behelding the Images, Tables, and Pictures, commonly fer up for ornament in fuch open places. And if it, be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the plays and sports be made, they think more of them, then of any councill. Again, if it be in a great hall, then of the fair embowed or vawted roofs, or of the fretifed lealings curiously wrought, and fumpruously fet forth, and tend not ftill their bufinels they come for. When the people were affembled in councill, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the councill to be determined, neither might any of them deliver his opinion what he thought of any thing : but the people had only authority to give their affent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senators, or the two Kings, Howbeit afterwards, the two Kings Polydorm and Theopen w, because the people did many times cross and alter the determination of the cenare, by Theopen w, because the people did many times cross and alter the determination of the cenare, by Theopen would not assert to any Ordinance of the Senate, then thould it be two full for the Kings the people would not assert to any Ordinance of the Senate, then thould it be two full for the Kings and Senate to break up the councill, and to fruitrate all things done in the Ame, it the liftle advite of the Senate being encountred thus, and their meaning to the best, so pervented to the worke. These two Kings perswaded the people, that at the very first, this addition came with the Cracks of Apallo

Lyeurgus now having thus tempered the form of this common weat, is feemed not printernating to those that came after him, that this small number of thirty persons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, and of too great authority. Wherefore to bridle them in a little, they gave them (as Plato faith) a bit in their mouths, and that was the Ephores, which fignific as much as controllers : and were erected about a hundred and thirry years after the death, of Lycurgue, The first which was chosen of these, was Elatm, and it was in the time of King Theopomput, whose wife on a day in her anger faid : How through his negligence he would leave less no his successors to then he had

we will shew hereaster. The second Law that Lycurgus made, and the boldest and hardest he ever took Lycurgus main hand, was the making of a new division of their Lands. For he saw so great a disorder and inequa-keth equal dility among the Inhabitants, as well of the Countrey, as of the City LACED. EMON, by reason some vision of lands (and the greatest number of them) were so poor, that they had not a handfull of ground, and other unto the Cititome being leaft in number were very rich, that had all : he thought with himself to banish out of a Law of the divition of their Lands. For first he did divide all the Countrey of LACONIA, All the lands into thirty thouland equal parts, the which he did fet out for those that Inhabited about Spage through the TA: and of those Lands that joyned next to the City of SPARTA, that was the first metropo- Countrey of †A: and of those Lands that joynen next to the Cuty of SPARLS, that was the first intercopo-lican City of LACONIA, he made other nine thousand parts, which he divided to the natural Laconia, divifay, he made but fix thouland parts, and that King Polydorus afterwards did add two other three All the lands thousand parts. Others say also, that Lyeurgus of these nine thousand parts made but the half about sparts, onely, and Polydorus the rest. Every one of these parts was such, as might yield unto the owner into 9000 yearly, threescore and ten bushels of Barley for a Man, and twelve bushels for the Woman, and of What Barley Wine and other liquid fruits, much like in proportion, which quantity Lyeurgus judged to be every part did fufficient, to keep the body of a man in health, and to make him ftrong and lufty without any yield.

taken away all unequality. But finding the Citizens took it very impatiently, that openly that which they had hould be taken away, he went about to do it more fecretly, and in a continger wife to take away that coverounels. For first of all he did forbid all Coin of Gold and Silver Lyourem chanto be currant; and then he did fet out certain Coins of Iron, which he commanded onely to be gethall gold currant, whereof a great weight and quantity was but little worth. little to vanish away, and lattly, to fall off from themselves: when the most rich men have no more occasion then the poorest, and having no mean to shew her felf openly in the world, was fain to remain thut at home idly, as not able to do her Mafter any service. Thereupon moveables and houshold stuff (which a man cannot be without, and must be daily occupied) as bedsteds, tables, chairs, and such like necessaries for a house, were excellently well made; and men did greatly praise the fathion of the LACONIAN Cup which they called Cothon, and especially for & Souldier in the wars, Cuton a fixing kind of as Critical was wont to fay. For it was made after fuch a fashion, that the colour of it did let the eye cupof the La- to discern the foul and unwholfom water, which men are driven oft times to drink in a Camp, and goeth many times against ones stomach to see it : and if by chance there was any filth or mud in the bottom, it would cleave and flick fast upon the ribs of the belly, and nothing came through the neck but clean water to his mouth that drank it. The reformer of their State was the cause of all this: because their Artificers tending now to superfluous works, were occupied about the making of their most necessary things. Further, now to drive away all superfluiry and deliciousness, and to root out utterly defire to get and gather: he made another third Law for eating and drinking, and against feaths and banquets. First he willed and commanded the Citizens, that they should eat together all of one meat, and chiefly of those he had permitted by his Ordinance. Then he did expresly forbid them to Lycurgus appointed order of excellent workmen, and the devices of lickerish Cooks, to cram themselves in corners, as they do to far up Beafts and Poultry, which doth not onely breed ill conditions in the mind, but doth mar the complexions of men, and the good state of their bodies, when they give themselves over to such fenfuality and gluttony. Whereof it followeth in the end, that men must needs sleep much, to help to digest the excess of meats they have taken, and then must they go to the hot-houses to bathe themselves, and spend long time about the ordinary attendance of their sickly bodies. This was a marvellous thing for him for to bring to pass, but much more, to make riches not to be stoln, and least of all to be covered, as Theophrastus said of him : which by this means of making them ear together with all fobriety at their ordinary diet, was brought to pass. For there was no more mean to the rich, then to the poor, to use to play, or shew riches, sith both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eat all of one meat : fo as that which is commonly spoken, that Plate the god of riches is blind, was truly verified onely in the City of SPARTA, above all other places of the world. For there riches were laid on the ground like a coarse without a soul. that moveth no whit at all : confidering it was not lawfull for any man to ear at home fecretly in his house before he came to their open Halls, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meals, being already full and well fraught. For every mans eye was upon those especially which did not eat and drink with a good fromath amongst them: and it was the use to reproach them as gluttons, and dainty mouthed men, which refused to eat as it were in common together. So as this was the Ordinance they fay, that grieved most the rich above all that Lycurgiu made, and whereat they were most mad and angry with him : in 10 minch, as on a day, they all setting upon him to alter it, he was compelled to run out of the market-place, and getting ground of them, he recovered the liberties of a Church, before any could overtake him, laying one young man called Alcander, who otherwise had no ill nature in him, but that he was somewhat quick of his hand, and cholerick withall. Who following Lycurges nearer than any other, did give him a Alcanderstruck blow overthwart the face with a staff, and strake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lyeurgus never bashed or made word at the matter, but did lift up his head to those that followed him, and shewed them his fate all a gore blood, and his eye but out clear; whereof they were so fore assamed, that there was not a man that durit of the open his mouth a gainft him, but to the contrary, they feemed to pity him, and did deliver wheather into his lands that had done the deed, to punish him as himself pleased. And so they all brought him to his house, Lycurgus past and shewed they were right heartily forry for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them ence and gen- all back again, save that he made Alcander to go with him this his house where he never hurt him, nor gave him fowl word : but commanded him onely to wait upon him, and made his other ordinary fervants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now begin to fpy his own faill, did most willingly attend upon him, and never spake word to the contrary. When he had ferved him a certain time, being very near continually about him, he began to feel and tafte of his natural liberality, and faw of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moved to do all he did : he perceived what was the feverity of his ordinary life, and what his conflancy was to endure labour without weariness. Alcander then began to love and honour Lycurgus from his heart, and told his Parents and Friends, how he was no fucht fevere man as he feemed, but was of fo kind and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lyeurgu, and his punishment also, which he should have received: for of a fierce, rash, and a lewed conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very grave and wife man. But for memory Minerus Opti- of this his misfortune, Lycargus built a Temple to Minerus, which he furnamed Optileride, because the DORIANS which dwell in those parts of PELOPONNESUS, do call the eye, Optiles. There are other Writers (as Dioseorides for one) which fay Lycung w had a blow with a staff, but he had not his eye ftricken our with it : and how contrariwife, he founded this Temple to Minervia, to give her thanks for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that ever fince the SPARTANS have been Philinis, meals reftrained to carry staves in any Assembly of Councill. But to return to their common repasts,

dered coverlets, or counterpoints of purple filk, neither yet, plate of gold nor of filver, were places wherein they learned to live foberly and straightly, (for in the GREEK Tongue Thide is to fave and spare) or else because their amity and friendship grew there towards one another, as if they would have called them Philitia, Feafts of Love, by changing D. into L. It may be also they added the first Letter as superfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, because they did eat and drink there: i hey fate in their Halls by fifteen in a company, little more or less, and at the beginning of every moneth, every one brought a bushel of Meal, eight gallons of Wine, five pound of Cheese, and two pound and a half of Figs for a Man, besides some little portion of their Money to buy certain fresh Cates. And over and above all this, every man when he did sacrifice in his house was bound to fend the best and chiefest things of his Sacrifice to the Halls to be eaten. Likewise if any man went on hunting, and killed any Yenison, it was an order, he should send a piece of the slesh thither. Having these two lawfull causes, they might eat and drink by themselves, at home, either when they sacrificed any beaft to the gods, or when they came late home from hunting : otherwise they were bound of necessity to meet in their Halls at meals, if they would eat any thing. This order they kept very straightly a great time : in fo much as King Agis on a day, returning from the wars, where he had overthrown the ATHENIANS, and being delirous to sup at home privately with the Queen his Wife, he sent to the Halls for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certain Officers affifting the King in the wars, did deny him. The next day Agu left off for spite, to do the accustomed Sacrifice they were wont to celebrate in the end of every war: whereupon they fet a fine on his head, and condemned him to pay it. The young Children also went to these repasts, even as they should go to Schools to learn Gravity and Children were Temperance, where they heard wife and grave discourses touching the government of a Commonweal, brought to but not of Mafters that were as hirelings. There they learned prettily to play upon Words, and plea- these meals. fantly to foort one with another, without any broad speeches or uncomely jefts; and at other hands to bear the same again, without choler or anger. For this property have the LACEDEMONIANS The property above all other, to take and give a mock without any offence: nevertheless if any mans nature could of a Lacedamo not bear it. he needed but pray the party to forbear his jefting, and so he left it straight. And it was nian. ever an ordinary thing among them, that the eldeft of the company told the reft that were come into the Hall to meal, with shewing them of the door: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a word here out of this door. Even so he that would be received to meal there in their company, must first of necesfity be allowed and received in this fort, by all the reft. Every one of them took a little ball of bran or receiving any dow to wash their hands with, and without ever a word speaking, they threw it into a basin, which the man into their fervant that waited on them at the table did carry upon his head: he that was contented the other company at should be received in company, did cast in his ball as he did receive it; but if he misliked him, then he meals. pressed it flat between his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of bran thus pressed flat, was as much as a Bean bored through, and was to them a fign of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this fort, the fuiter was rejected : for they would not have any enter into their company that was not liked of all the reft. He that was thus rejected, they fay he was discarded; for the basin wherein the little balls were carried, was called Caddos. The best dish they served at these meals, was that they call their black-broth: fo that when they had that, the old men did eat no flesh, The blackbut left it all to the young men, and they by themselves did eat the broth. There was a King of broth. PONTUS, that being defirous to taffe of this black-broth, did buy of purpose a LACEDEMO. Citero calleth NIAN Cook: but after he had once tasted thereof, he was very angry straight. The Cook then said unto Diopsign the him: And it please your grace, ere one shall find this broth good, he must be washed first in the River Tyrant. Tust. 5. EUROTAS. After they had eat and drunk thus loberly together, every one repaired home without any light : for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where else with light, because they should accustion themselves boldly, to go up and down the dark, and all about in the night.

This was the order and manner of their meals. But here is specially to be noted, that Lyeurgus Lyeurgusvould would in no wife have any of his Laws put in writing. For it is exprelly fet down in his Laws not have his they call Retra, that none of his Laws should be written. For he thought that which should chiefly Laws written make a City happy and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and otherwise then manners, as to have continuance for ever: which he took to be love and good-will, as a far ftronger knot to tie them with, then any other compulsary Law. Which when men by use and custom, through good education, do take in their childhood, it maketh every man to be a Law to himself. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and fometime are changed into one fort, and fometime in another, as occasion serveth: he thought it best not to constrain them to do it by writing, not to establish customs that might not be altered, but rather to leave them to the liberty and discretion of men which had been brought up in the fame, both to take away, and to add therein, as the case and time should require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefest point of a good Law-maker or reformer of the Commonweal was, to cause men to be well brought up and instructed. One of his Ordinances therefore was expresly, that not one of his Laws should be written. Another of his devices was, against superfluous charges and expences: which to avoid, he made a Law that all roofs of houses should be made onely with the Ax and all gates and doors with the Saw, and that without any other tool Retra for exof occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he faid, feeshing of the table; Such a board never receiveth any treason. Even, so thought Lyeurgus, that Epaminondas such a built house would never receive that a built house would never receive curiofity or daintiness. For no man is so madly dispoted saying or simple writed, as to bring into so poor and mean houses, beddeads with Silver feet, imbroidant of the sound of nor fuch other like coffly furniture and finencis, as those things require to wait upon them because the beds must be answerable to the meaners of the house, the furnitures of the beds must be futelike to the fame, and all other houshold-stuff, diet, meat and drink agreeable to the rest. Hereof pro-King Leonychi ceeded that, which Leonychidas the first King of that Name, said once: who suppling on a time in the City of CORINTH, and feeling the roof of the Hall where he fate, sumptrooffly embowed and carved, he asked Rtraight if the Trees did grow carved so in that Countrey. The third Law was, he did forbid them to make war often with one enemy, left the enemy forced to take often arms in hand. might in the end grow experter and vallanter then they. For this cause King Agesilaus was greatly blamed who was a long time after: For by making often wars with the Countrey of BOEOTIA, he made the THEBANS in the end as expert and valiant Souldiers as the LACEDEMONIANS. Whereupon Amaleidas feeing him hurt one day, faid unto him: The THEBANS have nobly rewarded thee for their learning, fith thou hast made them expert Souldiers unwilling to learn the difcipline of war: These be the wars Lycargus self called Retra, and signifies as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had discovered to him. Now the education of Children, he effected the chiefeft and greatest matter that a reformer of Laws should establish. Therefore beginning afar off, he first considered the state of Marriage, and the generation of Children. For Aristotle faith, that Lyeurgus did attempt to reform Women, and did foon give it over again : because he could do no good therein, by reason of the great liberry they had taken by the absence of their Husbands in the wars, compelled often so to be abroad, and that they did leave them Mistresses of their houses, and at their return did honour them so much, and make of them so beyond measure, with calling of them Ladies and Mistresses: Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, as well The discipline as he had of Mens; and so reason did require. First of all, he willed that the Maidens should harden their bodies with exercise of running, wreftling, throwing the Bar, and casting the Dart, to the end monghithe La- that the fruit wherewith they might be afterwards conceived, taking nourilhment of a ftrong and lufty body, should shoot out and spreadthe better; and that they by gathering strength thus by exercifes, should more easily away with the pains of Child bearing. And to take away from them The exercises their wothshift daintiness and finences, he brought up a custom, for young Maids and Boys to go as it were a proceffion, and to dance raked at foleran Pearls and Sarrifices, and to fing certain Songs of their own making, in the prefettee and fight of young men. To whom by the way they gave many times pretty mocks of purpole, as pleafantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and fometimes allo in their Song, for their vertues, wits or manners, they praised them which had deserved it. By this means they did set young mens hearts on fire, to ftrive to win most praise and honour. For who so was praised of them for avaliant man, or whose worthy acts were sung by them, he thereby was encouraged to do the better another time: and the pretty girds and quips they gave to others, were of no less force, then the sharpest words and admonisions that otherwise could be given them. This rook plate the rather, because it was done in the prefence of the Kings, the Senators, and all the reft of the Citizens which came thither to fee those sports. And though the Maids did shew themselves thus naked openly, yet was there no diffionefly feen or offered, but all this sport was full of plays and toys, without any youthfull part or wantonness: and rather carried a shew of demureness, and a defire to have their best-made bodies feen and spyed. Moreover, it somewhat lifted up their hearts, and made them mobler minded, by giving them to understand, that it was no less conseller for them, in their kind and exercises to trry the Bell, then it was for men in their games and exertiles to carry the prize, Hereof it came, that the Women of Laced & stow were to bold to fay, and to think of themselves that, which Gorgon the Wife of King Leomans one day answered, being intalk with a frange woman that faid to her, There be no Women in the world that command their Husbands, but you Wives of LACEDANON. Whereto the Queen straight replyed : So there be no Women but we, which bring forth men. Purtilet more, thefe plays, sports and dances, the Maids did naked before young Men, were provocations to draw and allure the young Men to marry : not as perswaded by Geometrical reasons, as faith Plato, but brought to it by liking and of very love. Those which would not marry he made inflamous by Law. For it was not lawfull for fuch to be prefent, where these open games and paltimes were shewed naked. Furthermore Marry. Lyan-gus reputed in-environ the Officers of the City compelled fach as would not marry, even in the hardeft time of the winter, to gus reputed in-environ the place of these sports, and to go up and down stark naked, and to sing a certain Song made for the purpose against them, which was; that justly they were punished, because that Law they disobeyed. Moreover, when such were old, they had not the honour and reverence done them; which old married men usually received. Therefore there was no man that misliked or reproved that, which was spoken to Dercilians: aften otherwise he was a noble Caprain. For, coming into a prefence, there was a young Man which would not vouchfafe to rife and do him reverence, nor to give him place for to fit down: And worthilly, quoch ite, because thou hast not gotten a Son, who may do so much for me in time to come. Those which were desirous to marry any, were driven to take them away by force whom they would marry, not little young wenches I titean, which were not of age to be married; but lufty and ftrong Maids, of age to bear Children. And when one of them was from away in this fort, fire that was privy thereto, and meant to make the marriage, came and shaved the hairs of her head that was married: then fire put her into mans apparel, and gave her all things fure-like to the fame, and faid her upon a mattress all alone, without light or Candle. After this was done, the Bridegroom being neither drunk nor finelier spparrelled then he was wont to be, but having lupped loberly at his Ordinary, came home fecretly to the house where the Bride was : and there untied his Wives girdle, took her in his arms, layed her upon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwards fair and foith ftole away to the place where he was wont to fleep with other young men. And fo from thenceforth, he continued always to do the like, being all the day time with his Companions, and fleeping most of the night, unless he sometime stole to see his Wife; being afraid, and ashamed ever to be feen by any of the house where she was. And hereunto his young Wife did help for her part, to fpy means and occasions how they might meet together, and not be seen. This manner endured a great while and untill fome of them had Children, before they boldly met together, and faw each other on the day time. This fecret meeting in this fort did ferve to good purpofes, not onely beother on the cast man of continency, and shamefastness, but also it kept their bodies in strength Wholetome cause it was some mean of continency, and shamefastness, but also it kept their bodies in strength Wholetome and better State to bring forth Children. It continued also in both parties, as still burning Love ried couples, and a new defire of the one to the other, not as it were luke-warm, nor weary, as their commonly be which have their Bellies full of Love, and as much as they luft; but they ever parted with an Appetite one from another, keeping still a longing defire to devide how to meet again. Now when he had established such a continency, and so kind a framed Honesty in Marriage, he took no less care to drive away all foolish jealousie therein, thinking it very good reason to Lycurgus rebeware there should be no violence, nor confusion in Marriage: and yet as reason would, they should gard to avoid fuffer those which were worthy to get Children as it were in common, laughing, at the mad lealcusse in the folly of them which revenge fuch things with War and Bloodshed, as though in that case men in Commonno wife should have no sellowship together. Therefore a manwas not to be blamed, being stepped in years, and having a young Wife, if feeing a fair young Man that liked him, and known with all to be of a gentle Nature, he brought him home to get his Wife with Child, and afterwards would avow it for his, as if himself had gotten it. It was Lawful also for an Honest man that Loved another mans Wife, for that he law her wife, shamefast, and bringing forth goodly Children, to intreat her Husband to fuffer him to lie with her, and that he might also plow in that lufty ground, and caft abroad the feed of well favoured Children: which by this means came to be Common in Blood and Parentage, with the most Honourable and Honestest persons. For first of all, Lycurgus did not like that Children should be private to any man, but that they should be Common to the Commonweal: by which reason he would also, that such as should become Citizens, should not be begotten of every man, but of the most Honestest man onely. So Lycurgus thought also there were many foolish vain toyes and fancies, in the Laws and Orders of other Nations, touching Marriage : feeing they caufed their Bitches and Mares to be limed and covered with the faireft Dogs and goodlieft stalions that might be gotten, praying or paying the Masters and owners of the same: and kept their Wives notwithstanding shut up safe under lock and key, for fear left other then themselves might get them with Child, although they were fickly, feeble brained, and extream old. As if it were not first of all, and chiefly a discommodity to the Fathers and Mothers, and likewise to those that bring them up, to have unperfect and feeble Children born, as it were begotten of dry and withered men; and then to the contrary, what pleasure and benefit is it to those that have fair and good Children born, as gotten of like feed and man? Thefethings were done then by Natural and civil reason, nevertheless they say Women were so far off from intreaty, as ever they were before: so as in old time, thereis they say women were rotation and the same of the safewer made by Geran No Adultery das (one of the first ancient Spantans) unto a stranger, may be alledged, that asked him, what is more in punishment they had for Adulterers. My friend, quoth he, there be none here. But if there were; Sparts. replyed the stranger again. Marry said he, then he must pay as great a Bull; as standing upon the top of the Mountain Taygetus, may drink in the River Eurotas. Ye marry: but how is it possible (quoth the stranger) to find such a Bull? Geradas laughing, answered him again : And how were it possible also to find an Adulterer in Sparta? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus Laws touching Marriages. Furthermore, after the Birth of every Boy, the Father was no more The Education Mafter of him; to cocker and bring him up after his will: but he himself carried him to, a certain place of Children called Lesche, where the eldest men of his kindred being set, did view the Child : and if they found with the Lace him fair, and well proportionated of all his Limbs and strong, they gave order he should be brought demoniate, up, and appointed him one of the nine thouland parts of Inheritance for his education. Contrartic Lestine. wife, if they found him deformed, mishapen, or Lean, or Pale, they fent him to be thrown in a deep pit of water, which they Commonly called Apothetes, and as a man would fay, the Common house of office: holding Opinion it was neither good for the Child, nor yet for the Commonweal, that it should live, considering from his Birth he was not well made, nor given to be strong, healthful, nor lusty of Body all his Life long. For this cause therefore; the Nurse after their Birth did not wash them with water (imply (as they do every where at that time) but with water mingled with wine : and thereby Young babes did they prove, whether the Complexion or temperature of their Bodies were good or ill. For they sup- wasked with pose, that Children which are given to have the falling-Sickness, or otherwise to be full of rhumes wine. and fickness, cannot abide washing with wine, but rather dry and pine away: as contrarily the other which are healthful, become thereby the stronger and the lustier. The Nurses also of Sparta use a The Spartan certain manner to bring up their Children, without fwadling, or binding them up in clothes with fwad-Nurfes, ling-bands, or having on their heads Cross-clothes: so as they made them nimble of their limbs, better shaped and goodlier of Body. Besides that, they acquainted their Children to all kind of meats, and brought them up without much tendance, so as they were neither fine nor licorish, nor fearful to be left alone in the dark : neither were they cryers, wrallers, or unhappy Children, which be all tokens of base and cowardly natures. So that there were strangers, that of purpose bought Nurses out of LACONIA, to bring up their Children: as they fay Amicla was one of them which nuried Alcibiades. But Pericles his Tutor, gave him afterwards a bondman called Zopprus, to be his Mafielt Alcibiades. fter and Governour: who had no better property in him, than other common flaves. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and government of the Children of Sparta into the hands of hired mafters or flaves bought with money: neither was it lawful for the Father himfelf to bring up his own Child after his own manner and liking, For fo foon as they came to feven years of age, he took and divided them by Companies, to make them to be brought up together, and to accustom them to play, to learn, and to study one with another. Then he chose our of every company one, whom he thought to have the best wir, and had most courage in him to fight, to whom he gave the charge and overfight of his own company. The reft had their eyes waiting always on him, they did obey his commandments willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections he gave them, they did fuch tasks and works as he appointed them: fo that all their study was most to learn to obey. Furthermore, the old gray-headed men were prefent many times to fee them play, and for the most part they gave them occasions to fall out, and to fight one with another, so that they might thereby the better know and differn the natural disposition of every one of them, and whether they gave any figns or tokens in time to come to become cowards or valiant men. Touching Learning, they had as much as served their turn : for the rest of their time they spent in learning how to obey, to away with pain, or endure labour, to overcome still in fight. According to their growth and years, they did change the exercises of their bodies: they did shave their heads, they went bare-legged, they were conftrained to play naked together the most part of their time. After they were past twelve years of age, they wore no longer coats: and they gave them yearly but one filly gown. This was the caufe they were always fo nafty and fluttifh, and they never used to bathe or noint themselves, saving onely at certain days in the year, when they were suffered to taste of this refreshing. They lay and slept together upon beds of straw, which they themselves did make of the tops of reeds or canesthat grew in the River of Eurotas: which they were forced to go gather and break themselves with their hands, without any tool or iron at all. In the winter, they did min-It is a kind of gle thiftle-down with thefe, which is called Lycophonas, because that stuff seemeth somewhat warm Mellenian

About this time, the favourers and likers of this pretty youth, which were commonly old men took the better regard unto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exercises, and where their use was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should mock another. This did their old men, not by way of pastime onely, but with such care and hearty love towards them, as if they had been altogether their-Fathers, Mafters, and Governours, while they were boyes: infomuch as there was never time nor place, where they had not always fome to admonish, reprove, or correct them, if they did a fault. Norwithstanding all this, therewas ever one of the honestest men of the City, who had expresly the charge and governance of these boys. He did divide them in Companies, and afterwards gave the overlight of them to fixth a one of the boys as was discreetest, the manliest, the most hardy, and of the best courage amongst Irenet Melire. them. They called the children that were paft infancy two years, Irene: and the greatest boyes ness.

Melirenes: as who would fay, ready to go out of boyery. This boy who was made Overseer of them, was commonly twenty years of age. He was their Captain when they fought, and did command them ashis fervants when they were in the houfe; and willed them which were ftrongest and the most grown, to carry wood when they should prepare dinner or supper; and those which were leaft and weakeft, to go gather herbs, which they must feel or lack them. So they went out to fixal, some in Gardens, some at the Markets, other in the Halls where the Feaths were kept, and men did eat together, into the which they conveyed themselves as closely and cunningly as they could devise: for if they were taken with the manner, they were scourged terribly, because they were so grofs and negligent, and not fine and cunning in their faculty. They ftole also all other kind of meat, whatsoever they could get or lay hands on. They pried and sought all occasions how to take and freal meat handfornly, both when men were alleep, or elfe that they were careleis, or did not give good heed unto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundly, and was punished with fasting besides : for they had but a slender pittance, because necessity should Straight diet drive them to venture boldly and wir should find our all devices to steal finely. This was the chiefcancet growth eff cause, why they gave them fo finall a diet. The second cause was, that their bodies might grow up higher in height. For the vital spirits not being occupied to concoct and digest much meat, nor yet keep down, or fpread abroad by the quantity or over-burden thereof, do enlarge themselves into length, and shoot up for their lightness: and for this reason they thought the body did grow in heighth and length, having nothing to let or hinder the rifing of the fame. It feemeth that the felf-fame cause made them fairer also. For the bodies that are lean and slender, do better and more eafily yield to Nature, which bringeth a better proportion and form to every member : and contrariwile, it feemeth these gross, corpulent, and over-fed bodies do encounter Nature, and be not fo nimble and pliant to her, by reason of their heavy substance. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a little before their time, and be somewhat cast before they should have been born, be smaller and fairer also, and more pure commonly than other that go their time: because the matter whereof the body is formed, being more supple and plyant, is the easilier weilded by Nature, which giveth them their shape and form. Touching the natural Cause of this Effect, let us give place to other to dispute it that will, without any farther deciding of the same, But to return to the matter of the LACEDEMONIANS children: They did rob with fo great care, and fear to be discovered, that they tell of one, which having stoln a little Fox, did hide him under his cloak, and suffered him with his teeth and claws to tear out all his belly, and never cryed, for fear he should have been betrayed, untill he fell down dead in the place where he stood. This is not incredible, by that we do fee young boys abide at this day : for we have feen divers, which have bidden whipping even to death, upon the Altar of Diama, furnamed Orthia. Now this under-Mafter, who had the charge of every Company of these boys, used after supper (fitting yet at the Childrens ca-Table) to bid one of them fing a Song: to another he put forth a question, who was to be well ad- ercife after viled of his answer, as for example: Who is the honestest man in the City? or how thinkest thou by that such a one did? By this exercise they were enured from boyes state, to judge of things well or ill done, and to understand the life and Government of their Citizens. For which of them did not answer quickly and directly to these questions, Who is a good man, who is an honest Citizen, and who not: they thought it was a fign of a dull wit, and careless nature, not given to any vertue, for defire of honour and estimation. Furthermore this under-master was ever to wait for his answer, and to see it should be brief and well knit up in words: otherwise his punishment that anfwered crofly, or to little purpose, was, that his Master bit him by the thumb. This he did many times in the presence of the old men and Magistrates of the City, that they might see whether he punished them with reason or not, and according to their deserving. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reprove him, but when the children were gone away, then was he himself rebuked and punished, if he had corrected them too fore, or contrarily had favoured them too much, Moreover they did afcribe the good or ill opinion conceived of the children, unto every of their iavourers and lovers, which did affect and entertain them: in as much as they fay, a young boy upon a time fighting with another, and a cry scaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yield, his favourer and lover was straight condemned by the Officers of the City to a fine, Albeit this love was a thing even incorporated into them, that the most honest and vertuousest women loved the young Maids thus also: yet was there no jealousie nor suspicion that grew hereof, but rather The Laseleto the contrary, there grew a marvellous mutual love and kindness between them, which lived in monians manone self place. For either of them by all the means they could, did devise how to make the child ner of loving. they loved in common, the wifest, the gentlest, and the best conditioned above all other. They taught thele children to speak in such fort, that their speech had ever in it a pleasant grace, and in few words comprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great masse and weight of iron money, should be but little worth, and of a small value, as we have told you before; and contrarily, that speech in few words, without any affectation, should hold much deep and grave matter, wherewith Short speech the children being acquainted, after long filence, should be brief and pithy in their answers. For as taught among the feed of incontinent men, which are too busie with every rag and colman hedge, can take no root to bring forth fruit: even so immoderate speech, full of words and busic tattle, bringeth forth as little sense. Hereof it cometh, that the answers of the LACONIANS were so short and witty. As they fay, King Agis answered on a day an ATHENIAN, who jeffing at the Swords the LACE-DEMONIANS did wear, faid they were so short, that these Tumblers and Juglers did swallow them down in the fight of all the World: and yet, faid Agis, we hurt our Enemies with them for all that, For mine own opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS manner of speaking: which is not to speak much, but when they speak to touch the matter effectualy, and to make the hearers understand them. I think also that Lycurgus fill, was short and quick in his talk. For so a man may conjecture his answers which are written: as that which he made to one who earnestly prayed him to establish a popular state in LACEDAMON, that the bases might have as great Authority as the Lycurgus wise highest. Begin (quoth be) to do it sirst in thing own house. And as that also which he answered answers. another who asked him, why he had appointed to small things, and so little of value to be offered Lycurgus love to the gods? Because (quoth he) we should never cease to honour them. And as that which he to God. spake another time, touching fights and frays, which was: that he did never forbid his Citizens hand is to conany of them, but those wherein they use to give their hand, as you would say, to yield. Men find sels himself also such like answers, in some of his Letters written to his Citizens, as when they asked him : How overcome: can we defend our felves against our Enemies? He answered: If ye be poor, and one do cover no more then another. And in another Letter that was fent, where he discourseth, whether it were requisite to inclose the City with Walls : he saith, Can that City be without Walls, which is environed with men, though it be uncompassed with stone ? Nevertheless it is hard to resolve, whether those Letters, and other such like that are shewed, be to be believed, or discredited to be his. But that long speech was much disliked, and reproved among the LACEDAMONIANS, it is manifestly to be feen by the words, which some amongst them have heretofore answered. As King Leonidas Short sentenfaid one day, to one that discoursed with him many good things, but out of season: Friend, thou ces of certain speakest many good words, but to little purpose. And Charilans, Nephew to Lycurgus, being al. Leonitas. ked why his Uncle made to few Laws : Because, said he, to men of few words, few Laws will ferve. ftill: who was the honestest man of LACEDEMON? Even he that is least like thy felf. And Agis faid to some which highly praised the ELIANS for their upright judgement, and just dealing in the games Olympical. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in five years space the ELIANS one day do good justice? And Theopompus likewise to a stranger, who as desirous to shew his affection he bare the LACEDEMONIANS, told him how every body called him Philolacon (as to fay) a lover of LACEDEMON. It were more honesty for thee (faid he) to be named Philopolites, a lover of her Citizens. And Plistonax the son of Paufanias, when an Oratour of ATHENS faid the LACEDEMONIANS were unlearned and ignorant: Thou fayeft true, quoth he, for we onely of Archidamidas, all the GRECIANS have learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that demanded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enough faid he, to drive away the wicked. We may conjecture also their manner of speaking, by their words in mirth. which they toake fometimes playing wife: for they did never use to speak vain words at random, but it had always fome fecret meaning in it, which required anothers good observation that would find it. As he which was defired to go hear the Nightingale counterfeited naturally : I have (faid he) heard In the life of the Nightingale it felf. And another which having read this Inscription upon a Tomb:

When as they had, well quenched tyrannie Throughout their land, by worthy warlike-power; Their hap was yet in wretched wife to die, By scaling Selynuntaes strongest tower.

They well deserved death, said he, that did but quench tyranny: they should have quite consumed it with fire. And one younger boy to another, promifing to give him fuch hardy Cocks of the game. as should die in the place where they fought. O give me not those (faid he) which will die, but those which with fighting will kill others. Another seeing men sitting in Couches and Litters as they went : God forbid (faid he) that I should ever sit in a chair, where I could not rise to my elders. Such were their answers and encounters. So that some had reason which said heretosore, to speak LACONIAN-like, was to be Philosopher-like: as you would fay, more to exercise the mind, than the body. Besides all this, they did study to sing well, and to make goodly Dities and Songs. Then they spake most properly and featly. There was in their Songs also a certain motion, I wot not monians Songs. what, which stirred up the hearers hearts, and did kindle defire in them to do notable feats. Their Tongue was plain, without affectation: their matter grave and moral, containing for the most part the praise of those which were slain in battle for the defence of their Countrey, as being happy men : and a shame to those that live, which for faint hearts refused so to die, to lead a miserable and unfortunate life. Or else they fang how they were the patterns for time to come, or the right glory of the World, and the true representation of vertuous men; as the Song would best become their ages which did fing. It shall not be impertinent for the better understanding hereof, to bring you here an example. For in their open Feafts, there were always three dances, according to the differamong the La- ence of the three ages. The dance of the old men, thus began first for to fing:

we have been young and strong, yet valiant heretofore, Till crooked age did hold us back, and bade us do no more. The young men followed after, finging; we yet are young, bold, firong, and ready to maintain,

That quarrel fill, againft all men that do on Earth remain.

The third was of children, that came after and faid:

And we do hope as well, to past you all at last, And that the world shall witness be, ere many years be past.

To conclude, who nearly will consider the works and makings of the LACON Poets (whereof some are yet extant) and will mark also the Notes and Tunes of the Pipe, after the found and measure whereof they marched in arrays going to charge the Enemy: he shall find that Terpander and Pindarus, had reason to join hardiness with Musick. For Terpander speaking of the LACEDEMONIANS, Terpander of the Lacedamo- faith in a place :

This is that Land where deeds of chivalry Did flourish most, in many a Martial feat: Where Musick made her choice of harmony, And Instice kept her stately royal seat.

Pindarus of the Lacedamonians.

And Pindarus speaking of them, also faith: There: grave advice, is found in aged brains: There: gallant youths are lufty lads indeed, Which can both sing, and dance, in courtly trains: Yet daunt their foes with many a doughty deed.

By which restimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and described them to have loved Musick, and the Warstogether. For asanother LACON Poet saith:

It fitteth well, and is a feemly thing, For such as spend their time in feats of war: To have the skill, Sweet Sonnets for to fing, And touch the Harp without enjangling jar.

For this cause therefore in all their Wars, when they should give battle, the King did first sacrifice

Muses that they had been brought up in, to the end that when his Souldiers were in the most extream danger, the Muses should prefer themselves before the Souldiers eyes, to prick them forwards to do some noble acts of worthy memory. In their time of War, they did tolerate their young men a little of their hard and old actustomed life, and suffered them then to trim their hairs, to have brave a little of their naru and one accumonate into a second and interest of fee them gallant and lufty, The long.

And although from the beas to behold young neighing and fnorting horfes; defirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did use to wear long hair: yet were they never so carefull to comb hair of the and brush their heads, as when they should to the battle. For then they did noint themselves with Lucohians, fweet Oyles, and did shed their hair, remembring Lycurgus faying, who waspwont to tell them, that hairs to them which were fair, did make them more fair, and to them that were foul, they made them more ugly and dreadfull. The exercises also of their bodies, were more easie and gentle, and not so hard and straight in their Wars, as they were in Peace : and generally, their whole manner of life was not then fo straightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they onely were the men of How the Latthe World, to whom Wars were made a reft from labour, which men ordinarily do endure, to make barle, them the fitter for the Wars. Afterwards when their Army was fet in battleray, even in the face of The Leconians the Enemies, the King did Braight facrifice a Goat unto the gods, and forthwith commanded all his fong when Souldiers to put their Garlands of Flowers on their heads, and willed that the Pipes should found the they marched, Song of Caffor, at the noise and tune whereof, he himself began first to march forward. So that it Enft. Ilia. 15 was a marvellous pleasure, and likewise a dreadfull fight, to see the whole Battle march together in order, at the found of the Pipes, and never to break their pace, nor confound their ranks, nor to be difmayed or amazed themselves, but to go on quietly and joyfully at the found of their Pipes, to hazard themselves even to death. For it is likely, that such courages are not troubled with much fear, nor yet overcome with much fury: but rather they have an affured constancy and valiantness in good hope, as those that are backed with the affifting favour of the gods. The King marching in this order, had always some about him, which had before time won the prizes in games and justs. And they say there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great sum of money at the games Olympical, hot to present himself at them: but he resuled it, liking better with great pain to win the prize, then for much money to lofe his honour. Whereupon the one faid unto him LACONI-AN: and what haft thou gotten now, to carry away the prize with io much fiweat? The LACONI-AN answered him laughing: I shall fight in the battle, saith he, before the King. When they had once broken into their Enemies, they did still stereely and siercelier set upon them; and did never cease, untill their Enemies gave way and fled : and then they chased and followed them still, untill fuch time as their overthrow and flight had affured them of the victory. Then they quickly and qui- How far the etly returned to their Camp, judging it to be no manhood, neither part of a noble mind, or of to Lacedamonians worthy a Nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill and hew in pieces, men fo scattered and out of or- did pursue der, having forfaken all the hope of victory. For they which were in battle against them, knowing they killed none but fuch as relisted stoutly, and how they did let others go which fled before them; they found it was more their benefit to fly, then to tarry and abide the ftrokes. Hipping the Sophifter faith, that Lyeury is him Lyeurgus a vefelf was a very good Captain, and a great Souldier, as he that had been in many foughten Fields - 77 good Cap-and Philostephanas afcribed to him the device to pur Horse-men in Troops and Companies, which rain. they called Oulames, whereof fifty men at Arms was a Troop, whole manner was to put themselves Oulames, in squadrons. But Demession the Phalesian writtesh otherwise, that Lyenegus was never at the Wats, and that he made all his Laws and Government in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of Wars during the plays Olympical, which they say be devised, doth shew in appearance that he was a gentle-natured man, and one that loved quietness and peace. Some notwithstanding (amongst whom Hermippin was one) say, he was not with Iphiem at the first beginning, when he ordained the Plays Olympical, but that by chance he happened to come thither, passing by in his journey onely, and that he stayed there to see the Games : where he thought he heard the voice of a man behind him, faying, He marvelled much why he did not perswadehis Citizens also to be partners of this new device : and turning back to fee who it was that spake to him, he saw no body. Whereupon he took a conceit that it was a speech from the gods : and went therefore prefetitly to seek our

Iphitus, with whom he made all the Statutes and Orders of the Feaft, which afterwards were far more famous, better ordered, and more stately than before. But to return again to the LACE-

DEMONIANS : their discipline and order of life continued fill, after they were full grown then,

For it was not lawfull for any man to live as he lifted, but they were within their City, as if they had been a Camp, where every man knoweth what allowance he hash to live withall, and what busiries he hash else to do in his Calling. To be short, they were all of this mind, that they were nor born to ferve themselves, but to serve their Gountrey. Therefore if they were commanded nothing The Laconius elfe, they went continually to fee what the children did, and to teath them somewhat which might profit the Common-weal, or else they went to learn of those which were their elders. For one of ferre their the best and happiest things which Lycurgus ever brought into his City, was the great rest and leiling Country, which he made his Citizens to have, onely forbidding them that they should not profess any vile or The rest and base occupation t and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where Goods tenure of the Lacedamoniant were nothing profeste nor esteemed. For the livers, which were made bond men by the Wars, did till their Grounds, and yielded them a certain Revenue every year. And as touching this matter, they tell of a LACEDEMONIAN, who being on a day at ATHEMS where the Law was Idle livers pu- pleaded, did understand that a Citizen there was condemned for idleness, and how he went home to his house very forrowfull, accompanied with his friends which were forry for him, and greatly lamented his ill hap: the LACEDEMONIAN then prayed those which were about him, to shew him the man condemned for living nobly, and like a gentleman. I have alledged this, to flew how he thought it a vile and fervile thing to exercise any handy-craft, or to work any thing by hand to get Money. For Suits in Law, a man may be well affured they were banished with the gold and filver from LACED.EMON, confidering now there was no more avarice nor coverousness there, nor yet poverty nor lack, but equality with abundance, and quiet life with fobriety. All other times but when they had Wars, they followed dancing, Feafts, Plays, Banquets , hunting, or other exercifes of body, and meetings to pass the time away. For the young men until they came to thirty from they from the years of age, never went into the market to buy any Provision or things for the house, but did their Fathers or their Friends business: nay it was a shame for the oldest men, to haunt the Market too often. As to the contrary, it was honourable for them to be prefent at the Shew-place the most part of the day, where they diverily exercised their bodies, and likewise to be at the places of Affembly, there to fpend time with walking together, and discoursing honeftly one with another, without talking of any matter of gain, traffick, or money. For all their talk (for the most part) was about the praifing of fome honeft thing, or fporting-wife to reprove fome dishonesty, which always carried with it some gentle lesson or motion by the way. For Lyeurgus was not such a sour man, as they never faw him laugh: but as Sofibine writeth, it was he that first facrificed to the little god of laughter, which is at LACEDAMON, because he would mingle their Feasts and Assemblies with mirth, as a pleafant fauce to ease the trouble of their ftrict and hard life. To be brief, he dil accultom his Citizens fo, that they neither would nor could live alone, but were in manner as men incorporated one with another, and were always in company together, as the Bees be about their Mafter-bee: still in a continual love to ferve their Countrey, to win honour, and to advance the Common-weal. Which affection of theirs is plain and eafily feen to be imprinted in them by certain of their Answers, as in that which Padarerss faid on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred; Who departing home to his house merry and jocond as might be, faid : It did him good to fee there were three hundred found better in the City than himself. Piffratidas also being fent Ambassador with certain other to the Lieutenants of the King of Persia, the PERSIAN Lords asked him, if they came of their own defire, or whether they were feat from the whole State: if we obtain, faid he, it is from the State: if we be denied, then we come of our felves. And Argileonida the mother of Brasidas, asked somethat went to visit her after they were returned home to LACEDEMON from their journey to AMPHIPOLIS, if her fon died like a man, and a worthy SPARTAN; and they straight commended him highly, faying: There was not left in all LACEDEMON fuch a valiant man. She replyed unto them, Say not fo, my friends, I pray you: for Brasidas was indeed a valiant man, but the Countrey of LACONIA hath many more yet valianter then he was. Now touching their Senate, Lycurgus was the first that ere-Red it among them. The first that were thereof, were Lyourgus chief aiders and aflisters of that The manner of erection, as we have declared before : but afterwards he ordained, that when any of those first should happen to die, they should chuse in his place the most honest reported man in the City, so he were threefcore years old and above. This was the nobleft glory that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and praise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest among the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the reward of his vertue, as for liberty to speak, foveraign authority to govern, and Princely power over the Common-weal, the honour, the life, and the goods of the whole Citizens: howbeit the election was made after this fort. The people first assembled in the Market-place, where there were some appointed and shut up thereabout in a house, from whence they could neither see, nor be seen of those that were assembled, but onely they might hear the noise which they made there. For the people by their cry and fliour, did declare whom they did chuse, and whom they did refuse of their Competitors, as they used to shew their liking by the like cry in other things. The Competitors were not brought in, and prefented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, passed through the midft of the Affembly of the people, and faid never a word. The people straight that liked made a cry or shout aloud. The men appointed which were locked up, had Books or Tables in which they wrote and noted the greatness of the cry and shout the People made, as every Competitor passed by, not knowing nor feeing who he was. These hidden men did onely set down in their books, the first, the second, the third, and so many more, as by shours and cries they perceived did pass thus through the Affembly. They noted also in their faid books, which of those had the greatest cry and shour of people at their passing through: and him they came and declared to be Senator chofen. Then he wearing a Garland of Flowers on his head, went to all the Temples of the gods in the City to give thanks, having a great train of young men following, and prairing of his vertues. There went also with him a marvellous company of women finging Songe of his praile, and how bleffed he was that he had lived fo vertuoully. Then every one of his kin prepared a Banquet for him at home at their houses, and as he entred the house, they said unto him, The City benouverb thee with this Banquet. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinary place of their sating, where he did in all things as he was accultomed, faving he was ferved now at this Table with a double allowance, whereof he referved the one. After supper, all his kinswomen stood in the entry of the Hall where they had eaten : To he called her whom he loved belt, and gave her his allowance he had faved, and faid to her, This was given me in token I was this day rewarded for my verue: and even so I give it thee for a like token of reward for thy vertue. Then was she brought home by all the Women there to her house, even in like for a stie was by the Men. Touching Burials, Lycur. The manner of gm made a write Order: For fulft of all, to cut off all superfluion of burying places, he commanded Lacedemonies. they should bury the dead within the City, and that their graves should be round about their Temples, that young perfors might have them always in their eyes, and not be afraid to fee a dead boy, as it to rouch a coarse, or to pair by their graves, it should desile a man. Then did he forbid them to bury any thing with the coarse, and willed they should only lap it up in a red cloth, with Olive leaves. It was not lawfull to grave the Name of any dead body upon his grave, but only of such a man as died in the wars, or of forme holy woman professed into their Temples. Furthermore, the The time of time appointed to mourn in , was very Mort : for it lasted not but eleven days ; and on the mourning, twelfth day, they do facrifice to Proferbina, and so leave off their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or unworking in his Citizens: for to all necessary things which men cannot lack, Lyeurgus Joyned ever a certain émilitation of nien; as to defire vertue, and to contemn vice: and furnished his City with many good precepts and examples, among which his Citizens being full born and bred up, and having the lame in every place before their, eyes where they went, they came born and orea up, and naving the same an every pattern and mould of vertue it felf. For this caufe did he None allowed not fuffer any to travel out of their Countrey, or to go abroad as he would : without special license, to travel into for fear left thole which travelled abroad for their pleasure, should bring home strange fashions and other Counmanners, and a corrupt difordered life, which by little and little might get way, and bring an al- treys without teration and change of the whole state. Furthermore, he kept out of SPARTA all strangers, ex. license. No cept those which had necessary business there, or were come thinkerfor some profit to the country: firangers suffecept times when has necessary outniess used, a water of the law is a final to the commercial most that he was a fraud they flould learn formething whereby to love vertue, or that they flould defire to follow his fashion and manner of government, as Thurgidds was, but rather fearing they should teach his Citizens found habity manners, or forme ill favoured vice. For it must need be, that strangers bring ever strange and new devices with them; which new devices bring with them also new opinions, and new opinions beget new affections and minds, that many times are repug-nant to the Law, and to the form of the Commonweal effablished before, as discords do many times in an harthony of mufick, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he judged it a thing most necessary, to keep his City free and fast from counterfeiting of any strangers manners or fashions, that were commonly as persons injected with some contagious sickness. Now in all we have spoken before, even to this place, there is no manner of token or shew of injustice, or lack of requiry, wherewith fonte feels to butted Lycing in his Laws: by laying they were well made, to make men warlike and vallishe, but not to be just and righteous. But concerning the Law they call Cryptis, its much to lay, as their ferrer: it, in were of Lycing in this Laws, and the Law they call Cryptis and the carried Plato have the like opinion that Lycing in the Commonweal. This was the Law: the Governours which had the charge and overlight of the young men, at certain values appointed times, did choose out those they thought to have the best discretion, and sent them abroad into the Comments, some one way, some another way, who carried with them daggers, and some provisiont of the difference of the commonweal. This can be a superior of the country, did had themfelves all the day close in their places, and there they lay and took their rest; a sterwards when night was come, they went to feek out the high wayes, and killed the fift of the LLOT as that they men. Somewhere seel with the broad day, they went months of the wars of PELOPON NESUS, where he faith, the Lacetamore is the control of the interest of the lLOT as were covered, by a publick Produmation of the special covered the little of the little of the lacetamore of the control of the many and the lacetamore of the control of the lacetamore of the l equity, wherewith fome feem to burden Lycurgus in his Laws: by faying they were well made, ind made then flack drunk. Then they brought them all mo their Common-Halls where they did us, to make their Children of heldld them, and to fee what healthness it was for a man to be drunk. Likewife they made them ling longs, and dance dances, unfit for honelt Men, and such as Profit. Likewise they made them has song and dance dances, unfit for honest Men, and such as were full of decision and insoletely, and did sorbid them expressly to sing any honest songs. So it is reported, that in the journey the Tate has not made to Laconia, any of the Liotes were asken presented thereat, and when they were commanded to sing the Verses of Terpander, of Diodorus lib. 2. The word of the Country of the Country of the Country of the Country of Laconomia, He that is free sinore free, and the that is street in the Country of the Country of the Country will the during severe the liberty and bondage so of the Countries. But in my pillion, the Date of North And began to sufficient out the countries and reselves, long time after the death of Theorem on the Country of the Countries of the Country, and countries are antiquate that happened at Spart, at thick time the Frotes rose against them with the Messenians, and did great mischief thow the Country, and put the City to the greatest distress and danger that ever it had. For I cannot cannot be perswaded, that ever Lycurgus invented or instituted, so wicked and mischievous an act, as that kind of Ordinance was: becaule I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemency and justice we see used in all his other doings, and was witnessed besides by open Oracle from the gods, for a just and wife man. Furthermore, they fay of him, that when he faw the chiefest points of his Government had taken deep root, and that the form of his Commonweal went on, and was strong enough to maintain and keep it self on foot, like as Plato faith, that God rejoyced greatly after he had made the World, and faw the fame turn and move his first moving : even so Lyeurgus taking fingular pleafure and delight in his mind, to fee his notable Laws put in ure, and fo well established and liked of by experience, fought yet to make them immortal, as near as he could possible, by any forecast of man, that no after-time whatsoever, might change or put them down. To bring this to pais, he caused all the people to affemble, and told them he thought his civil policy and state of Commonweal was already sufficiently established, for vertuous and happy life: yet there was one matter behind of greater importance then all the rest, which he could not Lyangus won. Yet declare unto them, until he had first asked counsell of the Oracle of Apollo. And therefore in definitionnel the mean time they should keep and observe his Laws and Ordinances inviolably, without changing, in eliabilithing removing or flaying any matter therein, untill he were returned from the City of Delphos, and then they should do that other thing behind, if the god then so counfelled him. They all promited him to do it, and prayed him to make hafte to go on his journey. But before he departed, he made the Kings and Senators iwear first, and confequently all the people aiter, that they would keep his Laws and ordinances without changing or altering any thing, until he did return again. This done, he went to the City of Delphos, where io foon as he arrived, he facrificed in the Temple of Apollo, and asked him; If the Laws he had made were good to make a man live an happy life. of Pollo, and assed title; it the Laws were very good, and that his City keeping them, should be the most renowned of the World. Lycurgua caused this Oracle to be written, which he sent to SPARTA. After he facrificed to Apollo again: and then taking leave of his friends, and of his Son, he determined to die, because his Citizens should never be released of the Oath they had made between his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath ftrength enough to live longer; and yet was old enough alfo to die if he would. Wherefore finding himself enough to live tonger; and yet was old chough about the would. Wherefore moning number Ligargu death happy to have obtained his defire, he willingly pined himself to death, by abltinence and lack of mext. For he thought it meet, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit ever to the Commonweal, and that the end of their life should be no more idle and unprofitable, then to the Commonweau, and mad the stat of their median being more uncertaintendors, ment the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their ment meritorious acts, to have their death extolled for worthines. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and Crown of his selicity, after he had made and ordained so many good and notable Laws, for the honour and benefit of his Countrey; and should be as a seal of confirmation of his Law, and the nonour and penent or this City, confidering all his Citizens had fworn to keep them all invio-continual prefervitor of his City, confidering all his Citizens had fworn to keep them all invio-continual prefervitor of his City, confidering all his Citizens had fworn to keep them all invio-lably, until he were returned. He was not deceived of his hope, for his City was the chiefest of lably, until he were returned. He was not decerved of his hope, for his City was the chiefel of the World, in glory and honour of government by the space of sive hundred years. For so long the World, in glory and honour of government by the space of sive hundred years. For so long the World, in glory and honour of government by the space of the kings successfors, until King his City kept his Laws without any change or alteration by any of the Kings successfors, until King the Son of Archidentus began to reign. For the creation of the Ephores, did not break nor were by 1/sin-der means.

I ably, until he were returned. He was not decerved of his hope, for his City was the chiefel of the sing of the Kings successfors, until King the Son of t or me interity of the people, whereas indeed they and interigenenties authority of the kings and Money correspond to Senate. Now in the raign of king of gis, Gold and Silver began first to creep in again to the rought Laws.

And although Lyfander was not desirous to get it, nor would be Lyfander life. corrupted for any money: yet he brought riches and coverousnets into the Country, and filled the Lyfander. fame with all finerels, by bringing in great store of Gold and Silver from the wars, directly against the Laws and ordinances of Lycurgus. The which so long as they were in force and use, it appeared that the government of SPARTA seemed not to be a policy or Commonweal, but rappeared that the government of Spark I attended to the Poets feign, that Hercules rather a certain holy place and order of Religion. And even as the Poets feign, that Hercules went through the World with his Clob and Lyons skin, putilifying cruel robbers and unnatural into Sparta. Tyrants, to in like case, with a little scrole of Parchment, and a poor Cape, did the Spartans command and give Laws to all the reft of GREECE, even with their good liking and confent. And they chased the Tyrants away, which usurped tyrannical power over any of their Cities, and did decide all controversies, and offentimes pacified their feditions, without sending our one Souldier, but onely a simple poor Ambassador. At whose commandment, the people presently assembled like the Bees, which gather together about their King, fo food as they fey him: they did then fo greatly reverence the good government and inflice of the SPARIANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which say, the City of Lacabase Non could obey well, but not command: and for proof they alledge mode of King Therefore I can be Theopompus and for proof they alledge words of King Theopompus, who answered one which faid, that SPARTING was maintained, because the Kings could command well. Nay the rather (faid he) because the Kings could command well. Nay the rather (faid he) because the manding.

art of a good rider, is to make his Horfe gende, and ready at commandment: even so the chiefest due obedience.

procured, that not onely other prople did willingly obey their, but also defired to be ruled and commanded by them. For they asked them, neither Ships nor Money, nor yet did fend them any number of men of War to Tompell them; but onely (they lent one Chizen of Spart a to govern them, to whom all the other people submitted themselves, and were holpen by him in their necessitions. ty, as fearing and reverencing him. In this wife the SICILIANS were holpen by Gylipping, the CHALCIDONIANS by Brasmas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lysander, Cal-Iscratidus, and by Agefilaus, who were called the reformers and directors of Princes, Peoples and Kings, unto whom they were fent here and there; but ever they had their eye upon the City of SPARTA, as upon the most perfect pattern to order mans life by, and to govern a Commonweal after. To this effect tended the merry word spoken in jest by Stratonicus: who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their Sacrifices, and the ELIANS to tend their Games : and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDEMONIANS should be well whipped. That was merrily spoken, and in a jesting manner. But Antisthenes (the Philosopher and one of Socrates Scholars) Antisthenes, feeing the THEBANS grown very haughty and glorious, after that they had conquered the LA- Socrates Scho-CEDEMONIANS in the journey of LEUCTRES : Me thinketh , faith he, these THEBANS here lat's words. do like the School-boys, which brag and rejoyce, when they have a little beaten their Master. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to have his City to command many. But he thought the felicity of a City, as of a private man, confifted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, and in the unity of the Inhabitans thereof. He framed his Common-wealth to this end, that his Citizens should be nobly minded, content with their own, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintain and keep themselves long in safety. The self-same intention had Plate, Diogenes; and Zenon, in setting forth their Books, which they wrote of the Government of Common-wealths: and fo bad likewise many other great and learned men which have written of the same matter. Howbeit they onely left behind them words, and written Books : but Lycurgus contrariwise, left no written The foundation Books nor Pamphlets, but stablished and left behind him a royall form of Government, which on of a Comno man ever before had invented, nor never after could be followed. He hath made them plainly see a mon-weal, whole City live together, and govern it felf philosophically, according to the true rules and precepts of perfect wildom: which imagined that true wildom was a thing hanging in the air, and could not visibly be seen in the World. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glory all those, which ever took upon them to write or stablish the Government of a Common-weal. And therefore faith Ariffoile, that after his death they did him less honour in LACEDEMONIA, then he had deferved : albeit they did him all the honour they possibly could devise. And yet they built a Temple for him , and made folemn Sacrifice to him every year , as unto a god. More , they fay , that when Divine honors the after of this body were brought to SPARTA, there fell straight lightning upon his Tomb where to Lycurgus afthey were put; which they had not often feen to happen to other men of name after their decease, ter his death. faxing onely thinto Poet Earth ded, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried near the City of A-RETHUSA ... The which is some manifest argument ; for such as love the Poet , to lay against them that fomewhat depraye him, feeing this fign came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well-belowed man of the gods. Some fay , Lycargue died in the City of CIRRHA. But Apollothumis faith, the died in ELEDN. Times and Aristoxens write, he ended his days in CRE-TA. THE LIFE OF NUMA POMPILIUS.

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Christ.

In what time Nume was. Cic. de Or. 2. Halic lib.4.

HE Historiographers differ marvellously of the time in which Numa Pompilism reigned King, albeit some will derive from him many noble houses descended in ROME. For one Cledism who wrote the Book instituled , The Table of Time , affirmeth, that the ancient Registers of the City of ROME were loft when it was taken and facked by the GAULES : and that those which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men defirous to gratific some, which have thruft in ancient Honses and families of the first ROMANS, that concern nothing them whom they meant to represent. On the other side, although the common Opinion be that Numa was a familiar Friend and Scholar of Pythagoria the Philolo-pher, yet fome lay he was never learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greek Tongue. And yet maintaining that it is possible enough, that he was so well born, and had such perfection in all kind of vertue , that he never needed any Minfter , and though he had needed, they had rather Whether Pyattribute the honour of the instructing of this King unto some other sourcing person that was more thegans had excellent then Pythagoras. Others say, that Pythagoras the Philosopher was long sine; after the reignany convertation with Naof Numa, and well nigh five ages after him Howbeit others say, there was another Pythagoras born in SPARTA (who having won the prize in running at the games Olympicall, in the fixteenth Printegrat the Olympiad, and the third year of Nama's Reign) did come into IT ALY, where he kept much about Nama, and did affift and help him in the governing and ordering of his Realm. By means whereof, taught Nums there be many cultomes yet of the LACONIANS mingled with the ROMANS, which this fector at Rome.

Pythagorus was faid to have taught him. Neverthelets it is not confessed that Nums was born of the SABYNS , which they fay are defcended from the LACEDEMONIANS. So it falleth out hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for fuch as will follow the roll or table of those which from Olympiad's to Olympiad's have won the prizes of games Olympicall: confidering the roll or table that they have at this prefent, was very lately published by one Hippins an Elian, who delivereth no reason or argument of necessity why it should be taken for an undoubted troth, which he in that fort hath gathered. Yet we will not leave to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any means of King Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meeteff. It was now fince ROME was built feven and thirty years (for fo long time reigned Romulu) when Romulus the fifth of the moneth of July (which they call the Nones of the goats) made a folemn facrifice without the City, near to a certain place commonly called the goat marsh. As all the whole Senate, with the most part of the people were present at this facrifice, suddenly there arose in the ayr a very great tempest, and a marvellous dark thick cloud, which fell on the earth with such boisterous winds, storms, lightnings and thunder, that the poor common people being afraid of fo fore a tempest, dispersed themselves suddenly, running here and there for fuccour, and therewithall King Romulus vanished away in such fort, that he was never after seen alive nor dead. This brought the Senators and Noblemen whom they called Patricians, into great suspicion. And there ran a foul tale among the common people, how they had long time born very impatiently to be subjects to a King, because themselves would have had and taken upon them some Soveraign authority, and that for this cause they had killed King Romilius. Adding somewhat more unto it, how a little before he had used them more roughly, and commanded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Nevertheless they found the means to In the life of quench all those brutes and murmurings: by doing divine honour and facrifice unto him, as one Romades he is not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirm this, one of the noblest men among them called named Procus-Proclus came in, and by Oath affirmed before all the people that he faw Romnlus afcending up into Diffention at Heaven, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voice say, From thenceforth call him Quirinus. Rome about This being thus appealed there fprang up another trouble, to know whom they should choose in choosing of his place. For the strangers which were come then from other places to dwell in ROME, were their King. not yet throughly joyned to the naturall born ROMANES; Infomuch as the common people did not onely waver and stagger up and down in opinion, but the Senatours also (that were many, and of diverse Nations) did enter into a suspicion one of another. These things notwithstanding they all agreed in this, that of necessity they must choose a King; Howbeit in the rest they disfered much, not onely whom they should choose, but also of what Nation he should be. For those which were the first Founders and Builders of the City of Rome with Romelus, could in no wife abide nor fuffer that the SABYNS (to whom they had divided part of their Lands, and a moiety of their City) should attempt and presume to command them whom they did receive and affociate into their company and fellowship. The SABYNS alledged on the other fide for them, a good reason, and such as carried great probability. Which was that never fince the death of their King Tarins , they neither had in any thing disobeyed nor disquieted King Romalus, but had fuffered him to reign peaceably, and therefore Romalus being now deceased, reason would that the New King should be chosen of their Nation. And that albeit the ROMANS had received them into their City, they could not fay therefore that in time of this affociation, they were less to be reckoned of in any thing then themselves. Further they added, that in joyning with them the ROMANS had doubly encreased their might and power, and had made a body of a people which deserved the honour and Title of a City. These were the causes of their contention. But to prevent that of this contention there might grow no confusion in the City if it should remain without any head to command: The Senators which were a hundred and fifty in number, gave counsel that every one of them by turns, one after another, should carry the royall state of the King, and all the shews and ornaments of his Majesty, and should do Livy faith but the ordinary facrifices of the King, and dispatch all causes six hours in the day, and six hours a hundred. in the night, as the King before had used. Thus they thought it best to divide the rule, that one Dionysius 2000 might have as much power as the other, as well in respect of themselves as also for regard of the Plut in the life people. For they imagined that the changing and removing thus of this regall dignity, and passing agreeth with it from man to man, would clean take away envy among them, and make every of them to rule Dionylus. temperately, and uprightly fee, that in one and the felf fame day and night every of them should be a King and private person also. The ROMANS call this manner of Regiment in vacation Inter-Interregnum; regnum, as you would say, rule for the time. Now albeit their government was very modest and civill, yet they could not for all that keep themselves from falling into the suspicion and slander of the People; who gave it out straight, that this was a fine device of theirs, to change by this means the rule of the Realm into a few Noblemens hands, to the end that the whole authority and government of all publick causes should remain still in themselves, because it grieved them to be subject to a King. And in the end the two parts of the City came to this agreement, that the one part should choose one of the body of the other to be the King. This course they liked very well, as well for the pacification of present stir and differtion amongst themselves, as for procuring equality of affection, and feirring up a likeness of good-will in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen, whereby he should love the one part for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other part for that he was of their Nation. The SABYNS were the first which referred the Election to the ROMANS choice, and the ROMANS thought it better to choose one of the Nation of the SABYNS, then to have a ROMAN chosen by the SABYNS. After they had confulted they determined amongst themselves, and did choose Numa Pempilius one of the body of the SABY NS to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at ROME, how- Nums chofen beit he was a man to famous for his vertue, that the SABYNS to foon as they named him did King. receive him more willingly then they who had chosen him. In what time Numa Was. Cic. de Or. 2. & Tufc.4.Liv. Halic lib.a.

HE Historiographers differ marvellously of the time in which Numa Pompilisa reigned King , albeit fome will derive from him many noble houses descended in ROME. For one Cledien who wrote the Book intituled , The Table of Time , affirmeth, that the ancient Registers of the City of ROME were loft when it was taken and facked by the GAULES : and that those which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men defirous to gratific some, which have thrust in ancient Houses and families of the first ROMANS, that concern nothing them whom they meant to represent. On the other fide, although the common Opinion be that Name was a familiar Friendand Scholar of Pythagories the Philolo-pher , yet fome fay he was never learned , nor had any knowledge at all in the Greek Tongue. And yer maintaining that it is possible enough, that he was so well born, and had such perfection in all kind of vertue , that he never needed any Manter , and though he had needed, they had rather attribute the honour of the inftructing of this King unto some other foreign person that was more magnes had any converts excellent then Pythagores. Others Cay, that Pythagores the Philosopher was long time after the reign any converts. any converta-tion with Na- of Nama, and well nigh five ages after him Howbeit others fay, there was another Pythasoras born in SPARTA (who having won the prize in running at the games Olympicall, in the finteenth Printeeres the Olympical, and the third year of Nome's Reign) did come into ITALY, where he kept much about fector a spar-Nama, and did affift and help him in the governing and ordering of his Realm. By means whereof, there be many cultomes yet of the LACONIANS mingled with the ROMANS, which this fecond Pythagorae was faid to have taught him. Nevertheles it is not confessed that Nama was born of the Sabyns , which they fay are descended from the LACEDEMONIANS. So it falleth out hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for fuch as will follow the roll or table of those which from Olympiad's to Olympiad's have won the prizes of games Olympicall: confidering the roll or table that they have at this prefent, was very lately published by one Hippias an Elian, who delivereth no reason or argument of necessity why it should be taken for an undoubted troth, which he in that fort hath gathered. Yet we will not leave to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any means of King Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meeteft. It was now fince ROME was built feven and thirty years (for fo long time reigned Romulus) when Romulus the fifth of the moneth of July (which they call the Nones of the goats) made a folemn facrifice without the City, near to a certain place commonly called the goat marth. As all the whole Senate, with the most part of the people were pretent at this facrifice, suddenly there arose in the ayr a very great tempest, and a marvellous dark thick cloud, which fell on the earth with fuch boifterous winds, ftorms, lightnings and thunder, that the poor common people being afraid of so fore a tempest, dispersed themselves suddenly, running here and there for succour, and therewithall King Romulus vanished away in such fort, that he was never after feen alive nor dead. This brought the Senators and Noblemen whom they called Patricians, into great suspicion. And there ran a foul tale among the common people, how they had long time born very impatiently to be subjects to a King, because themselves would have had and taken upon them some Soveraign authority, and that for this cause they had killed King Romilius Adding somewhat more unto it, how a little before he had used them more roughly, and commanded them more straightly then he was wont or accustomed. Nevertheless they found the means to In the life of quench all those brutes and murmurings: by doing divine honour and facrifice unto him, as one Romata he is not dead, but passed to a better life. To confirm this, one of the noblest men among them called named Practice. Proclus came in, and by Oath affirmed before all the people that he faw Romalus afcending up into Diffention at Heaven, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voice say, From thenceforth call him Quirinus. Rome about This being thus appealed there fprang up another trouble, to know whom they should choose in choosing of his place. The SABYNS alledged on the other fide for them, a good reason, and such as carried great probability. Which was that never fince the death of their King Tating, they neither had in any thing disobeved nor disquieted King Remulus, but had futtered him to reign peaceably, and therefore Remulus being now deceased, reason would that the New King should be chosen of their Nation. And that albeit the ROMANS had received them into their City, they could not fay therefore that in time of this affociation, they were less to be reckoned of in any thing then themselves. The SABYNS were the first which referred the Election to the ROMANS choice, and the ROMANS thought it better to choose one of the Nation of the SABYNS, then to have a ROMAN chosen by the SABYNS. After they had confulted they determined amongst themselves, and did choose Numa Pempilius one of the body of the SABY NS to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at Rome, how. Now Numb Pompilitie was born in one of the chiefest and best Cities which the SABYNS had ? Numa born in called Gurery whereupon the ROMANS and their followers the SABYNS were called afterward the City of Quirites, and he was the Son of Pomponius a Nobleman, the youngest of four Brethren: being by Cures. the secret working of the gods born on the very day on the which ROME was founded by Romalus, Quirites why which was the one and twentieth day of April. This man being naturally given and inclined unto The life and lowering the lower all vertue, did yet increase the same by study, and all kind of good discipline, and by the exercise names of thereof, and of true patience and right Philosophy, he did marvellously adorn himself and his man. Name before ners. For her did not onely clear his foul and mind of all passions and vices commonly used in his reign-the world; but he conquered in himself all hears, violence and coverousness. And would neither feek nor usurp that which was another mans; a thing at that time honoured among the most barbarous people : but thought that to be the true and right victory in man , first to conquer and command himself by judgement and reason, and then to stibdue all covetousness and greedinels. Having therefore this Opinion he would in no wife have in his houle any superfluity of finenels. He became to every man that would employ him (as well stranger as his own Countreyman) a wife Counfellour and an upright Judge. He bestowed his leisure not to follow his own delight, or to gather goods together, but to ferve the gods, and to behold their celestiall nature and power, as much as mans reason and understanding could comprehend. Thereby he got so great a name and reputation, that Tatim (which was King of ROME with Romalm) having but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his Son in Law. Howbeit this Marriage put him in no fuch joility, that he would dwell at ROME with his Father in Law, but rather kept at home at his own house in the Countrey of the SARYNS, there to ferve and cherish his old Father with his wife Tatia; who for her part also liked better to live quietly with her husband being a private man, then to go to ROME where the might have lived in much honour and glory, by means of the King her Father. She died as it is reported 13 years after she was married : After her death Numa leaving to dwell in the City, was better contented to live in the Countrey alone, and folitary, and gave himself to walk much in the fields and woods confectated to the gods, as one defirous of alone lite, far from the company of men. Whereupon was raifed (in my opinion) that which is spoken of him, and of the goddels Egeria: That it was not for any strangeness or melancholiness of nature, that Numa withdrew himfelf from the conversation and company of men, but because he had found another more honourable and holy fociety of the Nymph, and goddels Egeria, who had done him (as they fay) that honour, as to make him her husband : with whom as his beloved darling it is faid he enjoyed happy daies, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the love and knowledge of all cele-Numa conver- stiall things. Surely these devices are much like unto certain old Fables of the Phrygians, which they having learned from the Father to the Son, do love to tell of one Agis, of the Bithmians, of one Herodotus; of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion, and of many other fuch like men, who in their lives were taken for Saints and beloved of the gods. Notwithstanding it is likely that the gods loye neither birds, nor horse, but men, and have sometimes a liking to be familiar with persect good men, and do not distain fometimes the conversation of such as be holy, religious, and devour. But to believe the gods have carnall knowledge, and do delight in the outward beauty of creatures, that feemeth to carry a very hard belief. Yet the wife EGYPTIANS think it probable enough and likely that the Spirit of the gods hath given original of generation to women, and do beget fruit of their Gods familiar bodies; howbeit they hold that a man can have no corporall company with any divine nature. Wherein they do not consider, that every thing that joyneth together doth deliver again alike substance to that were with it was joyned. This not withflanding, it is meet we should believe the gods bear good will to men, and that of it doth spring their love, whereby men say, the gods love those whose manners they purifie and inspire with vertue. And they do not offend which feign that Plorbas, Hyacynthus and Admetus were sometimes the lovers of Apollo , and also Hypolitus the SICYONIAN : of whom they report, that ever when he passed over the arm of the Sea which lieth between the

It is faid also that Pan was in love with Pindarus and his Verles, and that the godshonoured the Poets He flodm and Archileem, after their death , by the Mules. They fay moreover that Achilem lay with Sophocles in his life time, and at this day they do yet shew many tokens thereof; and after his death another god (as it is reported) made him to be honourably buried. Now if they grant that fuch things may be true, how can we refuse to beleeve, that some gods have been similar with Zaleucus, Miros, Zoroaftes, Lycurgus, Numa, and fuch other like personages, which have governed Kingdoms and stablished Common-weals? And it is not unlike that the gods indeed did company with them, to inspire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw near unto those Poets and plaiers of the harp that made and applied many dolefull and joyful Ditties, at the leaft for their sport and pleasure onely, if ever they came near them, Nevertheless if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large, as Bacchylides faid, to think and fay as he luft. For my felf, I do find that which is written of Lycurgus. Numa, and other fuch persons, not to be without likelihood and probability; who, having to govern rude, churlish, and stiff-necked people, and purposing to bring in strange novelties, into the governments of their Countreys, did feign wifely to have conference with the gods, confidering this feigning fell to be profitable and beneficiall to those themselves, whom they made to beleeve the same. But to return to our History : Numa was forty years old when the Ambaffadors of Rome were fent to prefent the Kingdom unto him, and to entreat him to accept thereof, Proclus and Velefus were the Ambaffadors that were fent. One of the which the people looked should have been chosen for King, because those of Romalus side did favour much Proclus, and those of Tatim part favoured Velefus. Now they used no long speech unto him, because they thought he would have been glad of fuch a great good fortune. But contrarily it was indeed a very hard thing, and required great perswasions, and much entreaty, to move a man which had always lived quietly and at ease, to accept the regiment of a City, which as a man would say had been raised up and grown by wars and martiall deeds. Wherefore he answered them in the presence of his Father, and another of his kinfmen called Marism in this fort: Change and alteration of mans life is ever dangerous; but The Oration for him that lacketh nothing necessary, nor hath cause to complain of his present state, it is a great of Numato for him that lacketh nothing necessary, nor name and to enter into another new and unknown, if the Ambashability to leave his old acquainted Trade of life, and to enter into another new and unknown, if the Ambashability to leave his old acquainted Trade of life, and to enter into another new and unknown, if there were no other but this onely respect, that he leaveth a certainty to venture upon uncertainty, to be king, However there is further matter in this, that the dangers and perils of this Kingdom which they offer me, are not altogether uncertain, if we will look back what happened unto Romalus, who was not unsuspected to have laid wait to have had Tatius his Fellow and Companion murthered. And now after Romules Death, the Senators felves are mistrusted to have killed him on the other fide by Treason . And yet they sav it, and sing it every where, that Romulus was the Son of a god. that at his Birth he was miraculously preserved, and afterwards he was as incredibly brought up: Whereas for my own part, I'do confess, I was begotten by a mortal man, and was fostered, brought up, and taught by men, as you know: And these sew qualities which they praise and commend in me, are conditions far unmeet for a man that is to reign. I ever loved a folitary life. quiet and study, and did exempt my self from worldly causes. All my life time I have sought and loved peace above all things, and never had to do with any wars. My convertation hath been to company with men which meet onely to ferve and honour the gods, or to laugh and be merry one with another, or else to spend their time in their private affairs, or otherwise sometime to attend their pastures and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romalus (my ROMAN Lords) hath left you many wars begun, which peradventure you could be contented to spare; yet now to maintain the fame, your city had need of a martiall King, active, and strong of body. Your people moreover, through long custom, and the great increase they are grown unto by seats of Arms, defire nought else perhaps but wars; and it is plainly feen they feek still to grow, and command their Neighbours: So that if there were no other confideration in it, yet were it a meer mockerie for me to go teach a City at this present to serve the gods, to love Justice, to have wars, and to fly violence; when it rather hath need of a conquering Captain, then of a peaceable King. These and such other like Reasons and Perswasions Numa alledged, to discharge himself of the Kingdom which they offered him. Howbeit the Ambassadors of the Romans most humbly befought and prayed him with all inftance possible, that he would not be the cause of another new ftir and commotion among them, feeing both parts in the City have given their confent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreover, when the Embaffadors had left him unon this Suit, his Father and Martins his kinfman', began also privately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good and godly an offer : And albeit he was contented with his present state. and defired to be no richer then he was, nor coveted no Princely honour nor glory, because he fought onely most famous vertue; yet he must needs think that to rule well, was to do the gods good fervice, whose will it was to employ the justice they knew in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (quoth they) this royal dignity , which to a grave and wise man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable works and fruits. There you may do noble fervice to the gods, to humble the hearts of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious. for they readily turn, and eafily conform themselves unto the nature of their Prince. They dearly loved Tatius although he was a stranger: they have consecrated a memory to Romulus with divine honours, which they make unto him at this day. And it may be that the people feeing themselves conquerours will be full enough of wars, and the ROMANS being now full of spoils and triumphs, will be glad to have a gentle Prince, and one that loved justice, that they may thenceforth live in peace under good and holy Laws. And yet if it be otherwise that their hearts be still full of heat and fury to fight; Is it not better to turn this their defire to make wars some other way, when a man hath the bridle in his own hands to do it, and to be a mean in the mean time to joyn the Countrey, and all the Nations of the SABY NS in perpetual love and amity, with fo mighty and flourishing a City? Befides all these perswasions and reasons there were many signs also (as they say) which promiled him good luck, together with the earnest affection and liking of his own Countrey Citizens: Who so soon as they understood the coming and commission of the Ambassadours of ROME, they importunately defired him to go thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdom; that he might more straightly unite and incorporate them together with the ROMANS. Whereupon Numa ac-Numa begincepted the Kingdom. Then after he had done facrifice to the gods, he fet forwards on his journey neth his Kingtowards Rome, where the people and Senate went out to meet him with wonderfull defire to fee dom with the him. The women at his entry went bleffing of him and finging of his praifes. They did facrifice fervice of the for him in all the Temples of the gods. There was neither man nor woman but feemed to be as gods. joyfull and glad as if a new Realm and not a new King, had been come to the City of ROME. Thus was he brought with this open joy and rejoycing unto the Market-place, where one of the Senators, which at that time was regent, called Spuring Verting, made them pronounce his open Election, and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voices of the people. Then were brought unto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himself commanded they should be staied a while, saying, he must be confirmed King by the gods: Then he took the Wisemen and Priests with whom he went up into the Capitoll, which at that time was yet called Mount Tarpeian; And there the chiefest of the Southsayers called Augures turned him towards the South, having his face covered with a veil, and flood behind him laying his right hand upon his head, and praying to the gods that it would pleafe them to declare their wills by confecrated by flying of birds, or some other token concerning this Election; and so the Soothsayer cast his eyes the Augures.

ing with great devotion what the iffue of this divination would be, untill there appeared unto them on the right hand, good and lucky birds, which did confirm the election. Then Numa putting on his royall robes, came down from Mount Tarpeian into the market-place, where all the people received him with wonderfull (thouts of joy, as a man the most holy and best beloved of the gods, that they could have chosen. So having taken the Royal Seat of the Kingdom, his first Act was this, That he discharged the guard of the three hundred Souldiers which Romalia had always about The guard of his person, called Ceteres, laying, He would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be king over people which should mistrust him. His second Act was, that he did add to the two Priefts of Inpirer and Mars, a third in the honour of Romulus who was called Flamen Querinalis. Numa. Flamen Quiri. For the ancient ROMANS also called their priests instituted in the old time, Flamines, by reason reamen Curre.

native inflitured of certain little narrow hats which they wear on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in Greek fignifieth a hat. And at that time (as they fay) there were many more Greek words mingled with the Latin, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did wear Lans. And 3, ba faith, that it is the very fame which the GRECIANS call Chlans, and that the young boy which was a servant in the Temple of Japiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS do yet call the god Mercury, because he is servant of the gods. Now Numa having done these things at his first entry into his Kingdom, still to win further favour and good will of the people, began immediately to frame his Citizens to a certain civility, being as iron wrought to foftnels, and brought them from their violent and warlike defires to temperate and civil manners : For out of doubt ROME was properly that which Plato afcribeth to a City full of trouble and pride. For first it was founded by the most couragious and warlike men of the world, which from all parts were gathered there together in a most desperate boldness, and afterwards it encreased and grew ftrong by arms and continual wars, like as piles driven into the ground, which the more they are rammed in , the further they enter, and flick the fafter. Wherefore Name judging it no small nor light enterprife, to pluck down the haughty stomacks of so fierce and violent a people, and to frame them unto a sober and quiet life, did feem to work it by means of the gods, with drawing them on thereto by little and little, and pacifying of their hot and fierce courages to fight, with Sacrifices, Fealts , Dancings , and common Proceffions , wherein he celebrated ever himself. In the which , together with their devotion, there was mingled now and then pastime and pleasure, and sometimes he laid the terrour and fear of the gods before their eyes, making them beleeve that he had feen Rrange Visions, or that he had heard Voices, by which the gods did threaten them with some great troubles and plagues, alwaies to pull down and humble their hearts unto the fear of the gods. This was the cause why they thought afterwards that he had learned his wisdom of Pythagoras the Philosopher; because the greatest part of the Philosophy of the one, and of the government of the other, confisted in such Ceremonies and divine Studies. They report also that Numa did put on the the state of Pythagoras holines, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras (as they say) made an Tagle to tame and gentle, that the would stoop and come down to him by certain voices, as the flew in the air over his head; And that passing through the Assemtutions much bly of the games Olympical, he shewed her thigh of gold, and many other pretty feats and deeds they tell off , which feemed to be wonderfull , and for which Timen Philasian hath written these Verfes of him: Pythagoras which loved to dwell in dignity,

And hath an heart to glory bent, and past in policy. Much like a man which fought, by charming to enchaunt Did ufe this art, to Win mens minds, which unto him did haunt : His grave and pleasant tongue, in sugred speech did flow, Whereby he drew most minds of men, to bent of his own bow.

Even so the feigned fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the love of a goddels, or some Nymph of the Mountain: with whom he seemed to have certain secret meetings and talk, whereof we have spoken before. And it is said, he much frequented the Muses in the woods. For he would fay, he had the most part of his revelations of the Muses, and he taught the ROMANS to reverence one of them above all the rest, who was called Tacira, as ye would say, Lady Silence. It feemeth he invented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did to specially command and recommend filence unto his Scholars. Again, if we confider what Numa ordained concerning Images. and the representation of the gods, it is altogether agreeable unto the doctrine of Pythagoru: who thought that God was neither sensible nor mortall, but invisible, incorruptible, and onely intelligible. And Numa did forbid the ROMANS also to beleeve, that God hath ever form or likeness of beaft or man. So that in those former times, there was in ROME no Image of God, either painted or graven; and it was from the beginning a hundred threefcore and ten years, that they had built Temples and Chappels unto the gods in ROME, and yet there was neither Picture nor Image of God within them. For they took it at the first for a facriledge, to present heavenly things by earthly forms, feeing we cannot possibly any way attain to the knowledge of God, but in mind and understanding. The very Sacrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreeable and like unto the manner of ferving of the Gods, which the Pathagorians used. For in their Sacrifices they fpile not the bloud, but they did theirs commonly with a little Meal, a little shedding of Wine and Milk, and with fuch other light things. Such as affirm that those two men did much company and were familiar together, do lay further proofs and arguments for the fame. The furft is this: that the Proofs for the ROMANS did make Pythagorus a free-man of the City of ROME, as Epicharmus the Comicall Poet convertation an ancient Writer (and fometimes one of Pythagoras Scholars) faith in a Book he wrote and dedi- of Numu and cated unto Antenor. The other proof is : that Number having had four Children , called one of Politicaria. them Mamereus, after Pythagorus Sons Name; from whom, they fay, is descended the house of the Amilsans, which is the Noblest of the Patricians: For the King gave him the Name Amilim, because of his sweet tongue and pleasant voice. Furthermore, I my self have heard say many times in ROME, that the ROMANS having received an Oracle, which commanded them to fet up Images in their City, to the wifest and valiantest man that ever was among the GRECIANS, caused two Statues of Brass to be set up in their market-place, the one of Pythagora, the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to strive about this matter any further, seeing there are so many doubts, me thinketh it were but vain. Moreover they attribute to Numa, the first erection of the Colledge Pontificall: and fay, he himself was the first Pontifex that ever was. But touching the Name of Pontifex, Numa, inflituficall: and fay, he himlelt was the mrit Pointstex that ever was. But touching the readile of rontifex, fome will fay they were fo called, because they chiefly were ordained and appointed for the service tech Bishops, fome will fay they were for called, because they chiefly were ordained and appointed for the service tech Bishops. of the Almighty: for this word Potens in the ROMAN tongue, betokeneth mighty. Other fo called think this Name was given to them by their founders, as to exempt perfons out of the world : who enjoyned them to do all their service and sacrifices to the gods they could possibly, and yet notwithstanding, if they had any other lawfull let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most part do bring out another derivation of this Name, wherein methinks there is little reason. As that they should be called Pontificer, because they had the charge and maintenance of the Bridge. For that which the GRECIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Poniem, that is, a Bridge. And to fay truly, the charges of repairing the Bridge, belongeth to the Bishops : as well as the keeping of the most holy and unchangeable Ceremonies, For the ROMANS thought it not onely a thing unlawfull, but took it for a most damnable and wicked act, to destroy or break the Bridge of wood, which was onely joyned together (asthey fay) with pins of wood, and without any Iron at all, by the Commandment of an old Oracle. But the thone Bridge was built long time after the Reign of Nama, and in the time of the Reign of his The wooden Nephew Marius. Now the first and chiefest of these Bishops, which they call the great Ponti- Bridge at Rone fex, hath the place, Authority, and Dignity of the High-prieft and Mafter of their pontifical The high Bi-Law: who should be carefull, not only about all publick facrifices and Ceremonies, but also about fuch as were private, and to see that no man privately should break the ancient Ceremonies, nor bring in any new thing into Religion, but rather every man should be taught by him, how, and after what fort he should serve and honour the gods. He also bath the keeping of the holy Virgins which they call Vestales. For they do give Numa the first foundation and confecrating of The institution them, and the inflitution also of keeping the immortal fire with honour and reverence, which these of the Vettal Virginshave the charge of. Either for that he thought it meet to commit the substance of fire Nuns. (being pure and clean) unto the custody of clean and uncorrupt Maids : or else because he thought The holy and the nature of fire (which is barren, and bringeth forth nothing) was fitteft and most proper unto Virgins. For in GREECE, where they kept continual fire likewife (as in the Temple of Apollo in DELPHOS, and at ATHENS) the Maidens do not keep the fame, but old Women which are past Marriage. And if this fire chance to fall , as they fay in ATHENS the holy Lamp was put out in the time of the Tyranny of Arifion: and in the City of DELPHOS it was put out, when the Temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME also, in the time of the wars that the ROMANS had against the King Mitbridates : and in the time of the civil wars, when Altar, fire, and all were burnt and confumed together: they fay that it must not be lighted again with other common fire, but must be made anew, with drawing clean and pure slame from the beams of the Sun, and that they do in this manner. They have a hollow veffell made of a piece of a triangle, How the holy having a corner right, and two fides alike: to that from all parts of his compats and circumference, fire is drawn having a corner right, and two nucesance; to that from an parts of the companisance cummerciace, it falleth into one point. Then they fer this veffel right against the beams of the Sun, fo that the from the pure it falleth into one point. bright Sun beams come to affemble and gather together in the center of this veffell, where they Sun. do pierce the air so strongly, that they set it on fire; and when they put to it any dry matter or fubfilance, the fire taketh it straight, because the beam of the Sun, by means of the Reverberation, putteth that dry matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some think that these Veftal Virgins keep no other thing but this fire, which never goeth out. Other fay, there are other See the lite of Holy things also, which no body may lawfully fee but they: whereof we have written more largely Camillus in the life of Camillus, at the leaft fo much as may be learned and told. The first Maidens which touching the were vowed and put into this order of Religion by Numa, were (as they say) Gegania and Verenia: Veital Runs. and after them, Canulcia and Tarpeia. Afterwards King Servine increased the number with two pointed the other, and that number of four continueth unto this day. Their rule and order fet down by King Pointea in Numa was this : that they should vow chastity for the space of thirty years. In the first ten years Numa. they learn what they have to do: the next ten years following, they do that which they have learned : and the last ten years, they teach young novices. After they have passed their thirty years, they may lawfully marry if they be disposed, and take them to another manner of life, and leave their Religion. But as it is reported, there have been very few of them which have taken this liberry, and fewer also which have joyed after they were professed, but rather have repented themselves, and lived ever after a very grievous and forrowfull Life. This did fo fray the other Veftals, that they were better contented with their vowed chaftitie; and so remained Virgins, untill they were old or elfe died. He gave them also great priviledges and prerogatives : as , to make their Wili and Testament in their Fathers life time: to do all things without any Guardian or Overfeer, as Wemen which have three Children at a Birth. When they go abroad, they carry Maces before them to honour them. And if by chance they meet any offender in their way going to execution, they fave his life. howbeit the professed Vestall must affirm by Oath, that she met him unawares, and not of set purpofe. If any man prefume under their chair, whereupon they are carried through the City, be shall die for it. Also when they themselves do any fault, they are corrected by the great Bishop, who fometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and quality of their offence) in a who ionicumes done with the last hat deflowered her Virginity, is buried quick by one dark place and under a curren. But the that hath deflowered her Virginity, is buried quick by one of the gates of the City, which they call Colling gate: where within the City there is a Mount of earth of a good length, and with the LATINS is faid to be raifed. Under this forced Mount, they make a little hollow vault, and leave a hole open, whereby one may go down: and within it there is fer a little bed, a burning Lamp, and some victuals to sustain life withall. As a little Bread, a little Water, a little Milk, and a little Oyl, and that for Honours fake: to the end they would not be thought to ramish a body to Death, which had been confecrated by the most Foly and devour Ceremonies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a Litter, which they cover ftrongly, and close it up with thick leather, in such fort, that no body can so much as hear her voice, and so they carry her thus thut up through the market-place. Every one draweth back, when they fee this Litter aiar off, and do give it place to pass by; and then follow it mourningly with heavy looks, and speak never a word. They do nothing in the City more fearfull to behold, then this: neither is there any day wherein the people are more forrowfull, then on fuch a day. Then after the is come to the place of this vault, the Sergeants straight unlose these fast bound Coverings: and the chief Bishop after he hath made certain secret prayers unto the gods, and lift Coverings: and the third Diniopanter in him made very the condemned Veftall, murified up close, and so his hands up to Heaven, taketh out of the Litter the condemned Veftall, murified up close, and so puteth her upon the Ladder, which conveyeth her down into the vault. That done, he withpontent ner upon the Laurer, which him: and when the filly offendour is gone down, they straight pluckup the Ladder, and cast abundance of earth in at the open hole, so that they fill it up to the The Temple Pluck up the Laurer, and this is the punishment of the Vistals which defile their Virginity. fencet the fi- They think also it was Numa that built the round. Temple of the goddels Vefta, in which is kept the everlatting fire: meaning to represent not the form of the earth, which they say is Vifta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middeft whereof (according to the Pythagereans opinion) remainngure of the whole works, in the induction which they call Vifta, and name it the Unity. For eth the proper feat and obtding place of fire, which they call Vifta, and name it the Unity. For they are of Opinion, neither that the Earth is unmoveable, nor yet that it is fet in the middeft of the world, neither that the Heaven goeth about it: but fay to the contrary, that the Earth hangeth in the air about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they grant, that the Earth is one of the first and chiefest parts of the world : as Plato held Opinion in that age, the Earth was in another place then the very middeft, and that the center of the world, as the most honourablest place, did appertain to some other of more worthy substance then the Earth. Furthermore, the Bishops office was to shew those that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and customs of buriall: whom Nama taught not to beleeve that there was any corruption or dishonesty in burials, but rather it was to worthip and honour the gods of the Earth, with usuall and Honourable Ceremonies, as those which after their Death receive the chiefest service of us they can. But above all other in burials, they did specially honour the goddess called Libitina, that is said, the chief Governour and perferver of the rites of the Dead : or be it Proferpina, or Venus, as the most Learned men among the ROMANS do judge, who not without cause do attribute the Cider of the beginning and end of mans Life, to one self God, and power Divine. Numa Ordained also, how long time every body (hould Mourn in black. And for a Child from three years to ten years of age, that died : he Ordained they should mourn no more moneths then it had lived years, and not to add a day more. For he commanded, that the longest time of Mourning shall be but ten moneths onely, and fo long time at the leaft he willed the Women should remain widows, after the decease of their Husbands: or else she that would Marry within that time, was bound by his Order to facrifice a whole Bullock. Numa also erected many other Orders of Priests: of two forts whereof I will only make mention. The one shall be the Order of the SALII, and the other of the FIGURE 1. FECIALES: for me thinks, both the one and the other doth manifestly shew the great holines, 61. Gell. 10. 10 FECIALES for me climas, both the one and the other word manners, men and fingular devotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly those, which the GREF feciales called CIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would say, peace-keepers. And in my judgement, they freensbylace. Irenophyluces. had their right Name according to their Office, because they did pacific quarrels with reason by way of Order, and did not fuffer (as much as in them lay) that any matter should be tried by violence, until they were past all hope of any peace. For the Grecians call it properly Irenen, - when both parties agree, and decide their controversie with reason, and not with sword. Even so those which the ROMANS called the Feei, les, went many times in person to those that did the ROMANS injury, and fought to perfivade them with good reason, to keep promise with the ROMANS and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeeld to reason whom they fought to perfeade, then they called the gods to the winness thereof, and prayed them, that if they did not most earnestly incense the ROMANS, to pursue that most justly appertained unto their right, that all evils and mischiefs of the wars might fall upon themselves and on their Countrey.

This done, they did threaten open wars against fuch enemies. And if the FECIALES would not consent to open wars, and did happen to speak against them, it was not lawfull in that case, neither for private person, nor for the King himself to make any wars : But like a just Prince, he must have leave by their sufferance to make the wars. Then did he consider and consult, by what means he might best procure and prosecute the same. Concerning this matter, they judge that the ill hap which came to the ROMANS, when the City of ROME was taken and facked by the GAULES, chanced justly for breaking of this holy institution. For at that time the barbarous people belieged the City of the CLUSINIANS : and Gabine Ambustus was sent Ambassador unto them, to fee if he could make peace between them. The barbarous people gave him an ill answer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embassie had been ended, and being somewhat hot and rash in defence of the CLUSINIANS, gave defiance to the valiantest GAULE there, to fight with him man to man. Fortune favoured him in this challenge; for he flew the GAULE, and stripped him in the field. The GAULES feeing their man flain, fent immediately an Herald to ROME to accuse Fabius, how against all right and reason he began wars with them, without any open Proclamation made before. The FECIALES being then consulted with thereabout, did declare, he ought to be delivered into the hands of the GAULES, as one that had broken the Law of Arms, and had deferved it : but he made friends to the people which favoured him very much , and by their means escaped his delivery and punishment: Nevertheless, the Gaules within short time after, came before ROME with all their power; which they took, facked and burnt every whit, faving the Ca- Rome taken by pitoll, as we have written more amply in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Priefts that the Gaules. were called Salif, they say he did institute them upon this occasion: In the eight year of his raign, Tife there came a pestilent disease through all Italy, and at the length it crept also into Rome: Whereat The Instituevery man being greatly afraid and discouraged, they say there fell from Heaven a Target of Cop- tion of the per, which lighted between the hands of Nums. They tell hereof a wonderfull rale, which the Salli. King himself affirmed he heard of the Nimph Egeria, and the Muser; to wit, that this Target was heaven, fent from Heaven, for the health and prefervation of the City : and therefore he should keep it carefully, and cause eleven other to be cast and made, all like unto the same in fashion and greatness to the end that if any would enterprise to steal it, be should not know which of them to take for the right Target. Moreover he said, he was commanded to consecrate the place to the Mases (in the which he did oftentimes company with them) and also the fields which were near thereabouts: and likewife to give the Fountain that fprang in that place, unto the Vestals professed, that every day they might draw water at that Well, to wash the Sanctuary of their Temple. The success hereof proved his words true, for the fickness ceased incontinently. So he affembled all the chief Craftsmenthen in ROME, to prove which of them would take upon him to make one like unto that. Every man despaired to perform it. Howbeit one called Veturiu Mamurius (the excellentest Workman that was in those days) did make them all so suit-like, that Nama himself did not know the first Target, when they were all laid together : So be ordained the Priefts Salii, to have the custody of Whereof they thele Targets, to fee them fafe kept. They were called Salii, not after the name of Salian born were called in SAMOTHRACIA, or in MANTINEA, as some have untruly alledged, who first invented the Salii. manner of dancing all armed : but they were so called, of their fashion and manner of dancing and leaping. For in the Moneth of March, they go skipping and leaping up and down the City with those Targets on their arms, apparelled in red Cassocks without sleeves, and girded about with broad leather sword girdles, studded with Copper, having Helmets of Copper on their heads, and striking upon their Targets with short Daggers, which they carry in their hands. Moreover, all their dancing confifteth in moving of their feet: for they handle them finely, making turnes above ground and beneath, with a fudden measure, and a marvellous force of agility. They call these Targets An- Anyliawhere cylia, because of their fashion, which is not altogether compass: for they are not all round as other of so called. common Targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many folds, and one to near another, that altogether they come to a certain wreathed form, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon. Or elfe they are to called, because Ancon fignifieth an elbow, upon which they carry them. All these derivations are written in the History of Juba, who in any case will have this word Ancylia to be drawn out of the Greek tongue. And it may be also they were so called , because the first came from above , which the GRECIANS call Anacathen : or else for healing the fick, which is called Acefis: or else for ceasing of the dryness, which in Greek is called Anchmon Lyfis: or for the ending of all diseases and evils, for which cause the ATHENIANS call Castor and Pollnx, Anaca: if they lust to give this word his derivation from the Greek tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the Goldsmith had for making of these Targets was, that the Salii unto this day do make mention of him in their Song, which they fing going through the City, and dancing of their dance all armed , Howbeit Some think they say not Veturius Mamurius , but veterem memo- Regis the ziam, ancient memory. But Numa after he had ordained and inflitted these orders of Priests, built Kings palace. bis Palace near unto the Temple of Westa, which holdeth his Name Regia at this day, that is to say, the Kings Palace : In which he remained most part of his life , studying either to facrifice to the gods, or to teach the Priefts, what they should do, or how with them he should best contemplate all hea- The manner venly things. the gods, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing; but they thought The Pythogo- meet, that men should of purpose go out of their houses, to serve and pray unto them. Even so King Numa thought it not meet, that his subjects should come to see and hear Divine Service negligently, 25 it were for a fashion, and onely to be rid of it, as heeding another thing: but he would have them fet afide all other business, and employ their thoughts and hearts onely upon the principall service of Religion and devotion towards the gods. So that during Service time, he would not have heard any noise, any knocking, bouncing, or any clapping, as they commonly hear in all Artificers shops of occupation, whereof at this day they see some figns and tokens remaining in their Sacrifices at ROME. For all the time the Augur beholdeth the flying of the Birds, or that he is doing any Sacrifice, the Vergers ery aloud; Hoc age, which meaneth, Tend this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to call their wits home, and to think on that which is in hand, Alfo there are many of his Orders like the Precepts of the Pythagoreans: For as they did warn men, In hmilitude of Numa not to fit upon a little bushell, not to cut fire with a Sword, not to look behind them when they time of Numi not to in upon a mile Coelettial gods in odd number, and to the gods of the Earth in an and Pythagores go abroad: to facrifice to the Coelettial gods in odd number. even number, of which Precepts they would not have the common people to have any knowledge or understanding. Even so there are many Institutions of Numa, the reasons whereof are hidden and kept feeret: as not to offer Wine to the gods of the Vine never cut, and not to facrifice unto and represented as not to one of the authority and to surn a turn about when they do reverence to the gods, and to fit down after they have worthipped them. And as touching the two first Ordinances, it feemeth that by them he did recommend elemency and humanity, as being a part of the devotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willerh them to make that worthip the gods, they fay it prefenteth the turning which the Element maketh by his moving. But methinketh is should rather come of this: for that the Temples being fet to the East, he that worshippeth entring into the Temple, sheweth his back to the West, and for this cause turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth again towards God; doing the whole turn, and ending the confurmation of his Prayer, by this double adoration which he maketh before and behind. Unless peradventure that he meant secretly to fignific, and give them to understand by this turning and changing of their look, that which the ÆGYPTIANS figured by their wheels: in flowing thereby, that these worldly things were never constant and in one state : and therefore, that we should take it thankfully, and patiently bear it, in what fort soever it pleased God to change or alter our life: And where he commanded that they should fit after they had worshipped God: they faid it was a token of a good hope unto them that prayed that their prayers should be exalted, and that their goods should remain safe, and flick by them. Other fay, that this eafe and fitting, is a feparating them from doing: and therefore he would they should fit in the Temples of the gods, to shew they had done that which they had in hand before, to the end to take of the gods the beginning of another. And it may well be also that it was referred to the thing we spake of a little before: that Numa would accustom his people, not to ferve the gods, nor to speak to them at all, as they passed by, or did any other thing, or were in hafte: but would have them pray unto the gods when they had time and By whatmeans leifure, and all other business at that time set apart. By this good instruction and training them unto Religion, the City of ROME by little and little came to be fo tractable, and had the great power of King Numa in fuch admiration, that they took all to be as true as the Gospel that he spake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, then tales devised of pleasure. Furthermore, Numa made they thought nothing incredible, or unpossible to him, if he would have it. And for proof herethe Romans quiet and of, there goeth a tale of him, that he having bidden a great company of the Chizens of Rome Numer's speaks to come and sup with him, caused them to be served with plain gross meat, and in very poor inquisit of gentle. The wonders and homely veriels: And when they were fet, and began to fall to their meat, he cast our words fuddenly unto them, bow the goddess with whom he accompanied, was come to see him even at that inftant, and that fuddenly the Hall was richly furnished, and the Tables covered with all forts ing with Juof excellent fine and delicate meats. Howbeit this far passed all the vanity of lying, which is found written of him about his speaking with Jupiter. The hill Aventine was not at that time inhabited, nor inclosed within the walls of ROME, but was full of springs and shadowed groves, whither commonly repaired to folace themselves, the two gods, Pieus and Faunus, which otherwife might be thought two Satyrs, or of the race of the Titanians: faving it is faid, that they went through all ITALY, doing the like wonders and miracles in physick, charmes and art magick, which they report of those the GRECIANS call Idaes Dastyles. There they say that Numa took them both, having put into the spring both Wine and Honey, where they used to drink. When they faw that they were taken, they transformed themselves into divers forms, disguising and disfiguring their natural shape, into many terrible and fearfull sights to behold. Nevertheless in the end, perceiving they were so fast, as to escape there was no reckoning: they revealed unto him many things to come, and taught him the purifying against lightening and thunder, which they make yet at this day with Onions, Hair and Pilchers. Other fay, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Jupiter out of Heaven with their conjuring and magick: whereat Jupiter being offended, answered in choler, that he should make it with heads:

But Numa added straight, of Onions: Jupiter replied, of Men. Then Numa asked him again, to take a little away of the cruely of the commandment; what Hairs? Inpiter answered, quick place was called Ilicium. For Ilcos in the Greek tongue fignifieth appealed and favourable: and this purifying was afterwards made in that fort. These tales not onely vain, but full of mockery also, do shew us yet plainly the zeal and devotion men had in those times towards the gods, unto which Numa through custom had won them. And as for Numa himself, they say that he so firm-Iv put all his hope and confidence in the help of the gods, that one day when he was told his enemies were in Arms against him , he did but laugh at it , and answered , And I do sacrifice. It is he (as some say) that first built the Temple to Faith and Terme, and which made the ROMANS un. Roma built lemples to derstand that the most holy and greatest Oath they could make, was to swear by their faith, which Faith and they keep yet at this day. But Terme which fignifieth bounds, is the god of confines or borders, un- Term. to whom they do facrifice both publickly and privately, upon the limits of inheritance, and now they facrifice unto him live Beafts. Howbeit in old time they did facrifice unto him without any bloud. through the wife Institution of Numa, who declared and preached unto them, that this god of bounds was fincere and upright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witness of justice and keeper of peace. D. was he which in my opinion did first limit out the bounds of the Territory of ROME, Numa made peace. U. was he which in my opinion and first limit out the bounds of the letthousy of Rome, which R mulm would never do, for fear left in bounding out his own he should confess that which the bounds of the Territory the occupied of other mens. For bounding and measuring, to him that will keep it justly, is a bond of Rome. that bridleth power and desire, but to him that forceth not to keep it, it is a proof to shew his injustice. To fay truly, the Territory of ROME had no great bounds at the first beginning, and Romuliu had got by conquest the greatest part of it, and Numa did wholly divide it unto the needy Numa advan-Inhabitants to releeve them, and to bring them out of poverty (which carrieth men headlong into eeth tillage, mifchief, and discourageth them to labour) to the end that plowing up the faid Land, they should also plow up the weeds of their own barrenness, to become civil and gentle. For there is no exercife nor occupation in the world which fo suddenly bringeth a man to love and defire quietness. as doth husbandry and tillage, and yet to defend a mans own, there is in it courage and hardiness to fight. But greedy defire, violently to take from others, and unjustly to occupy that is none of theirs, is never in right husbandmen. And therefore Nama having brought in husbandry amongst his Subjects, as a medicine and mean to make them love quietness, was desirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make them humble and gentle of condition, then to encrease them in riches. He divided all the Territory of ROME into certain parts which he called Pagot, as much to fay, as Villages: And in every one of them he ordained comptrollers and vifitors, which should survey all about, and he himself sometimes went abroad in person, conjecturing by their labour the manners and nature of every man. Such as he found diligent he advanced them unto honour, and gave them countenance and authority; Others which he faw flothfull and negligent, by rebuking and reproving of them, he made them amend. But amongst all his Ordinances which Nums divided he made, one above all the rest carried the praise, and that was, that he divided his people into fun- his people into dry occupations. For the City of ROME feemed yet to be made of two Nations , as we have faid fundry occubefore; and to speak more properly, it was made of two Tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one, being altogether impossible to take away all factions, and to make there should be no quarrels nor contentions between both parts. Wherefore he considered that when one will mingle two bodies or fimples together, which for their hardness and contrary natures cannot well fuffer mixture : then he breaks and beats them together as small as may be. For so being brought into a smaller and lesser powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Even so he thought it was best to divide the people also into many small parts; by means whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more eafily take away the first and the greatest part, when it should be divided and separated thus into fundry forts. And this division he made by arts and occupations; as Minstrels, Goldsmiths, Carpenters, Diers, Shoemakers, Tawers, Tanners, Bellfounders, and pot-makers, and fo forth through other crafts and occupations. So that he brought every one of these into one body, and company by it self, and ordained unto every particular myftery or craft, their Feafts, Affemblies, and Services, which they should make unto the gods, according to the dignity and worthiness of every occupation : And by this means he first took away Numa took all faction, that neither fide faid, nor thought any more, those are SABYNS, these are RO- away the sa-MANS, thele are of Tatim, thele are of Romalus. Infomuch as this division was an incorpora- ctions of Roting, and an uniting of the whole together. Among other his Ordinances, they did much commend mulus and his reforming of the Law, that gave liberty unto Fathers to fell their children. For he did except children already married, so they were married with their Fathers consent and good-will, judging it to be too cruell and over hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had married a Free-man, should find her felf to be the wife of a bondman. He began also to mend a little the Calendar, not so exactly as he should have done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the Reign of Romules they used the moneths consusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them twenty daies and less, and others 3 y daies and more, without knowing the difference between the course of the Sun and the Moon : and onely they observed this rule that there was 360 daies The ordinance in the year. But Numa confidering the inequality stood upon eleven daies, for that the twelve Re- of the moneths volutions of the Moon are run in 354 daies, and the Revolution of the Sun in 365 daies, he doub- Inflitution led the 11 daies, whereof he made a moneth, which he placed from two years to two years after Macr.1. Set 23 the moneth of February , and the ROMANS called this Moneth put beween Mercidinum , which had 22 daies. And this is the correction that Numa made, which fince hath had a far better amendment. He did also change the order of the Moneths. For March which before was the first, he made it now the third, and January the first, which under Romulus was the eleventh, and February the twelfth and laft. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two January and February. For the ROMANS at the beginning had but ten moneths in the year, as some of the verify counted barbarous people make but three moneths for their year. And the ARCADIANS amongst the GRECIANS have but four moneths for their year. The ACARNANIANS have fix to the year, And the AGYPTIANS had first but one moneth to their year, and afterwards they made four moneths for their year. And this is the cause why they seem (albeit they inhabit a new countrey) to be nevertheless the ancientest people of the world; For that in their Chronicles they reckon up fuch infinite number of years as those which count the Moneths for the years. And to prove this true, that the ROMANS at the beginning had but ten moneths in the year, and not twelve, it is easie to be judged by the name of the last, which they call at this day December. And that the moneth of March was also the first, may be conjectured by this, for the fifth moneth after that is yet called Quintilis, the fixth Sextilis, and so the other in order following the numbers. For if Jayer cance Zumius, me nam oranis, and to the one of July which they call Zunnary and February had then been the first, of necessity the moneth of July which they call Zunnary and February had then been the first, of necessity the moneth of July which they call Zunnary and February had then been the first, of necessity the moneth of July which they tilu, must have been named September; considering also that it is very likely that the moneth which Remulse had dedicated unto Mars, was also by him ordained to be the first. The second was April, fo called of the name Aphrodite, that is to fay, Venue, unto whom they make open facrifice in this Moneth. And on the first day of the same, women do wash themselves, having a garland of myrtle upon their heads. Howbeit some other say, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was onely called Aprilia, because then is the chiefest force and strength of the Spring, at which feafon the earth doth open, and the feeds of plants and hearbs begin to bud and fhew forth, which *Peradvenure of Maia the mother of Mercury, unto whom the * Moneth is confectated. The moneth of June is fo called also, because of the quality of that season, which is as the youth of the year. Although fome will fay that the Moneth of May was named of this word Maiores, which fignifieth as much as the elders; and the Moneth of June of Juniores, which fignifies the younger men. All the other following were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilia, Sextilia, Stnonowing were named in our mine of the name of the printing was after called Inline of the name of fay , of the Julius Casar, who sew Pompeius, and Sextilis was named Angustus of Ottavius Casar his Succetfor in the Empire, who was also furnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they name of Juno. Stiould call the two moneths following (which are September and October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitiansus, But that held not long: For fo foon as Domitians was killed, the moneths recovered their ancient names again. The two last moneths onely have ever continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the leaft translated, the moneth of February doth fignifie as much as purging, or at leaft the derivation of the word found-* Some of the eth near it. In this moneth they do facrifice of plants, * and do celebrate the Feaft of the Luper-Some of the Scales, in which there are many things agreeable and like to the Sacrifices made for purification. Greeian Co. CALES, in which there are many things agreeable and like to the Sacrifices made for purification. Please of January, was called after the name of January. Wherefore methinks that Nama place of the state of the same of January. place estrois took away the moneth of March from the first place, and gave it unto January; because he would as much as to have peace preferred before war, and civil things before martiall. For this Janus (were he fay for the King or demi-god) in the former age was counted very civil and politick: For he changed the life of men which before his time was rude, cruell, and wild, and brought it to be honeft, gentle, and civil. For this cause they do paint his Image at this day with two faces, the one before and the other behind, for thus changing the lives of men. And there is in ROME a Temple dedicated unto him, which hath two doors, that be called the doors of war; for the cultom is to open them, when the ROMANS have any wars in any place, and to flut them when they be at peace. To Why Fanus is At what time Have them shut it was a rare thing to see, and happened very seldom, by reason of the greatness painted with of their Empire, which on all fides was environed with barbarous Nations, whom they were compelled to keep under with force of armes. Notwithstanding it was once shut up in the time of Asthe temple of guffur, after he had flain Antony; and once before also in the year when Marcin Attilius and Fanus is shut The Romaner Tisus Manlius were Confuls. But that continued not long, for it was opened again incontinently, had no wars in by reason of wars that came upon them soon after. Howbeit during the Reign of Nama, it was never one day opened, but remained thut continually by the space of three and source, years together. For all occasions of wars were then utterly dead and forgotten, because at Rome the peoall Numa's ple were not onely through the examples of Juftice, clemency, and the goodness of the King, brought to be quiet, and to love peace, but in the Cities thereabouts there began a marvellous change of manners, and alteration of life, as if some gentle air had breathed on them, by some gracious and healthfull wind blown from RDME to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens minds such a hearty defire to live in peace, to till the ground, to bring up their children, and to ferve the gods truly, that almost through all ITALY there was nothing but Feasts, Plays, Sacrifices and Banquets. The people did traffique and frequent together without fear or danger, and vifited one another, making great chear; as if out of the fpringing Fountain of Numa's wildom many pretty brooks and streams of good and honest life had run over all ITALY, and had watered it; and that the mildenels of his wildom had from hand to hand been difperfed through the whole world ; Infomuch as the over-excellive speeches the Poets accustomably do use were not sufficient enough to express

There, Spiders weave, their cobnebs day and night In harnesses, which wont to serve for war: There canker' drust doth fret the steel full bright Of trenchant blades, well whet in many a jar. There, mighty Spears for lack of use are eaten. With rotter worms ; And in that countrey there, The braving tromp doth never feem to threaten Their quiet ears with blafts of bloudy fear. There, in that land no drowfie fleep is broken With hot alarms, which terrors do betoken.

For during all King Numa's Reign it was never heard that ever there were any wars, civil diffention, or innovation of government attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmity or malice born him, neither any conspiracy once thought on to reign in his place. And whether it was for fear of displeasing the gods (which visibly seemed to take him into their protection) or for the reverent regard they had unto his vertue, or for his prosperous and good success all the time he reigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he fought to keep men still pure and honest, from all wickedness. and laid most open before the eyes of the whole world, a clear example of that which Plato long time after did affirm; and fay, concerning true government; which was, That the onely mean of true Plato's faying quietness and remedy from all evil (which ever troubleth men) was, when by some divine ordinance concerning the from above there meeteth in one person the right Majesty of a King, and the mind of a wise Philo-Commonwal. fopher, to make vertue governels and ruler over vice. For indeed happy is a wife man, and more happy are they, which may hear the grave counsel and good lessons of such a mouth: and there (methinks) needeth no force, no compulsion, no threats, nor extremity to bridle the people. For men feeing the true image of vertue in their visible Prince, and in the example of his life, do willingly grow to be wife, and of themselves do fall into love, liking, and friendship together, and do use all temperance, just dealing, and good order one towards another, leading their life without offence. and with the commendation of other, which is the chief point of felicity, and the most happy good that can light unto men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wildom and vertue can graff in mens manners such a good disposition, and this Numa above all other seemed best to know and understand. Furthermore touching his wives and children, there are great contrarieties among the Historiographers. For some of them say, he never married other wife than Taria, and posterity, and that he never had any children but one onely daughter, and the was called Pompilia. Other *Pompilia Nu*write to the contrary, that he had four Sons, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus, of every one ma's daughter. of the which (by fuccession from the Father to the Son) have descended the noblest races and most ancient houses of the ROMANS. All which Families by reason of their progenitor, have kept the surname of Reges Kings. There are three other Writers which do reprove the two first: faying, that they did write to gratifie the families, making them falfly to descend of the noble race of King Numa. Moreover it is faid, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he married after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was married unto one Pompilia mar-Martius, the Son of the same Martius, which perswaded him to accept the Kingdom of ROME. ried to Cains For he went with him to ROME to remain there, where they did him the honour to receive him Martius Coriointo the number of the Senators. The noble men selves of the City (which were called Patricians) carried on their shoulders the very bed on which the coarse lay, to be conveyed to his grave. The Priests attended also on his body, and so did all the rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his Tomb, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with tears, fighs, and mournings; not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their dearest kinfman, and nearest friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, because (as some say) he commanded the contrary by his Will and Testament : but they made two cossins to be worthy men, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and secrets of Geometry, which had not been worthy of them, then they faid the gods by manifest tokens would threaten to revenge such facriledge and impiety, with some great destruction and milery. Therefore seeing so many things agreeable, and altogether like between Numa and Pythagoras, I easily pardon those which quaintain their opinion, that Numa and Pythagor as were familiarly acquainted and convertant together. Valertus Antias the Historian writeth, there were twelve Books written concerning the office of Priefts, and twelve others containing the Philosophy of the GRECIANS. And that four hundred years after (in the same year when Pubor Prienthood.

Twelve Books lins Cornelius and Marcus Bebins were Confuls) there fell a great rage of waters and rain, which of Philosophy opened the earth, and discovered these coffins; and the lids and covers thereof being carried away, they found the one altogether void, having no manner of likelihood, or token of a body that had lain in it : and in the other they found these Books, which were delivered unto one named Petilius (at that time Prætor) who had the charge to read them over, and to make the report of them. But he having perufed them over, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not convenient the matters contained in them should be published unto the simple people, and for that cause they were carried into the Market-place, and there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing that happeneth unto all good and just men, that they are far more praifed and effeemed after their death than before, because that envy doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithstanding the missortunes which chanced afterwards unto the five Kings which reigned at Rome after Nama, have made his honour shine with much more noble glory than before. For the last of them was driven out of his Kingdom, and died in exile after he was very old; and of the other four, none of them died their natural death, but three of them were killed by treason. And Tulius Hofitius which reigned after Numa, deriding and contemning the most part of his good and holy Inftitutions, and chiefly his devotion to-wards the gods, as a thing which made men lowly and faint-hearted; did as foon as ever he came to be King, turn all his subjects hearts to the wars. But this mad humour of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a strange and most grievous disease that followed him, which brought him to change his mind, and did far otherwife turn his contempt of Religion into an over-fearful superflitton, which did nothing yet refemble the true Religion and Devotion of Numa, and besides he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconvenience which happened unto him at his death. For he was stricken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF LYCURGUS with NUM A.

Hus having written the Lives of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be somewhat hard to do, that we comparing the one with the other, should set out the difference between them. For in those things wherein they were like of condition, their deeds do shew it sufficiently. As in their temperance, their devotion to the gods, their wildon in governing, and their dif- The vertues creet handling of their people, by making them believe that the gods had re- of Nima and vealed the Laws unto them, which they established. And now to come unto Lycurgus were their qualities, which are diverfly and feverally commended in either of them: anse, but their qualities, which are diverfly and feverally commended in either of them: Their first quality is, that Numa accepted the Kingdom, and Lycurgus gave it up. The one received it.

and a private man, was by strangers elected and chosen their Lord and King. The other being in posfession a King, made himself again a private person. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtain a Realm by justice: but it is a goodlier thing to esteem justice above a Realm. Vertue brought the one to be in such reputation, that he was judged worthy to be chosen a King: and vertue bred fo noble a mind in the other, that he efteemed not to be a King. Their fecond quality is, that like as in an Inftrument of mufick, the one of them did tune and wrest up the slack strings which were in SPARTA: To the other slac- What things kened, and fet them lower, which were too high mounted in Rome. Wherein Lyourgus difficulty were hard to was the greater: For he did not perswade his Citizens, to pluck off their armour and curats, nor to lay Lycurgus. by their fwords: but onely to leave their gold and filver, to forfake their foft beds, their fine wrought tables, and other curious rich furniture, and not to leave off the travel of wars, to give themselves only unto feafts, facrifices and plays: but to the contrary, to give up banquetting and teafting, and continually to take pains in the wars, yielding their bodies to all kind of pains. By which means, the one for the love and reverence they did bear him, eafily perfwaded all that he would: and the other by putting himfelf in danger, and being hurt also, obtained not without great travel and adventure, the end of his intended purpose and defire. Numa his muse was so gentle, loving and courteous, that the manners of his Citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now to tractable and civil, that he taught them to love peace and justice. And to the contrary, if they will compel me to number amongst the Laws and Ordinances of Lycurgus, that which we have written touching the ILOTES, which was a barbarous cruel thing : It must of force confess that Numa was much wifer, more gentle and civil in his Laws, confidering that even unto those which indeed were born flaves, he gave some little taste of honour and fweetness of liberty, having ordained, that in the feasts of Saturn, they should fit down at meat at their Masters own table. Some hold opinion, that this custom was brought in by King Numa: who Slaves sat with willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruit, should have some plea- their Mallers at fure thereof to make good chear with the fruits of the fame. Other imagine, that it is yet a token Macrob. Satur. and remembrance of the equality which was amongst men in the world in Saturns time, when there lib. 1. was neither mafter nor servant, but all men were alike equal, as brethren or kinsmen. To conclude, it feemeth either of them took a direct course, thought best to themselves, to frame their people unto temperance, and to be contented with their own. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loved War best, and the other Justice: unless it were that men would say, that for the diverfity of the nature or cuftom of their people (which were almost contrary in manners) Divers causes they were both compelled to use also contrary and divers means from other. For it was not of bullingtons of a faint heart, that Numa took from his people the use of Arms, and desire to be in Wars: but of Numa and not feeking for it: and the other having it in his hands did restore it again. The one being a stranger it was to the end they should not do any wrong to others. Neither did Lycung in also study to Lycungus:

hurt them. And fo, to cut off the excels in the one, and to supply the defect of the other, they were in manner equall one with another: For then was the time when he should have made head against avarice, to have stopped the mischies and inconveniences which fell our afterwards, and they were not little: For that onely was the fountain and root of the most part of the greatest evils and mischiefs, which happened afterwards in ROME. And as touching the divition of goods, neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Nums for that he did it not. For this equality to the one was a ground and foundation of his Common-wealth, which he afterwards instituted, and to the other it could not be. For this division being made not long before the time of his predecessor, there was no great need to change the first, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection. As touching Marriages, and their Children to be in common, both the one and the other wifely fought to take away all occasion of jealousie, but yet they took not both one courfe. For the ROMAN Husband having Children enough to his contentation, if another that lacked children came unto him, to pray him to lend him his wife, he might grant her unto again. But the LACONIAN keeping his wife in his house, and the marriage remaining whole and unbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to have children by her; nay furthermore, many (as we have told you before) did themselves entreat men, by whom they thought to have a trim brood of Children, and laid them with their Wives. What difference I pray were both enforced to bring in a strange manner of government. Furthermore touching their several kind of government, and dividing of their people into States and Companies: That of Numa was marvellous mean and base, and framed to the liking of the meanest people, making a body of a City, and a people compounded together of all forts, as Goldfmiths, Minftrels, Foun-Description of ders, Shoe-makers, and of all forts of craits-men and occupations together. But that of Lycurgus was directly contrary, for his was more fevere and tyrannical, in governing of the Nobility, cafting all crafts and base occupations upon bondmen and strangers, and putting into the hands of his Citizens the Shield and Lance, suffering them to exercise no other Art or Science, but the Art and Discipline of Wars, as the true Ministers of Mars, which all their life time never knew other Science, but onely learned to obey their Captains, and to command their Enemies. For to have any occupation, to buy and fell, or to traffick, free-men were exprelly forbidden, beto have any occupation, to buy and real, or to traines, free-then were expreny formacine, because they should wholly and absolutely be free: And all Sciences to get money was lawfull for slaves, and the ILOTES: Being counted for as vile an occupation as to dress meat, and to be a fcullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amongst his people, but onely took away covetous desireto be rich by Wars; but otherwise he did not forbid them to get goods by any other lawfull means, neither took any regard to bring all to equality, and to be alike wealthy, but fuffering every man to get what he could, taking no order to prevent poverty, which crept out unicting every man to get what he count, taking no order to prevent poverty, which terpt in and spread far in his City; which he should have looked unto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an unequality amongst them, and that his Citizens for substance

Numa's order much scope and liberty, gave Poets occasion to speak, and to give them surnames not very honest. As the better.

Ibyeus called them Phanomeridas, to fay, thigh-showers : and Andromanes; to fay, man-wood. And Euripides faith also of them. Good nut-brown girles which left their Fathers house at large, And sought for young mens company, and took their ware in charge, And shewed their thighs all bare; the Taylour did them wrong,

On each fide open were their coats, the flits were all too long. And indeed to fay truly the fides of their petticoats were not fewed beneath, fo that as they went they shewed their thighs naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth easily declare by these vertes.

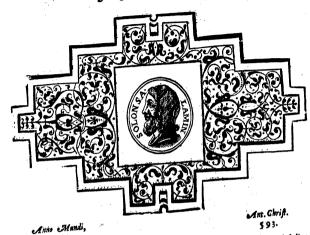

The fong which you shall fing shall be the sonnet said By Harmony lusty laß, that strong and sturdy maid: Which trust her petticoat, about her middle short, And set to show her naked hips in frank and friendly sort.

And therefore it is faid, the LACON Wives were bold, manly, and ftout against their Husbands, namely the first. For they were wholly Mistresses in their house and abroad, yea, they had law on their fide also, to utter their minds frankly concerning the chiefest matters. But Numa ever re-The Laconians ferved the honour and dignity unto the Women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their Husbands, after they had taken them away perforce, disposed themselves to use them as gently as possibly they could, nevertheless he added otherwise thereto great honesty, and took away all curiofity from them, and taught them fobriety, and did inure them to speak little. For he did utterly forbid them wine, and did prohibit them to speak, although it were for things necessary, unless it were in the presence of their Husbands. Insomuch as it is reported that a Woman chancing one him, and it was in him to give her altogether, or to lend her for a time, and to take her afterwards you was between these two customs? saving that the custom of the Laconians shewed, that the Husbands were nothing angry, nor grieved with their Wives for those things which for forrow and jealousite doth rent the hearts of most married men in the World. And that of the ROMANS was a fimplicity fornewhat more shamefac'd, which to cover, it was shadowed yet with the cloak of Matrimony and contract of marriage: confessing that to use Wife and Children by halves together, was a thing most intolerable for him. Furthermore, the keeping of Maidens to be married by Numa's order, was much straighter and more honourable for woman-hood, and Lycurgus order having too day to plead her cause in person openly before the Judges; the Senate hearing of it did send immedistely unto the Oracle of Apollo, To know what that did programticate to the City. And therefore The Roman Numa thought the memory of the naughty women would much commend the great humility, gentle. women very ness and obelience of the good. Tog like as our Gre C1A & Historiographers do note those which modell were the first that killed any of their Citizens or have lought with their brethren, or have killed their Fathers or Mothers, even to the Romans do note that Spurius Carvillius was the first that for- The first difook his wife, two hundred and thirty years after the foundation of ROME, which was never done by voice at Rome. any before. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalaa, was the first which ever brawled or quarrelled with her Mother in Law called Gegania, in the time when Tarquin furnamed the proud reigned, fo well and honeftly were the orders of Numa deviled concerning marriage. Moreover the age and time of marrying of maids, which both the one and the other ordained, doth agree with the rest of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they should be married, till they were of good years and women grown, to the end that they knowing the company of man at such time as nature requireth, it should be a beginning of their pleasure and love, and not of grief and hate, when the should be compelled unto it before time agreeable by nature, and because their bodies also should be more ftrong and able to bear children, and to endure the mothers painfull throws and travel in child-bearing, confidering they are married to no other end but to bear children. But the ROMANS to the contrary do marry them at twelve years of age and under, faying, that by this means their bodies and manners be wholly theirs which do marry them, being affured that no body else could touch them. By this reason it is manifest, that the one is more natural to make them strong to bear children, and the other more moral, to give them the form and manner of conditions, which a man would have them to keep all their life time. Moreover touching orders for education of children, that they should How much cbe brought up, instructed and taught, under the self-same Masters and Governors, which should have discipline is an eve to make them drink, eat, play, and exercise themselves honestly and orderly together; Numa worth. made no more provision for the same then the least maker of Laws that ever was, and nothing in comparison of Lyungus. For Numa left the Parents at liberty, to use their discretion (according to their covetouinels or necessity) to cause their children to be brought up as they thought good, whether they would put them to be Labourers, Carpenters, Founders or Minftrels. As if they should not frame the manners of children, and fashion them from the cradle all to one end, but should be as it were like passengers into one Ship, which being there, some for one business, other for another purpose, but all to diversends, do never meddle one with another, but in a rough from or tempest when every man is afraid of his own life. For otherwise no man careth but for himself. And other makers of Laws also are to be born withall, if any thing hath scaped them through ignorance, or sometime through lack of fufficient power and authority. But a wife Philosopher having received a Realm of people newly gathered together, which did contrary him in nothing: whereto should he most ply his study and endeavour, but to cause children to be well brought up, and to make young men exercise themselves, to the end they should not differ in manners, nor that they should be troublesome, by their diverse manner of bringing up, but that they should all agree together, for that they had been trained from their childhood unto one felf trade, and fashioned under one felf pattern of vertue? That good education, How Lycurgus besides other commodities, did also serve to preserve Lycurgus Laws. For the sear of their Oath Laws were which he had made; had been of small effect, if he had not through institution and education (as it slablished. were) died in wool the manners of children, and had not made them from their nurses breafts in manner, fuck the juice and love of his Laws and civil Ordinances. And this was of fuch force, that for the space of five hundred years and more, Lycurgus chief Laws and Ordinances remained in full perfection, as a deep wodded die, which went to the bottom, and pierced into the tender wool. Contrariwise that which was Numa's chief end and purpose, to continue Rome in peace and amity, died by and by with him. For he was no fooner dead but they opened both the gates of the Temple of Famus, which he fo carefully had kept shut all his Reign, as if indeed he had kept in wars there, under lock and key, and they filled all IT ALY with murther and blood; And this his godly, holy, and just government which his Realm enjoyed all his time, did not last long after, because it had not the bond Who Numa's of education and the discipline of children which should maintain it. Why ? may a man say to me orders died. here, Hath not Rome excelled still, and prevailed more and more in chivalry? This question requireth a long answer, and specially unto such men as place felicity in riches, in possessions, and in the greatnels of Empire, rather then in the quiet fafety, peace, and concord of a Commonweal, and in clemency and justice, joyned with contention. Nevertheless, howsoever it was, that maketh for Lycurgus also, that the ROMANS after they had changed the state which they had of Numa, did so marvellously encrease and grow mighty; and that the LACEDEMONIANS to the contrary, so soon as they began to break Lycurgus Laws, being of great authority and sway, fell afterwards to be of small Why Nums is account. So that having lost the Soveraignty and commandment over GREECE, they stood in to be preserted great hazard also to be overthrown for ever. But in troth it was some divine thing in Numa, that before Lycurhe being a meer stranger the ROMANS did seek him to make him King, and that he could so change gue. all, and rulea whole city as he lifted (not yet joined together) without need of any force or violence, as it was in Lycurgus, to be affifted with the best of the City, in resisting the commons of LA-CED. E MON, but he could never otherwise have kept them in peace, and made them love together, but by his onely wildom and justice.

Solons lineage.

IDY MOS the Grammarian, in a little Book that he wrote, and dedicated unto Asclepiades, touching the Tables of the Laws of Solon, alledgeth the words of one Philocles, in which he speaketh against the common opinion of those that have written, that Solons Father was called Emphorion. For all other Writers agree, that he was the fon of Execessides, a man but reasonably to live, although otherwise he was of the noblest and most ancient House of the Ciry of ATHENS. For of his Fathers fide, he was descended of King Codrus: and for his Mother Heraelides Pontieus Writeth, the was coufin-german unto Pyfiftrasus mother. For this cause even from the beginning there was great friendship between them, partly for their kindred, and partly also for the courteste and beauty of Pysistratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in love. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at jar one with the other, about matter of State and Government : yet this square bred no violent inconvenience between them, but they referved in their hearts still their ancient amity, which continued the memory of their love, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no flayed man to withfland beauty, nor any great doer to prevail in love, it is manifest to all, as well by other Poetical Writings that he hath made, as by a Law of his own: wherein he did forbid Bondmen to perfurne themselves, or to be lovers of children. Who placed this Law among honest matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better fort, and forbidding it to the baleft. They fay also that Pysistratus self was in love with Charmas, and that he did fee up the little Image of Love, which is in ACADEMIA, where they were wont to light the holy Candle. But Solon: Father (as Hermippus writeth) having spenthis Goods in liberality and deeds of courtefie, though he might eafily have been relieved at divers mens hands with Money, he was yet afhamed to take any, because he came of a House which was wont rather to give and relieve others, then to take themselves: so being yet a young man, he devised to trade Merchandize. Howbeit other say, that Solon travelled Countries, rather to fee the World, and to learn, then to traffick, or gain. For

Solon gave himfelf in

Great herds of Beasts, and flocks in many a fold, Both Horse and Mule, yea store of Corn, and all That may content each man above the mould: No richer is, for all those heaps and hoards, Then he which hath sufficiently to feed, And clothe his corps, with fuch as God affords. But if his joy, and chief delight do breed, fure he was very destrous of knowledge, as appeareth manifestly: for that being now old, he com-I grow old, learning still.

Also he was not coverously bent, nor loved Riches too much: for he said in one place: youth to trade monly used to fay this Verse: Whoso hath Goods and Gold enough at call,

For

For to behold the fair and beavenly face Of some sweet wife, which is adorn'd with or one. Or elfe fome child, of beauty fair and bright, Then hash he cause (indeed) of deep delight.

And in another place also he faith:

Indeed I de defere, some Wealth to have at will: But not unless the same be got, by faithfull dealing still. For fure who fo defines by nichedness to theire:

Shall find that justice fram such goods, will justly him deprine. Howbeit, as an honest man is not to buse himself overmuch in straping together of superfluous and unnecessary goods ; so nothing letteth but that he may have a care to store himself with such things as he shall have need of.

In those days no state was discommended, as faith Hesiodus, nor any Art or Science made any difference between men: but Merchandize they thought an honourable state, as that which delivered means to traffick into strange and far Countries, to get acquaintance with States, to procure dities of Merthe love of Princes, and chiefly to gather the experience of the World. So that there have been chandize. the love of trances, and then y to gather the experience of the control of the built Marsilia, A Merchane Merchanes, which heretologe have been founders of great Cities; as he which built Marsilia, A Merchane builded Marsilia of the Galles, dwelling by the River of Rhofine. And the builded Marsilia of the Thales Milefus the wife did traffick Merchandize, and that Hippocraes the Mathe-Thales, Hippocraes matick did even fo : and likewise that Plato travelling into Edypr., did bear the whole charges crates, Plato, of his journey, with the gains he made of the fale of oyl he carried thither. They remember also all Merchants, that Solon learned to be lavith in expence, to fare delicately, and to speak wantonly of pleasures in his Poems, somewhat more licentiously then became the gravity of a Philosopher: onely because he was brought up in the trade of Merchandize, wherein for that men are marvellous subject to great losses and dangers, they seek other whiles good chear to drive these cares away, and liberty to make much of themselves. Yet it appeareth by these Verses, that Solon accounted himself rather in the number of the poor, then of the rich.

Rich men (oft times) in lewdest lives do range. And often feen, that vertuous men be poor : Tet would the good their gasdness never change With lewd estate, although their wealth be more. For vertue stands always both firm and stable : When riches rove, and seldom are durable.

Poverty with vertue better than riches.

tural Philofo-

This Poetry at the beginning he used but for pleasure, and when he had leisure, writing no matter of importance in his Verses. Afterwards he did fet out many grave matters of Philosophy, and the How Solon used his Poetry. most part of such things as he had devised before, in the Government of a Commonweal, which he did not for History or memories sake, but onely of a pleasure to discourse : for he sheweth the reafons of that he did, and in some places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproveth the ATHENIANS. And some affirm also he went about to write his Laws and Ordinances in Verse, and do recite his Preface, which was this :

Vouchsafe O mighty Jove, of Heaven and Earth high King : To grant good fortune to my Laws and hefts in every thing. And that their glory grow, in such triumphant wife, As may remain in fame for aye, which lives and never dies.

He chiefly delighted in Moral Philotophy, which reated of Government and Commonweals: 25 Solon delighted the most part of the wife men did of those times. But for Natural Philosophy, he was very gross and ed in Moral, fimple, as appeareth by these Verses:

The clattering hail, and foftly falling from Do breed in air, and fall from clouds on hie. The dreadfull claps, which thunderbolts do throw, Do come from Heaven, and lightnings bright in skie. The featt felf by boysterous blasts doch roar, Which (were it not provoked fofull fore) Would be both calm and quiet for to paß, As any Element that ever was.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the feven wife men of GREECE, who fearched further the comemplation of things in common use among men, than he. For setting him apart, all the others got the name of wildom, onely for their understanding in matters of State and Government. It is reported that they met on a day all seven together in the City of DELPHOS, and another time in the City of CORENTH, where Periander got them together at a Feaft that he made to the other fix. But that which most increased their glory, and made their fame most spoken of, was the fending back again of the three-footed stool when they all had refused it, and turned it over one to another with great humanity. For the tale is, how certain Fisher-men of the Isle of Co, calitheir Nets into the Sea, and certain strangers passing by, that came from the City of Mile-run, did buy their draught of Fish at adventure, before the Netwas drawn. And when they drew societ flool of it up, there came up in the Met a three-footed flool of massie Gold, which men lay, Hellen (as she gold drawn up did return from Taox) had thrown in that place, in memory of an ancient Oracle she called then in a drag-net.

unto her mind. Thereupon the strangers and Fisher-men first fell at strife about this three-footed fool, who should have it: but asterwards the two Cities took part of both sides, on their Citizens behalf. Infomuch as Wars had like to have followed between them, had not the Prophetefs Pythia given a like Oracle unto them both: That they should give this three-sooted stool unto the wifest man. Whereupon the men of Co, sent it first to Thales in the City of MILETUM; as being willing to grant that unto a private perion, for which they had made Wars with all the MILE-SIANS before. Thates faid, he thought Bias a wifer man than himself; and so it was fent unto him. He likewife fent it again unto another, as a wifer man. And that other, fent it also unto another. So that being thus posted from man to man, and through divers hands, in the end it was brought back again unto the City of MILETUM, and delivered into the hands of Thales the second time: and laft of all was carried unto Thebrs, and offered up unto the Temple of Apollo Ifmenian. Howbeit Theophrastus writeth, that first it was sent to the City of PRIENA, unto Bias: and then unto Thales, in the City of MILETUM, by Biss confent. And after that it had passed through all their hands, it was brought again unto Bias: and laftly it was fent to the City of DELPHOS. And thus much have the best and most ancient Writers written: faving that fome fay inflead of a three-footed flool, it was a cup that King Crassus fent unto the City of Anabarija and Del Phos. Other say, it was a piece of Plate which Batbye les left there. They made mention also DELPHOS. Other 1ay, 11 was a piece of state with and Solon, and of another between him and Thales, Solon meeting of another private meeting betweet Anacharsis and Solon, and of another between him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talk. Anacharfis being arrived at ATHENS, went to knock at Solans gate, faying that he was a ftranger which came of purpose to fee him, and to defire his acquaintance and friendthip, Solon answered him, that it was better to seek friendship in his own Country. Anacharsis replyed again: Thou then that art at home, and in thine own Country, begin to thew me triendship. Then Solon wondering at his bold ready wit, entertained him very courteoully, and kept him a certain time in his house, and made him very good chear, at the selffame time wherein he was most busse in governing the Commonweal, and making Laws for the same time wherein he was more outer in governing the commonwest, and making Laws for the state thereof. Which when Anacharsis understood, he laughed at it: to fee that Solos imagined with written Laws, to bridle mens coverounces and injultice. For such Laws, faid he, do rightly refemble the Spiders Cobwebs: because they take hold of little Flies and Gnats which fall into them, but the rich and mighty will break and run through them at their will. Solon answered him, that men do juftly keep all covenants and bargains which one make with another, because it is to the hinfaying of Soderance of either party to break them: and even fo, he did fo temper his Laws, that he made his lons written Citizens know, it was more for their profit to obey law and justice, than to break it. Nevertheless afterwards, matters proved rather according to Anacharfis comparison, than agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceived. Anacharsis being by hap one day in a common Assembly of the People at ATHENS, faid that he marvelled much, why in the confultations and meetings of the GRECIANS, wife men propounded matters, and fools did decide them. It is faid moreover, that Solon was fomewith Thates at time in the City of MILETUM at Thates houle, where he faid that he could not but marvell at That Milleman about Les, that he would never marry to have children. Thales gave him never a word at that prefent: but marriage for within few days after he fuborned a ftranger, which faid that he came but newly home from Athere? This ftranger whom Thaler had schooled before, answered: None other there, saying that they carried a young man to burial, whom all the City followed: for that he was one of the greatest mens fons of the City, and the honestest man withall, who at that present was out of the Countrey, and had been a long time (as they faid) abroad. O poor unfortunate Father, then faid Solon: and what was his name? I have heard him named, faid the stranger, but I have forgotten him now; faving that they all faid, he was a worthy wiseman. So Solon still trembling more and more for fear, at every answer of this stranger: in the end he could hold no longer, being full of trouble, but told his name himfelf unto the stranger, and asked him again, if he were not the Son of Solon which was buried. The very fame, faid the stranger. Solon with that like a mad man ftraight began to beat his head, and to fay, and do, like men impatient in affliction, and overcome We should now with forrow. But Theles laughing to see this pageant, staid him, and said: Lo, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marrying, and getting of children; which is of such a violence, that thou sees that keepeth me from marrying, and getting of children; which is of such a violence, that thou sees it hat now overcome thee, although otherwise thou are strong, and able to wrastle with any. However, the strong and thing he hash said unto thee he of sood chear man. For it is but a tale, and nothing so. beit for any thing he hath faid unto thee, be of good chear man, for it is but a tale, and nothing so Hermippu writeth, that Patacus (he which said he had Afops soul) recited this story thus. Not verthelels it lacketh judgement, and the courage of a man also, to be afraid to get things necessary, fearing the lofs of them : for by this reckoning he should neither efteen honour, goods, nor knowledge when he hath them, for fear to lofe them. For we fee that vertue it felf, which is the greateft and sweetest riches a man can have; decayeth oft times through sickness, or else by physick and potions. Furthermore Thales felf, although he was not married, was not therefore free from this fear, unless he would confess that he neither loved friends, kinsmen, nor Countrey: howbeit Tha-Cybiliur Thater les had an adopted Son, called Cybilius, which was his Sifters Son. For our foul having in it a 2dopted for.

that we shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that move them to marry, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwards are ready to die for fear and forrow. when they fee their baftards (that they have gotten of their Slaves or Concubines) fall fick or die and do utter words far unmeet for men of noble courage. And some such there be, that for the death of a Dog, or their Horse, are so out of heart and take such thought, that they are ready to go into the ground, they look to pitifully. Other some are clean contrary, who though they have lost their children, forgone their friends, or fome Gentleman dear unto them, yet no forrowfull word hath come from them, neither have they done any unfeemly thing; but have paffed the rest of their life like wife, conftant and vertuous men. For it is not love but weakness, which breedeth these extream forrows, and exceeding fear, in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they love and defire, by reason of the continual trouble, fear and grief they feel, by thinking how in time they may be deprived of it. Now we must not arm our selves with poverty, against the grief of loss of Goods: neither with lack of affection, against the loss of our friends: neither with want of Marriage, against the death of Children: but we must be armed with reason against missortunes, Thus have we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS having now sustained a long Proclamation and troublesome Waragainst the MEGARIANS, for the possession of the Isle of SALAMINA, were upon pain of in the end weary of it, and made proclamation, ftraightly commanding upon pain of death, that no death no maniman should prefume to prefer any more to the Council of the City, the title or question of the posses to move the fion of the Isle of Salamina. Solon could not bear this open shame, and seeing the most part of Title of salathe luftieft youths defirous fill of War, though their tongues were tied for fear of the Proclamation, mind.

he fained himself to be out of his wits, and caused it to be given out that Solon was become a fool; solon feined and fecretly he had made certain lamentable Verses, which he had conned without book, to fing abroad madness to rethe City. So one day he ran fuddenly out of his house with a Garland on his head, and got him to the cover Salamina Market-place, where the People straight swarmed like Bees about him: and getting him upon the ftone where all Proclamations are usually made, out he fingeth these Elegies he had made, which began after this fort:

I here present my self (an Herauld) in this case, Which come from Salamina Land, that noble worthy place. My mind in pelting profe, shall never be exprest, But sung in Verse Heroical, for so I think it best.

Solons Elegica of the Salaminians.

This Elegy is entituled SALAMINA, and containeth an hundred Verses, which are excellently well written. And these being openly sung by Solon at that time, his friends incontinently praised them beyond measure, and specially Pysistratus: and they went about perswading the People that were present, to credit that he spoke. Hereupon the matter was so handled amongst them, that by and by the Proclamation was revoked, and they began to follow the Wars with greater fury then before, appointing Solls to be General in the fame. But the common tale and report is, that he went Of the Temple by Sea with Pyfistrarus unto the Temple of Venus, surnamed Coliade: where he found all the women of Venus Ciat a solemn Feast and Sacrifice, which they made of custom to the goddels. He taking occasion (Paulin. of Paulin. of thereby, fent from thence a trufty man of his own unto the MEGARIANS, which then had SA- the Athenians. The MEGARIANS easily believed him, and shipped forthwith gems. certain Souldiers to go with him. But when Solon perceived the Ship under fail coming from SALA-MINA, he commanded the women to depart, and instead of them he put lusty beardless Springals in their Apparel, and gave them little short Daggers to convey under their Cloaks, commanding them to play and dance together upon the Sea fide, untill their Enemies were landed, and their Ship at Anchor; and so it came to pass. For the MEGARIANS being deceived by that they saw afar off, affoon as ever they came to the shore side, did land in heaps, one in anothers neck, even for greediness, to take these women: but not a man of them escaped, for they were slain every mothers son. This stratagem being finely handled, and to good effect, the ATHENIANS took Sea straight and coasted over to the Isle of SALAMINA: which they took upon the sudden, and wan it without much re- Solon wan 84fistance. Other say that it was not taken after this fort : but that Apollo Delphicus gave Solon first limina. fuch an Oracle:

Thou Shale first win by Volos and Sacrifice. The help of Lords and demy-gods full bright: Of whose dead bones, the dust engraved lyes, In western foil, A sopia that hight.

By order of this Oracle, he one night passed over to SALAMINA, and did Sacrifice to Periphemus, and to Cichris demy-gods of the Countrey. Which done, the ATHENIANS delivered him five hundredmen, who willingly offered themselves: and the City made an accord with them, that if they took the Isle of SALAMINA, they should bear greatest Authority in the Commonweal. Solon imbarked his Souldiers into divers Fisher-boats, and appointed a Galliot of thirty Oars to come after him, and he Anchored hard by the City of SALAMINA, under the point which looketh towards the Ille of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, having by chance heard some inkling of it, but yet knew nothing of certainty, ran presently in hurly burly to arm them, and manued out a thip to descrywhat it was. But they fondly coming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS under hatches fast bound, and in their rooms put aboard in their Ship the choicest Souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commanding them to fet their course direct upon the City, and to keep themselves as close out of fight as could be. And he himself with all the reft of his Souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the ME-GARIANS, which were come out into the Field. Now whilst they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had fent in the MEGARIANS Ship, entred the Haven and won the Town. This is certainly true, and teftified by that which is shewed yet at this day. For to keep a memorial hereof, a Ship of ATHENS arriveth quietly at the first, and by and by those that are in the Ship make a great shout, and a man armed leaping out of the Ship, runneth shouting towards the Rock called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firm Land : and hard by the same is the Temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had overcome the MEGARIANS in battle, from whence he fent back again those Prisoners that he had taken (which were saved from the slaughter of the Battle) without any ranfom paying. Nevertheless, the MEGARIANS were sharply bent fill to recover Salamina again. Much hurt being done and fuffered on both fides: both parts in the end made the LACEDAMONIANS judges of the quarrel. But upon judgement given, common report is, that Honers Authority did Solon good fervice, because he did add these Verses to the num-Automian. Iliad ber of Ships, which are in the Iliads of Homer, which herehearled before the Judges, as if they had been indeed written by Homer: Ajax that Champion fout, did lead with him in charge, Twelve Ships from Salamina foil, which he had left at large, And even those self-same Ships, in battle did he cast, And place in order for to fight, with Enemies force at last. In that same very place, whereas it seemed then, The Captains which from Athens came, imbattl'd had their men. Howbeit the ATHENIAMS selves think, it was but a tale of pleasure: and say that Solon made it appear to the Judges, that Phileus, and Euryfaces (both Ajax Sons) were made free Denizons of ATHENS. Whereupon they gave the Isle of SALAMINA unto the ATHENIANS, and one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the Countrey of ATTICA: and the other in a Town called MILETUM. And for due proof thereof, they fay there is yet a certain Canton or CHARTER of the Countrey of ATTICA, which is called the Canton of the Philaides, after the name The manner of of this Phileus, where Pyfiftratus was born. And it is faid moreover, that Solon (because he would ane manuer of burial with the throughly convince the MEGARIANS) did alledge that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead Megarian and after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in MEGARA they the Athenians. bury the dead with their faces to the Eaft : and in ATHENS their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denyeth it, faying, that the MEGARIANS did bury them also with their faces towards the West: alledging moreover, that at ATHENS every Coarse had his own Bier or Coffin by it felf, and that at MEGARA they did put three or four Coarfes rogether. They say also there were certain Oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly help SAhn, by which the god called SALAMINA, JONIA. This strile was judged by five Arbitrators, all SPARTANS born: that is to fay, Critolaidas, Anompharetus, Hypfechidas, Anaxilas, and Cliomenes. Solon undoubtedly won great glory and honour by this Exploit, yet was he much more honoured and effection eth the cause eth, for the Oration he made in the defence of the Temple of Apollo, in the City of DELPHOS: declaring that it was not meet to be fuffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS, should at their pleasure abuse the Sanctuary of the Oracle, and that they should aid the DELPHIANS in honour and reverence of Apollo. Whereupon the Council of the Amphilityons, being moved with his words and perswasions, proclaimed Wars against the CYRRHEIANS, as divers other do witness, and especially Ariftotle, in the Story he wrote of those that won the Pythian Games, where he ascribeth unto Solon the honour of that determination. Nevertheless Hermippus saith, Solon was not made General of their Army, as Enanthes Samian hath written. For Afchines the Orator wrote no fuch thing of him: and in the Chronicles of the DELPHIANS they find, that one Alencon, and not Solon, was the General of the ATHENIANS. Now the City of ATHENS had along time been vexed and troubled through Cylons hainous offence, ever fince the year that Megacles (Governour of the City of ATHENS) did with fair words handle fo the Confederates of the Rebellion of Cylon, which had taken Sanctuary within the liberties of the Temple of Mineros: that he perfwaded them to be wife, and to prefent themselves before the Judges, holding by a thread, which they should tie about the Base of the Image of the goddess where she stood, because they should not lose their liberty. But when they were come to the place of the honourable goddesses so called, (which be the Images of the Furies) coming down to prefent themselves before the Judges, the thread brake of it felf. Then Megacles, and other Officers his Companions, laid hold on them prefently, faying, that it was a manufelt fign that the goddels Minerva refused to fave them. So those they took, and all they could lay hands on were immediately stoned to death without the City: the rest which took the Altars of refuge, were slain there also. And none were saved, but such as had made means to the Governours Wives of the City, to intreat for them: which from that time forth were ever hated of the people, and commonly called the abjects and excommunicates. Who being the Issues of the Rebels that rose with Cylon, chanced to rise again in credit, and growing to great Authority, they never left quarelling and fighting continually with the off-fpring of Me-gacles. These factions were greatest and highest in Solons time : who being of Authority, and feeing the People thus divided in two parts, he stepped in between them, with the chiefest men of A-THENS, and did so perswade and intreat those whom they called the abjects and excommunicates, that they were contented to be judged. So three hundred of the chiefest Citizens were chosen Judges to hear this matter. The accuser was Myron Phlyeion. This matter was heard and pleaded, and by fentence of the Judges, the excommunicates were condemned. Those that were alive, to perpetual exile : and the bones of them that were dead, to be digged up, and thrown out of the Confines of the Territory of ATHENS, But whilft the City of ATHENS was occupied with these uproars. the MEGARIANS wifely caught hold of the occasion delivered, and fet upon the ATHENIANS. took from them the Haven of NIS.A., and recovered again out of their hands the Isle of SA. LAMINA. Furthermore, all the City was possessed with a certain superstitious fear : for some faid, that Spirits were come again, and strange sights were seen. The Prognosticators also said, they perceived by their Sacrifices the City was defiled with some abominable and wicked things, which were of necessity to be purged and thrown out. Hereupon they sent into CRETA for Epimenides Phestian, whom they reckoned the seventh of the wife men, at the least such as will not allow Phasins taken Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and devout man, and very wife in celeftial things, for one of the by inspiration from above: by reason whereof, men of his time called him the new Curetes, that is seven Sages, to fay, Prophet: and he was thought the Son of a Nymph called Batte. When he was come to excluding per-ATHERS, and grown in friendship with Solon, he did help him much, and made his way for effablishing of his Laws. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their Sacrifices much lighter, and of less cost: and brought the Citizens to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting of certain severe and barbarous Ceremonies, which the most part of Women observed in their mourning : and he ordained certain Sacrifices which he would have done immediately after the Obsequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the rest, was, that by using the Citizens unto holiness and devotion, daily Sacrifices, Prayers unto the gods, purging of themselves, and humble Offerings: he wan mens hearts by little and little, to yield them more conformable to Justice, and to be more enclined to concord and unity. It is reported also that Epimenides when he saw the Haven of Munychia, and had long confidered of it: told those about him, that men were very blind in forefeeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS (faid he) knew what hurt this Haven would bring them, they would eat it (as they fay) with their teeth. It is faid also that Thales did prognosticare such a like thing, who after his death commanded they should bury his body in some vile place, of no reckoning, within the Territory of the MILESIANS, faying, that one day there should be the place of a City. Epimenides therefore being marvelloully efteemed of every man for these caufes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great Prefents of Money and other things, but he would take nothing, and onely prayed them to give him a bough of the and other mangs, out he would take nothing, and so he returned shortly home into CRETA. Now that Solon pacified this sedition of Cylon was utterly appealed in ATHENS, for that the Excommunicates were bathe sedition at nished the Countrey, the City sell again into their old troubles and diffentions about the Government Athens. of the Commonweal: and they were divided into fo divers parts and factions, as there were people of fundry places and Territories within the Countrey of ATTICA. For there were the people of the Mountains, and the people of the Valleys, and the people of the Sea Coast. Those of the Mountains took the common peoples part for their lives. Those of the Valley, would a few of the best Citizens should carry the sway. The Coast-men would that neither of them should prevail, because they would have had a mean Government, and mingled of them both. Furthermore, the Faction between the poor and rich, proceeding of their unequality, was at that time very great. By reason whereof the City was in great danger, and it seemed there was no way to pacifie or take up these controversies, unless some Tyrant happened to rife, that would take upon him to rule the up these concovernes, united a years in appearance to the rich, that either they ploughed their the milety of Lands, and yielded them the fixth part of their Crop: (for which cause they were called Hestemo-debt and usury) rii and Servants) or elfe they borrowed Money of them at usury, upon gage of their bodies to serve it out. And if they were not able to pay them, then were they by the Law delivered to their Creditors, who kept them as Bond-men and Slaves in their houses, or else they sent them into strange Countreys to be fold : and many even for very poverty were forced to fell their own Children (for there was no Law to forbid the contrary) or else to forfake their City and Countrey, for the extream croeky and hard dealing of these abonimable Usurers their Creditors. Insomuch that many of the lustieft and stourest of them, banded together in Companies, and incouraged one another, not to fuffer and bear any longer such extremity, but to choose them a stout and trusty Captain, that might fet them at liberty, and redeem those out of eaptivity, which were judged to be Bond-men and Servants, for lack of paying their debts at their days appointed: and to to make again a new division of all Lands and Tenements, and wholly to change and turn up the whole State and Government. Then the wifest men of the City, who saw Solon onely neither partner with the rich in their Solons equity oppression, neither partaker with the poor in their necessity, made suit to him, that it would please and uprighthim to take the matter in hand, and to appeale and pacific all these broils and sedition. Yet Phanias ness. Lesbian writeth, that he used a subtilty, whereby he deceived both the one and the other fide, consolon by subcerning the Commonweal

For he feered unrounded the proper of divide the Landerson's and the tilty fee oder cerning the Commonweal. For he secretly promifed the poor to divide the Lands again: and the horwist the rich allo, to confirm their Covenants and Bargains. Howfoever it fell out, it is very certain that poor and rich. Solan from the beginning made it a great matter, and was very ferupulous to deal between them : fearing the coveronness of the one, and arrogancy of the other. Howbeit in the end he was thofen Governour after Philombrotae, and was made reformer of the rigour of the Laws, and the temperer of the State and Commonweal, by confent and agreement of both parties. The rich accepthief Goverted him, because he was no begger: the poor did also like him, because he was an honest man. They nour.

fay moreover, that one word and fentence which he spake, (which at that present was rise in every man mouth) that equality did breed no ftrife, did as well pleafe the rich and wealthy, as the poor and needy. For the one fort conceived of this word Equality, that he would measure all things according to the quality of the man: and the other took it for their purpole, that he would measure all things by the number, and by the poll onely. Thus the Captains of both Factions perfwaded and prayed him, boldly to take upon him that Soveraign Authority, fithence be had the whole City now at his commandment. The Neuters alfo of every part, when they faw it very hard to pacific thefethings with Law and Reason, were well content that the wifest, and honestest man, partine intercutings with heave and Academy, which has some fay also that there was such an Oracle of should alone have the Royal Power in his hands. Some fay also that there was such an Oracle of

Sit thou at helm, as Governour to steer, To guide our course, and rule the rowling Ship: For thou Shalt See, full many Athenians there,

But his familiar friends above all rebuked him, saying he was to be accounted no better than a beast, Solor related to be a tyrant. If for fear of the name of Tyrant, he would refule to take upon him a Kingdom: which is the most Timonday and just and honourable state, if one take it upon him that is an honest man. As in old time, Timonday nut and noncontaine many, it one take it upon min man is amount man. As it out may, a immonant made himself king of those of Negrespont, with their consent: and as Pittacin was then premade numeri rang of those of the Report, with their goodly reasons could not make him once fently of those of Metellin. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they say that he answered his friends, that Principality and Tyranny, was indeed a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entred into Pittacus ty-

it. And in certain Verses that he wrote to Phocus, thus he said : I neither blush, nor yet repent my felf, That have preserv'd my native soil alwaies, And that therein (to hoard up trash and pelf) No Tyrants thought could once eclipse my praise. No might could move my mind to any wrong, Which might beblot the glory of my name : For so I thought, to live in honour long,

Hereby appeareth plainly, that even before he was chosen reformer of the State, to stablish new Laws, he was then of great countenance and Authority. But he himself writeth, that many faid of him thus, after he had refuled the occasion of usurping of this Tyranny:

Sure Solon was a fool, and of a ballofull mind,
That would refuse the great good hap, which gods to him assign d. The prey was in his hands, yet dur ft he never draw The net therefore: but ftood abalit, and like a dastard daw. For had not that so been, he would (for one days raign, To be a King in Athens Town) himself (all quick) have slain.

Thus brought the common rumor to taber on his head. Now, notwithstanding he had refused the Kingdom, yet he waxed nothing the more remiss nor fost therefore in governing, neither would the how for fear of the great, nor yet would frame his Laws to their liking that had chosen him their reformer. For where the milchief was tolerable, he did not straight pluck it up by the roots: neither did he fo change the State, as he might have done, left if he should have attempted Excellent tem- to turn upfide down the whole Government, he might afterwards have been never able to fettle and flablish the fame again. Therefore he onely altered that, which he thought by reason he would perfunde his Citizens unto, or else by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he faid, four with sweet, and force with justice. And herewith agreeth his Answer that he made afterwards unto one that asked him, if he had made the best Laws he could for the ATHENIANS? Yea fure, faith he, fuch as they were to conceive. And this that followeth alfo, they have ever Things hateful fince observed in the Athenian Tongue: to make certain things pleasant, that be hatefull, finely range naterial time concerns the Athenna Aragon. On make certain timings picatain, that of natural made pleafant conveying them under colour of pleafing names. As calling Whores, Lemans: Taxes, Contribution with fivet tions: Garrifons, Guards: Prifons, Houles. And all this came up first by Solons invention, who called clearing of debts, Seifachibeian: in Englith, Discharge. For the first change and reformation he made in Government was this: he ordained that all manner of debts past should be clear, and so body should ask his debtor any thing for the time past. That no man should thenceforth lend Mo-Ultry forbid- ney out to ultry, upon Covenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Howbeit fone den pong 298 write (as Androison among other) that the poor were contented that the interest onely for usury should be moderated, without taking away the whole debt : and that Solon called this easie and gente discharge, SeiJachibeian, with crying up the value of Money. For he raised the pound of filver, being before but threefcore and thirteen Drachmes, full upon an hundred: fo they which were to pay of the body great fums of Money, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with lefs number of pieces than The value of the Debt could have been payed when it was borrowed. And so the Debtors gained much, and the noney cried Creditors loft nothing. Nevertheless the greater part of them which have written the same, say, up by Solon. that this crying up of Money, was a general discharge of all Debts, Conditions and Covenants upon that this crying as of House, which Solon wrote, do feem to agree. For he glothefame: whereto the very Poems themselves, which Solon wrote, do feem to agree.

rieth, and breaketh forth in his Verses, that he had taken away all bawkes and marks that separated mens Lands through the Countrey of ATTICA : and that now he had fet at liberty, that which before was in bondage. And that of the Citizens of ATHENS, which for lack of payment of their debts had been condemned for Slaves to their Creditors, he had brought many home again out of strange Countreys, where they had been so long, that they had forgotten to speak their naturall Tongue: and other which remained at home in captivity, he had now fet them all at good liberty.

But while he was in doing this, men fay a thing thwarted him, that troubled him marvelloufly. For having framed an Edict for clearing all debts, and lacking onely a little to grace it with words, and to be keet feeter give it some pretty Preface, that otherwise was ready to be proclaimed: he opened himself somewhat till they be to certain of his familiars whom he trufted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) and told them how published. he would not meddle with Lands and Poffessions, but would onely clear and cut off all manner of debts. These men before the Proclamation came out, went presently to the Money-men, and bor- Ill consciences rowed great fums of Money of them, and laid it out ftraight upon Land. So when the Proclamation by craft precame out, they kept the Lands they had purchased, but restored not the Money they had borrowed. This foul part of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of , and wrongfully blamed ; as if he had not onely suffered it, but had been partaker of this wrong and injustice. Notwithstanding he cleared himself of this slanderous report, losing five Talents by his own Law. For it was well known that A good Lawfo much was due unto him, and he was the first that following his own Proclamation, did clearly re- maker beginleafe his debtors of the fame. Other fay he was owing fifteen Talents, and among the fame, Poly-neth to do juzelus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithstanding they ever after called Solons friends, Creocopides, cutters of debts. This Law neither liked the one nor the other fort. For it greatly offended the rich for cancelling their bonds: and it much more misliked the poor, because all Lands and Posfestions they gaped for, were not made again common, and every body alike rich and wealthy, as Lycurgus had made the LACEDEMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleventh descended of the right Line from Hercules, and had many years been King of LACEDEMON, where he had gotten great authority, and made himself many friends: all which things together, did greatly help him to execute that , which he wifely had imagined for the order of the Common-weal. Yet also, he used more perswasion then force, a good witness thereof the loss of his eye: preferring a Law before his private injury, which hath power to preferve a City long in union and concord, and to make Citizens to be neither poor nor rich. Solon could not attain to this, for he was born in a popular state, and a man but of mean wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one feeking to win no credit with his Citizens, but onely by his counsell. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the City, by his Proclamation which he made, he himfelf doth witness it, saying: Even those which earst, did bear me friendly face, And (pake full fair, wherever I them met: Gan new begin, to look full grim of grace, And were (like foes) in force against me set. As if I had done them fome (pight or fcorn, Or open wrong , which were not to be born.

Nevertheless he faith immediately after, that with the same Authority and Power he had, a man posibly

To begin withall, he first took away all Dracons Solon took abloody Laws, faving for murder, and man-flaughter, which were too fevere and cruell. For almost way all Dracons he did ordain but one kind of punishment for all kind of faults and offences, which was death. So Laws. that they which were condemned for idlenels, were judged to dye. And petty larceny, as robbing mens Orchards and Gardens of fruit, or Herbs, was as severely punished, as those who had commuted Sacriledge or murder. Demades therefore encountred it pleafantly, when he faid: that Dracon: Laws were not written with ink, but with bloud. And Draco himself being asked one day, why his punishments were so unequall, as death for all kinds of faults, he answered: Because he thought the least offence worthy so much punishment: and for the greatest, he found none more grievous. Then Solon being defirous to have the chief Offices of the City to remain in rich mens hands, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authority of Government in such fort, as the meaner people might bear a little fway, which they never could before: he made an estimate of the Goods of every private Citi- solon rateth ezen. And those which he found yearly worth 500 bushels of Corn, and other liquid fruits and upwards, very Citizen he called Pentacosiomedimnes: as to say, five hundred bushell men of revenue. And those that had 300 at a certain hushele a very bushels a year, and were able to keep a horse of service, he put in the second degree, and called them Pentacosome Knights. They that might dispend but two hundred bushels a year, were put in the third place, dimni.

and called Zeagites. All other under those, were called Thetes, as ye would say, Hirelings, or Crastifand tance Leagues. An other more thought to bear any Office in the City, neither were they men living of their labour: who he did not admit to bear any Office in the City, neither were they men name of the City, and in Judge-taken as free Citizens, faving they had voices in elections, and Affemblies of the City, and in Judgements, where the People wholly judged. This at the first feemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpole, for hereby the most part of private quarrels and strife that grew among them, was to great purpoire, 101 neteroy me mont part of parties quarters and netter that grew among men, were in the end laid open before the People. For he fuffered those to appeal unto the People, which The darkness thought they had wrong judgement in their causes. Furthermore, because his Laws were written the Law in- fomewhat obscurely, and might be diversly taken and interpreted, this did give a great deal more authereive of the thority and power to the Judges. For, confidering all their controverfies could not be ended and thornty and power to the Jungs. For connucting an their controverines could not be ended and judged by express Law, they were driven of necessity always to run to the judges, and debated their matters before them. Infomuch as the judges by this means came to be formewhat above the Law: for they did even expound it as they would themselves. Solan self doth note, this equal division of the publick Authority, in a place of his Poesies, where he faith:

Three Coun-Athens.

He erected also the Council of the Areoparites, of those Magistrates of the City, out of which they did yearly chuse their Governour: and he himself had been of that number, for that he had been Governour for a year. Wherefore perceiving now the People were grown to a fromack and haughtinels of mind because they were clear discharged of their debts, he set up for matters of State, another Council of an hundred, choice out of every Tribe, whereof four hundred of them were to confult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the People: that when the great Council of the People at large should be assembled, no matter should be put forth, unless it had been before well confidered of, and digefted, by the Council of the four hundred. Moreover, he ordained the higher Court should have the chief authority and power over all things, and chiefly to fee the Law executed and maintained : supposing that the Common-weal being setled, and stayed with these two Courts (as with two strong Anker-holds) it should be the less turmoiled and trouwanture two cours (as want two attong runct and part of Writers hold this opinion, bled, and the People also better pacified and quieted. The most part of Writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the Council of the Areopagites, as we have faid, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his Laws and Ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but always speaketh to the Ephetes (which were Judges of life and death) when he spake Other Laws of long faith thus in these years mark.

All Such as keeping and a such a such as the such los faith thus, in these very words: All such as have been banished or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his Laws, shall be reftored again to their Goods and good name, except those which were condemned by order of the Council of the Artopagites, or by the Ephtetes, or by the Kings in open Court, for murder, and death of any man, or for aspiring to usurp tyranny. These words to the contrary seem to prove and testifie, that the Council of the Areopagnies was, before Solon was chofen reformer of the Laws. For how could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the Council of the Arropagites before Solon, if Solon was the first that gave it authority to judge ? unless a man will say peradventure, that he would a little help the matter of his Lawswhich were obfeure and dark, and would supply that they lacked, with expounding of the same by them. Those which shall be found attained and convicted of any matter, that hath been heard before the Council of the Areopagies, the Ephres, or the Governours of the City, when this Law shall come forth, fhall fland condemned ftill; and all other shall be pardoned, restored and set at liberty. Howsoever A Law against been so the sound evice; for the like was never stabilished elsewhere. And it is that Law, that pronounceth him defamed, and unhoneft, who in a civill uproar among the Citizens, fitteth still a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither side. Whereby his mind was, as it should appear, that private men should not be onely carefull to put themselves and their causes in fafety, nor yet should be careless for other mens matters, or think it a vertue not to meddle with the milerks and misfortunes of their Country, but from the beginning of every fedition that they should joyn with those that take the justest cause in hand, and rather to hazard themselves with such, then to tarry looking (without putting themselves in danger) which of the two should have the victory. There is another Law also, which at the first fight methinketh is very unbonest and fond: That if any man according to the Law hath matched with a rich Heir and Inheritor, and of himfelf is inpotent, and unable to do the Office of an Husband, the may lawfully lye with any whom the liketh. An Act for of her Husbands nearest Kinsmen. Howbeit some affirm, that it is a wise made Law for those which matching with knowing themselves unmeet to entertain Wedlock, will for covetousness of Lands, marry with Inheritors, and will think to force and reftrain Nature. For, feeing the Law fuffereth an Inheritor or Possectioner thus ill bestowed, at her pleasure to be bold with any of her Husbands Kin, men will either leave to purchase such Marriages, or if they be so careless that they will needs marry, it shall be to their extream shame and ignominy, and so shall they deservedly pay for their greedy covetousness. And the Law is made well also, because the Wife hath not scope to all her Husbands Kinsingen, but unto one choise man whom she liketh best of his House: to the end that the Children that shall be born, shall beat the least of her Husbands bloud and kindred. This also confirmeth the same, that fuch a new married Wife should be shut up with her Husband, and eat a Quince with him: and that he also which marrieth such an Inheritor, should of duty see her thrice a Moneth at the least. For although he get no Children of her, yet it is an honour the Husband doth to his Wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honest Woman, that he loveth her, and that he esteemeth of her. Besides, it taketh away many mislikings and displeasures which oftentimes happen in such cases, and keepeth love and good will waking, that it die not utterly between them. Furthermore, he took away all Joyn- Solon ferbidters and Dowries in other Marriages, and willed that the Wives should bring their Husbands but three deth Joynters Gowns onely, with fome other little Moveables of fmall value, and without any other thing as it and Dowries. were: utterly forbidding that they should buy their Husbands, or that they should make Merchandire of Marriages, as of other Trades to gain, but would that Man and Woman should marry together for Islue, for pleasure, and for love, but in no case for money. And for proof hereof, Dio-Dionysius say-The the Tyrant of Sicilie, one day answered his Mother (which would need be married to ing of Marriaa young man of Syracusa) in this fort : I have power (faith he) to break the Laws of Syracus RACUSA, by having the Kingdom; but to force the Law of Nature, or to make Marriage without the reasonable compass of age, that passeth my reach and Power. So it is not tolerable, and much less allowable also, that such disorder should be in well ordered Cities, that such uncomely and unfit Marriages should be made, between couples of unequall years: confidering there is no meet nor necessary end of such Matches, A wise Governour of a City, or a Judge and reformer of Laws and manners, might well fay to an old Man that should marry with a young Maid, as the Poet faith of PhiloEteres:

And finding a young man in an old rich womans house, getting his living by riding of her errands, and waxing fat, as they fay the Partridge doth, by treading of the Hens: he may take him from thence, to bestow him on some young Maid that shall have need of an husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another Law of Solons, which forbiddeth to speake ill of the dead. A Lawforbidter. But they greatly commend another Law of octons, which for the dead, no more than to ding to feek
For it is a good and godly thing to think, that they ought not to touch the dead, no more than to ding to feek touch holy things : and men should take great heed to offend those that are departed out of this dead, World: besides, it is a token of wisdom and civility, to beware of immortal enemies. He commanded also in the self-same Law, that no man should speak ill of the living, specially in Churches, during Divine Service, or in Councell-chamber of the City, nor in the Theaters whilest Games were a playing: upon pain of three silver Drachmes to be paid to him that was injured, and two to the Drachma; common Treasury. For he thought it too much shameless boldness, in no place to keep in ones choler; and moreover, that fuch lacked civility and good manners; and yet altogether to suppress and smother it, he knew it was not onely a hard matter, but to some natures impossible. And he that maketh Laws, must have regard to the common possibility of men, if he will punish little, with profitable example; and not much without some profit. So was he marvellously well thought of, for A Law for the Law that he made touching Wills and Testaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their Wills and Te-Heirs whom they would, but the Goods came to the Children or Kinred of the Testator. But he staments. leaving it at liberty; to dispose their Goods where they thought good, so they had no Children of their own : did therein prefer friendship before kindred, and good will and favour before necessity and constraint, and so made every one Lord and Master of his own Goods. Yet he did not simply and alike allow of all forts of gifts, however they were made, but those onely which were made by men of found memory, or by those whose wits failed them not by extream sickness, or through Drinks, medicines, Poyfonings, charms, or other fuch violence and extraordinary means, neither yet through the inticements and perswasions of women. As thinking very wifely, there was no difference at all between those that were evidently forced by constraint, and those that were compassed and wrought by Subornation at length to do a thing against their will, taking fraud in this case equall with violence, and pleasure with forrow, as passions with madness, which commonly have as much force the one as the other, to draw and drive men from reason. He made another Law also, in which he appointed the other, to draw and drive men from reason. He made another Law alto, in which neappointed women their times to go abroad into the fields, their mourning, their Featt and Sacrifices, plucking A Law for women their times to go abroad into the fields, their mourning, their featt and Sacrifices, plucking womens going from them all disorder and wilfull liberty, which they used before. For he did forbid that they should abroad. carry out of the City with them above three Gowns, and to take Victuals with them above the value of an half penny, neither Basket nor Pannier above a cubit high: and specially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their Coach, and that a Torch should be carried before them.

Crafts and Occupations advanced.

Drachmæ,

An Act for

He did forbid them also at the Buriall of the dead, to tear and spoil themselves with blows, to make lamentations in Verles, to weep at the Funerals of a stranger not being their kinsman, to facrifice an Oxe on the grave of the dead, to bury above three Gowns with the Coarfe, to go to other mens Graves, but at the very time of burying the Coarfe: all which, or the most part of them, are forbidden by our Laws this day. Moreover, those Laws appoint a penalty upon such women as of fend in the fame, to be difframed for, by certain Officers exprelly named, to comparoll and reform the abuses of women, as womanish persons and faint-hearted, which suffer themselves to be overcome with fuch patitons and fondnels in their mourning. And perceiving that the City of ATHENS beganto replenish daily more and more, by mens repairing thither from all parts, and by reason of the great affured fafety and liberty that they found there: and also considering how the greatest part of the Realm became in manner Heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffiquing the Seas, are not wont to bring any Merchandize to those which can give them nothing again in exchange: he began to practife that his Citizens should give themselves unto Crasts and Occupations, and made a Law, that the Son should not be bound to relieve his Father being old, unleis he had fet him in his youth to fome Occupation. It was a wife part of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a City where was no refort of strangers, and had so great a Territory, as could have surnished twice as many people, as Euripides faith, and moreover on all fides was environed with a great number of Slaves of the Lo-TES, whom it was needfull to keep fiill in labour and work continually) to have his Citizens always occupied in exercises of seates of Armes, without making them to learn any other Science, but discharged them of all other miserable Occupations and handy-Crafts. But Solon framing his Laws unto things, and not things unto Laws, when he faw the Countrey of ATTICA fo lean and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to furtain those that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impossible to keep to great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought The Authori- it very requisite to fetup Occupations, and to give them countenance and estimation. Therefore the southern a very require to technology and to get the confidence and entire to enquire to othe Court he ordained, that the Council of the Areopagites, should have full Power and Authority to enquire to be compared to the council of the Areopagites. how every man lived in the City, and also to punish such as they found idle People, and did not lahow every man live in the car, and the same and fraight a Law which he ordained, (as Heraclides Pontiem writeth) that the Children born of common Harlots and Strumpets should not be bound to relieve their Fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of Matrimony, plainly sheweth that he took not a Wife to have Children, but onely to fatisfie his luft and pleasure: and fo fuch a one hath his into a venic to have of his Children, fince just reward, and is disappointed of the reverence that a Father ought to have of his Children, fince through his own fault the birth of his Child falleth out to his reproach. Yet to fay truly, in Solong Laws touching Women, there are many abfurdities, as they fall out ill favouredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an Adulterer taking him with the Fact. But he that ravifhed or forcibly taketh away a free Woman, is onely condemned to pay an hundred Silver Drachmes, And he that was the Pandor to procure her, should onely pay twenty Drachmes; unless she had been a common Strumper or Curtizan: for such do justifie open access to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any person to sell his Daughters or Sifters, unless the Father or Brother had taken them abufing themselves before Marriage. Methinketh it is far from purpose and reafon, with feverity to punish a thing in one place, and over-lightly to pass it over in another: or to fet some light time on ones head for a great fault, and after to discharge him, as it were but a matto ret foline figure time virginistical to a great this, that money being very hard and feant at that time in ATHENS, those Fines were then very great and grievous to pay. For in setting out the charges of Offerings which should be made in Sacrifices, he appointed a Weather to be a convenient Offering, and be fetteth a bushell of Corn at a filver Drachme. More he ordained, that they which won any of the Games at ATHENS; should pay to the common Treasury an hundred Drachmes. And those that won any of the Games Olympicall, five hundred Drachmes. Also he appointed that he which brought an he wolf, should have five Drachmes, and him one Drachme for a reward of a she-Wolf. Whereof as Demetrius Valerian writeth, the one was the price of an Oxe, and the other of a Mutton. For, touching the rates he ordained in the fixteenth Table of his Laws meet for burnt Sacrifices, it is likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithstanding, the price which he setteth, is very little in comparison of that which they The Tribes of are worth at this day. Now it was a custome ever amongst the ATHENIANER kill their Wolves, the Athenians because all their Countrey lay for Pasture, and not for Tillage. Some there be that say, the Tribes of how they were the people of ATHENS have not been called after the names of the children of 10m, as the common opinion bath been: but that they were called after their divers Trades and manners of living, which they took themselves unto from the beginning. For , such as gave themselves unto the Wants may be alled Oplites: as who would fay, men of Armes. Those that wrought in their Occupations, were called Ergades: as much to fay, as men of Occupation. The other two which were Hubbandmen, and followed the Plough, were called Televates: as you would fay, labouring men. And those that kept Beasts and Cattell , were called Ægicores: as much to say, as Heardmen. Now, foralmuch as the whole Province of ATTICA was very dry, and had great lack of water, being not full of Rivers, running Streames, nor Lakes, nor yet flored with any great number of Springs, infomuch as they are driven there to use (through the most part of the Countrey.) Water drawn out of Wells made with mens hands: he made such an order, that where there was any Well within the space of an Hippicon, that every body within that Circuit, might come and draw Water onely at space of an emphasis, that every body waters that Well; for his use and necessity. Hippicon is the distance of four furlongs, which is half a mile:

and those that dwell further off, should go seek their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yards deep in the ground, and could find no water in the bottom, in this case, they might lawfully go to their next neighbours Well, and take a pot full of Water containing fix gallons, twice a day: judging it great reason that necessity should be holpen, but not that idleness should be cherished. He appointed also the spaces that should be kept and observed by those An Act for that would fet or plant Trees in their Ground, as being a man very skilfull in these matters. For he planting and ordained, that whosoever would plant any kind of Trees in his Ground, he should set them five setting oftrees. foot afunder one from another: but for the Fig-tree and Olive-tree specially, that they should in any case be nine foot asunder, because these two Trees do spread out their branches far off, and they cannot stand near other Trees but they must needs hurt them very much. For besides that they draw away the fap that doth nourish the other Trees, they cast also a certain moisture and steam upon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that who foever would dig a pit or hole in his ground, should dig it as far off from his neighbours pit, as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottom. And he that would let up a Hive of Bees in his Ground, he should let them at the least three hundred foot from other Hives set about him before. And of the fruits of the Earth, he was contented they should transport and fell onely Oyl out of the Realm to strangers, but no other Fruit or Grain. He ordained that the Governour of the City should yearly proclaim open curses against those that should do to the contrary, or elle he himself making default therein, should be fined at an hundred Drachmes. This Ordinance is in the first Table of Solons Drachman Laws, and therefore we may not altogether discredit those which say, they did forbid in the old time, that men should carry Figs out of the Countrey of ATTICA, and that from thence it came that these pick-thanks, which bewray and accuse them that transported Figs, were called Sycophantes. He made another Law also against the hurt that Beasts might do unto men. Wherein he ordained, That if a Dog did bite any man, he that ought him should deliver to him that was bitten, his Dog tied to a log of Timber of four cubits long: and this was a very good device, to make men fafe from Dogs. But he was very straight in one Law he made, that no stranger might be made Denizon and Free-man of the City of ATHENS, unless he were a banished man for ever out of his Countrey, or elfe that he should come and dwell there with all his Family, to exercise some Crast or Science. Notwithstanding, they say he made not this Law so much to put strangers from their freedom there, as to draw them thither, affuring them by this Ordinance, they might come and be free of the City: and he thought moreover, that both the one and the other would be more faithfull to the Common-weal of ATHENS. The one of them, for that against their wills they were driven to forfake their Countrey: and the other fort, for that advisedly and willingly they were contented to forfake it. This also was another of Selons Laws, which he ordained for those that should feast certain days at the Town-house of the City, at other mens cost. For he would not allow that one Fealls for man should come often to Feasts there. And if any man were invited thither to the Feasts, and did Townsmen in refule to come, he did fet a fine on his head, as reproving the miferable niggardliness of the one, Hall of Athens and the prelumptuous arrogancy of the other, to contemn and despile common order. After he had made his Laws, he did stablish them to continue for the space of an hundred years, and they were written in Tables of Wood called Axones, which were made more long then broad, in the Axones. which they were graven ; whereof there remain some Monuments yet in our time, which are to be feen in the Town-Hall of the City of ATHENS. Aristotle faith, that these Tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus also the Comicall Poet faith in one place, of Solon and Dracon : that Cyrbes was a Veffell or Pan wherein they did fry millet or hirfe. Howbeit others fay, that Cyrbes properly Cyrbes. were the Tables, which contained the Ordinances of the Sacrifices: and Axones were the other Tables, that concerned the Common-weal. So, all the Councels and Magistrates together did swear. that they would keep Solons Laws themselves, and also cause them to be observed of others throughly and particularly. Then every one of the Thefmothetes (which were certain Officers attendant on the Thefmothetes. Councell, and had speciall charge to see the Laws observed) did solemnly swear in the open Market place, near the stone where the Proclamations are proclaimed: and every of them both promised and vowed openly to keep the same Laws, and that if any of them did in any one point break the said Ordinances, then they were content that fuch offendor should pay to the Temple of Apollo, at the City of DELPHOS, an Image of fine gold, that should weigh as much as himself. Moreover, Solon seeing the diforder of the Moneths, and the moving of the Moon, which followed not the course of the Sun, and used not to rife and fall when the Sun doth, but oft times in one day it doth both touch and pass the Sun: he was the first that called the change of the Moon, Ene car nea, as much to say, as old and new Moon. Allowing that which appeared before the conjunction, to be of the Moneth past: and that which shewed it self after the conjunction, to be of the Moneth following. And he was the first also (in my opinion) that understood Homer rightly, when he said : Then beginneth the Moneth when it endeth. The day following the change, he called Neomenia, as much to fay, as the new Moneth, or the new Moon. After the twentieth day of the Moneth which they called Icada, he reckoned not the rest of the Moneth, as increasing, but as in the wane: and gathered it by seeing the light of the Moon decreafing, untill the thirtieth day. Now after his Laws were come abroad, and proclaimed, there came fome daily unto him, which either praifed them, or milliked them, and prayed him either to take away, or to add some thing unto them. Many again came and asked him, how he underftood fome fentences of his Laws: and requested him to declare his meaning, and that it should be taken. Wherefore confidering that it were to no purpose to resuse to do it, and again that it would get him much envy and ill will to yield thereunto: he determined (happen what would) to wind himself out of these briers, and to fly the groanings, complaints, and quarrels of his Citizens. For he faith himfelf:

Full hard it is , all minds content to have , And (pecially in matters hard and grave.

So, to convey himself a while out of the way, he took upon him to be Master of a Ship in a certain voyage, and asked license for ten years of the ATHENIANS to go beyond Sea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his Laws. So went he to the Seas, and the first place of his arrivall was in Ægypt, where he remained a while, as he himself faith.

Even there where Nilms , with his crooked cranks ,

By Canobe , falls into the Sea banks He went to his book there, and did confer a certain time with P (enophis Heliopolitan, and Sonelis Saitan, two of the wifest Priests at that time that were in EGYPT: whom when he heard rehearse the Story of the Isles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proved to put the same into Verse, and did fend it abroad through GREECE. At his departure out of EGYPT, he went into CYPRUS. where he had great courtefie and friendship of one of the Princes of that Countrey, called Philocyprus, who was Lord of a pretty little City which Demophon (Thefens fon) caused to be built upon the River of Clarie, and was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very lean and barren Countrey, Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deal to remove it out of that place, into a very fair and pleafant Valley that lay underneath it, and there to make it larger and statelier then it was; which was done according to his perswasion. And Solon felf being present at it, was made Overseer of the Buildings, which he did help to devife and order in good fort, as well in respect of pleasure, as for force and defence : infomuch as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other Lords of the Countrey did follow the example of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon. called this City SOLES, which before was called EPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his words unto Philocyprus, as followeth:

So grant the gods, that thon, and thine off-fpring, May clime to great and paffing Princely state: Long time to live, im Soles flourishing. And that they grant , my Ship and me good gate , When I from honce by feas shall take my may: That with her harp, dame Venus do vouchfafe To waft me fill, untill fhe may convey My felf again, into my Countrey fafe. Since I have been, the only mean and man, Which here to build, this City first began.

And as for the meeting and talk betwixt him and King Crafus, I know there are that by diffance of time will prove it but a fable, and devised of pleasure : but for my part I will not reject, nor condemn to famous an Hiftory, received and approved by to many grave testimonies. Moreover it is very agreeable to Solons manners and nature, and also not unlike to his wisdom and magnanimity; although in all points it agreeth not with certain tales (which they call Chronicles) where they have bufily noted the order and course of times, which even to this day, many have curiously sought to correct, and could yet never discuss it, nor accord all contrarieties and manifest repugnances in the Solon faw king fame. Solon at the defire and request of Crafu, went to fee him in the City of SARDIS. When So-Crafus in the City of Sardis. Ion was come thither, he feemed to be in the felf-fame taking that a man was once reported to be: who being born and bred upon the main Land, and had never feen the Sea neither far nor near. did imagine every River that he faw had been the Sea. So Solon paffing alongst Crasus Palace, and meeting by the way many of the Lords of his Court richly apparelled, and carrying great trains of Serving-men, and Souldiers about them : thought ever that one of them had been the King, untill he was brought unto Crasu self. Who was passing richly arrayed, what for precious Stones and Jewels, and for rich coloured Silks, layed on with curious Goldsmiths work, and all to shew himfelf to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiving by Solons repair to his presence, that he shewed no manner of sign, nor countenance of wondering, to see so great a state before him, neither had given out any word near or likely to that which Crasus looked for in his own imagination, but rather had delivered speeches for men of judgement and underflanding to know, how inwardly he much did millike Crass foolish vanity and base mind; then Crafus commanded all his Treasuries to be opened, where his gold and Silver lay: next, that they should shew him his rich and sumptuous Wardrobes, although they needed not : for to see Cresus felf, it was enough to difcern his nature and condition. After he had feen all over and over, becrafus quelli- ing brought again unto the prefence of the King: Crafus asked him, if ever he had feen any man more happy them himself was? Solon answered him, I have : and that was one Tellus a Citizen of ATHENS, who was a marvellous honeft man, and had left his children behind him in good eftimasolon effeemed tion, and well to live: and laftly, was most happy at his death, by dying honourably in the field, Tellas a happy in defence of his Countrey. Crasus hearing this answer, began to judge him a man of little wit, or of gross understanding, because he did not think, that to have store of Gold and Silver, was the onely joy and felicity of the World, and that he would prefer the life and death of a mean and private man as more happy, then all the riches and power of fo mighty a King. Notwithstanding all this, Crafus yet asked him again : What other man befide Tellow he had feen happier then himfelf? S. lon answered him, that he had feen Cleebis and Bisson, which were both brethren, and lo- Cleebis and Bived one another fingularly well , and their mother in fuch fore: that upon a folerm Peftival day, too happy men. when the should go to the Temple of Jano in her Coach drawn with Oxen: because they tarried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly youked themselves by the necks, and drew their Mothers Coach instead of the Oxen, which marvellously rejoyced her, and she was thought most happy of all other, to have born two such Sons. Afterwards when they had done Sacrifice to the goddefs, and made good chear at the Feath of this Sacrifice, they went to bed : but they rose not again the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurt or forrow, alter they had received so much glory and honour. Grasu then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in choler, faid .unco him : Why, doft thou reckon me then in no degree of happy men? Solen would neither flatter him, nor further increase his hear, but answered him thus : O Solone more-King of Lydians, the gods have given us Grecians all things in a mean, and amongst other detaths mean. things chiefly, a base and popular Wisdom, not Princely nor noble; which considering how mans life is subject to infinite changes, doth forbid us to truft or glory in these worldly Riches. For time bringeth daily mistortunes anto man, which he never thought of, nor looked for. But when the no before he gods have continued a mans good fortune to his end, then we think that man happy and bleffed, end, and never before. Otherwife, if we should judge a man happy that liveth, considering he is ever in danger of change during life: we should be much like to him, who judgeth him the victory before hand, that is still a fighting, and may be overcome, having no firrety yet to carry it away. After Sal n had spoken these words, he departed from the Kings presence, and returned back again, leaving King Crafus offended, but nothing the wifer, nor amended. Now Afor that wrote the Fables, being at that time in the City of SARDIS, and fent for thither by the King, who entertained him very honourably: was very forty to fee that the King had given Solon no better entertainment: fo by way of advise he faid unto him: O Sekn, either we must not come to Princes at all, or Affin faying else we must feek to please and content them. But Solon turning it to the contrary, answered him: 10 Solon.

Fisher we must not come to Princes, or else we must needs tell them truly and counful them for Either we must not come to Princes, or else we must needs tell them truly, and counsell them for to Asso. the best. So Crasus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he had lost the Battell against Cyrus, and that his City was taken, himself become Prifoner, and was bound fast to a Gibber, over a great flack of Wood, to be burnt in the fight of all the Persians, and of Cyrus his Enemy: he then cryed out as lowed as he could, thrice together: O Solon! Cyrne being abathed, sent to ask him, whether this Solon he onely cryed upon in his extream misery, was a god or man. Crafus kept it not fecret from him, but faid: he was one of the wife men of GREECE, King Crafus whom I feat for to come unto me on a certain time, not to learn any thing of him which I stood words of solon in need of , but onely that he might witness my felicity , which then I did enjoy: the loss whereof hanging upon is now more hurtfull, then the enjoying of the fame was good and profitable. But now (alas) too a glibber to be late I know it, that the Riches I possessed then, were but words and opinion, all which are turned Riches are but now to my birter forrow, and to prefent and remedilels calamity. Which the wife GRECIAN words and opiconfidering then , and forefeeing afar off by my doings at that time , the inftant milecy I fuffer nion. now; gave me warning I should mark the end of my life, and that I should not too far presume of my self, as puffed up then with vain glory of opinion of happiness, the ground thereof being fo flippery, and of fo little furery. These words being reported unto Cyme, who was wifer then Crefus, and feeing School faying confirmed by fo notable an example : he did not onely deliver Crefur from present peril of death, but ever after honoured him fo long as he lived. Thus had Solon glory, for lawing the honour of one of these Kings, and the life of the other, by his grave and wife counfell. But during the time of his ablence, great feditions rofe at ATHENS amongst the Inhabitans, who had gotten them feverall heads amongst them: as those of the Valley had made Lyene-them in Solons gus their head. The Coast-men, Megaeles, the Son of Alemeon. And those of the Mountains, absence. Tyfiftratus: with whom all Artificers and Crafts-men living of their handy-labour were joyned, which were the stoutest against the rich. So that notwitstanding the City kept Solons Laws and Ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a change, and defired to fee things in another flate : either parties hoping their condition would mend by change, and that every of them should be better then their Adverfaries. The whole Common-weal broyling thus with troubles, Solon ar- Solonteumeth rived at ATHENS, where every man did honour and reverence him: howbeit he was no more able to Athens. to speak aloud in open Assembly to the People, nor to deal in matters as he had done before, because his age would not suffer him: and therefore he spake with every one of the heads of the severall Factions apart, trying if he could agree and reconcile them together again. Whereunto $T\gamma f \beta r_{a}$ tu feemed to be more willing then any of the rest, for he was courteous, and marvelloully fair spoken, and shewed himself besides, very good and pitifull to the poor, and temperate also to his Enemies: further, if any good quality were lacking in him, he did to finely counterfeit it, that men imagined it was more in him, then in those that naturally had it in them indeed. As to be a quiet man , Polificatus no medler, contented with his own, afpiring no higher, and hating those which would attempt to wicked craft change the prefent state of the Common weal, and would practife any innovation. By this Art and subtility and fine manner of his, he deceived the poor common people. Howbeit Selen found him straight, and faw the mark he shot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and sought still to win him, and bring him to reason, saying oft times, both to himself and to others: That whoso could plack our of his head the Worm of Ambition, by which he afpired to be the chiefest, and could heal him of his greedy defire to rule: there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better Citizen then he ms greetly defire to rule: there command to a man of more vertice, or a control than the Tragedies, which was a thing that much 100 ps amaker would prove. About this line organ 1 or ps to let out this 1 cagents, which was a thing that much of Tragedies. delighted the People for the rareness thereof, being not many Poets yet in number, to firme one against another for victory, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally defirous to hear and learn, and by reason of his age seeking to pass his time away in Sports, in Musick, and making good rearn, and oy rearon or its age recaing to pais its time away in sports, in matrice, and making good Chear more then ever he did; went one day to fee Thelpis, who plaid a part himfelf, as the old Curar more men ever ne qui a went one day to tee 1 neight, who piatu a part nument, as the old faithion of the Poets was, and after the Play was ended, he called him to him, and asked him: if he rainion of the roets was, and after the risy was chart, he canculated them, and asked that it was not substrated were not assaud to lye to openly in the face of the World. The face and were not assaud to lye to openly in the face of the World. The face of the World. were not alhamed to lye to openly in the race or the world.

The fifth in fort. Then Sclow beating the materiall to do or fay any fact things, confidering all was but in foort. Then Sclow beating the materiall to do or fay any fact things, confidering all was but in foort quoth he) we shall ground with his staff he hand: but if we commend lying in foort quoth he) we shall ground with his staff he good earnest, in all our bargains and dealings. Shortly after Pyfistratus had in a streamards in good earnest, in all our bargains and dealings. Shortly after Pyfistratus had the stream of t ving wounded himfelf, and bloudied all his body over, cauled his men to carry him in his Coach into the Market-place, where he put the People in an uproar, and told them that they were his Enemies the mainterplate, where he par the reopte in an uppose, and to the them about the governing that thus traiteroully had handled and arrayed him, for that he frood with them about the governing of the Commonweal: infomuch as many of them were marvelloufly offended, and mutined by and by, crying out, it was shamefully done. Then Solon drawing near, said unto him: O thou and by, crying out, it was maintainly wone, and such an arrang that, and allow the son of Hippocrates, thou does illiavouredly counterfeit the perion of Homers Visiges; for thou haft whipped thy felf to deceive thy Citizens, as he did tear and feratch himself, to deceive his Enarc wamped my left to deterve my chizens, as he did tear and it atth minen, to deceive his Enemics. Notwithstanding this, the common People were still in uproar, being ready to take Arms for Pysspram: and there was a general Counsell assembled, in the which one Ariston spake, that not a spiration. and there was a general counter anemone, in the which one stripon trace, that they should grant fifty men, to carry Halbards and Mases before Pysistratus for guard of his person, they should grant fifty men, to carry Halbards and Mases before Pysistratus for guard of his person.

But Salon going up into the Pulpir for Orations, froutly inveyed against it: and perswaded the People with many realons, like unto these he wrote afterwards in Verse: Each one of you (O men) in private alls Can play the fox , for flie and subtill craft :

But when you come, yfore (in all your facts) Then are you blind, dull witted and bedaft : For pleasant speech and painted flattery, Beguile you fill, the which you never fpy

But in the end, feeing the poor people did tumult ftill, taking Pyfiffratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way also, saying he had shewed himself wifer then some, and hardier then other. Meaning, wifer then those which saw not Pysistratus reach and fetch: and hardier then they which knew very well he did afpire to be King, and nevertheless durk not resist him. The people went on with the motion of drifton, and authorized the same, touching the grant of Halbarders: limiting no number, but suffered him to have about him, and to affemble as many as he would, untill fuch time as he had gotten possession of the Castle. Then the City was marvellously assaid and amazed: and prefently Megaelts, and all those which were of the House of the Alemonides did flie. Solon, who for years was now at his last cast, and had no man to stick unto him; went norwithstanding into the Market-place, and spake to the Citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beaftlines, and faint cowardly hearts, and encouraged them, not to lose their liberty. He spake at that time notably, and worthy memory, which ever after was remembred. Before, faid he. you might more easily have flaid this present tyranny: but now that it is already sashioned, you shall win more glory, utterly to suppress it. But for all his goodly reasons, he found no man that would hearken unto him, they were all amazed. Wherefore he hied him home again, and took his weapons out of his houle, and laid them before his gate in the midt of the firet, faying: For my part, I have done what I can possible, to help and defend the Laws and Liberties of my County part, I have done what I can possible, to help and defend the Laws and Liberties of my County part, I have done what I can possible, to help and defend the Laws and Liberties of my County part, I have done what I can possible, to help and defend the Laws and Liberties of my County part, I have done what I can possible to help and defend the Laws and Liberties of my County part, I have done what I can possible to help and defend the Laws and Liberties of my County part and the laws are the laws and laid them before his gate in the midt of the first part and the laws are t trey. So from that time he betook himself unto his eale, and never after dealt any more in matters of State, or Common-weal. His friends did counfell him to flye: but all they could not perfusade him to it. For he kept his house, and gave himself to make Verses: in which he fore reproved the

and constancy. ATHENIANS faults, faying : If presently your burden heavy be:

Tet murmure not against the gods therefore. The fault is yours , as you your self may see, Which granted have of mighty Mars the lore To such as nowaby your direction

His friends hereupon did warn him, to beware of fuch speeches, and to take heed what he said, left if it came unto the Tyrants ears, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherein he truffed, that he spake so boldly. He answered them, in my age. Howbeit Psithur after he had obtained his purpose, sending for him upon his word and faith, did honour and programs him so well these Salar in the and honour and sending the salar and the sa entertain him fo well, that Solow in the end became one of his Councell, and approved many things on, and to purge himself thereof. But his accuser let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Pyfiftratue himfelt also did make new laws : as this, That he that had been maimed , and made lamed any member in the Wars, should be maintained all his life long at the common charges of the Cay. for reward of which he did. For Psfistratus himself did straightly keep, and caused his friends to keep Solons Laws. Infomuch as when he was called by process into the Gourt of the Arropagites for a murder, even at that time when he was a Tyrant; he prefented himfelf very modefely to answer his accusaiSOLON.

The felf-fame was before decreed by Theolippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perswasion : who did prefer it to the Council. Pyfiftratus afterwards took hold of the motion, and from thenceforth made it a generall Law, Theophrafin faith alfo, it was Pyfifratm, and not Solon, that made the Law for idleness: which was the onely cause that the Countrey of ATTICA became more fruitfull, being better manured: and the City of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon having begun to write the Story of the Illes ATLANTIDES in Verse (which he had learned of the wife men of the City of Sais in Egypt, and was very necessary for the Athenians) grew weary, and gave it over in mid way: not for any matters or business that troubled him, as Plato faid, but onely for his age, and because he feared the tediousness of the work. For otherwise he had leisure enough, as appeared by these Verses, where he saith:

I grow old, and yet I learn still. And in another place where he faith:

Now Venus yeelds me (weet delights . And Bacchus lends me comfort fill: The Mufes the refresh my foriouts . And much relieve my weary will. Thefe be the points of perfett eafe, Which all mens minds oft simes do pleafe.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the Story and Fables of the Isles Atlantides, was defirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of speech have broken up a field or lay-Land of his own, or that this gift had descended to him of right from Solom. He began to raise up a stately front unto the same, and enclosed it with high walls, and large squared Courts at the entry thereof: fuch was it, as never any other Work, Fable, or Poeticall invention had ever so notable, or the like. But because he began a little too late, he ended his Life before his Work, leaving the Ceaders more forrowfull for that was left unwritten, then they took pleafure in that they found written. For even as in the City of ATHENS, the Temple of Jupiter Olympian onely remained unperfect: fo the wildome of Plato (amongst many goodly matters of his that have come abroad) left none of them unperfect, but the onely Tale of the Isles ATLANTIDES. Solon lived long time after Pylistratus had usurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Ephesian writeth, that he lived not above two years after. For Pyfiftratus usurped tyrannicall power in the year that Comias was chief Governour in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon dyed in the year that Hegestratus was Governour, which was the next year after that. And where some say, the ashes of his body were after his death strawed abroad through the Isle of SALAMINA: that seemeth to be but a Fable, and altogether untrue. Nevertheless it hath been written by notable Authors, and amongst others, by Aristotle the Philosopher.

THE LIFE OF PUBLIUS VALERIUS PUBLICOLA.

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Christ. 506.

Ow we have declared what Solon was, we have thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAN People for an honour gave that Surname : for he was called before Publim Valerim, descended from that ancient Valirim, who was one of the chiefest workers and means to bring the ROMANS and the SABYNS that were mortall enemies, to joyn together as one people. For it was he that most moved the two Kings to agree, and joyn together. Publicula being descended of him, whilest the Kings did rule yet at ROME, was in very great estimation, as well for his eloquence, as for his riches: using the one rightly and freely for the relief of the poor. So that it was manifed, if the Realm came to be converted into a public flare be would be one of the distribution.

The House of

P. Valerius.

Tarquinius Confuls.

Tarquinins Su-lick flate, he would be one of the chiefest men of the same. It chanced that King Tarquine surface med the proud, being come to the Crown by no good lawfull mean, but contrarily, by indirect and wicked ways, and behaving himfelf not like a King, but like a cruell Tyrant, the People much hated and deterted him, by reason of the death of Lucretia (which killed her self for that she was forcibly ravished by him) and so the whole City rose and rebelled against him. Lucius Brutus taking upon him to be the Head and Captain of this infurrection and rebellion, did joyn first with this Valerius: Valerius, Bru- who did greatly favour and affift his enterprife, and did help him to drive out King Tarquine with all the companion his house and family. Now whilest they were thinking that the People would choose some one alone to be chief Ruler over them, inftead of a King : Valerius kept himfelf quiet, as yeelding willingly unto Bratus the first place, who was meeter for it, having been the chief Authour and Worker of their recovered liberty. But when they faw the name of Monarchy (as much to fay, as Soveraignity alone) was displeasant to the People, and that they would like better to have the rule divided unto two, and how for this cause they would rather choose two Consuls: Valerius then began to hope he should be the second person with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him. For against Brutus will, Tarquisius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was chosen Consull with him: not because he was a man of greater vertue, or of better estimation then Valerius. But the Noblemen of the City searing the practiles of those of the Kings bloud, which fought by all the fair and flattering means they could to return again into the City: did determine to make fuch a one Confull, whom occafion forced to be their hard and heavy Enemy, perswading themselves that Terquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeeld unto them. Valerim took this matter grievously, that they had a miltruft in him, as if he would not do any thing he could, for the benefit of his Countrey for that he had never any private injury offered him by the Tyrants. Where ore he repaired no more unto the Senate to plead for private men , and wholly gave up to meddle in matters of State:

infomuch as he gave many occasion to think of his absence, and it troubled some men much, who feared left upon this his milliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings fide, and so bring all the City in an uproar, confidering it flood then but in very tickle terms. But when Brutus, who flood in jealoufie of fome, would by Oath be affured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day folemnly to take their Oaths upon the Sacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerfull countenance came into the Market-place, and was the first that took his oath he would leave nothing undone that might prejudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power lie would fight against them, and defend the liberty of the City. This Oath of his marvelloully rejoyced the Senare, and gave great affurance also to the Confuls, but specially, because his deeds did shortly after perform his words. For there came Ambassadors to Rome, which brought letters from King Tarquine, full of sweet and lowly bassate of fpeeches, to win the favour of the People, with commission to use all the mildest means they could, King Tarquine to dulce and foften the hardned hearts of the multitude : who declared how the King had left all pride for recovering and cruelty, and meant to ask nought but reasonable things. The Confuls thought best to give his Realm. them open audience, and to fuffer them to speak to the People. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might perill the State much, and deliver occasion of new stir unto a multitude of poor People, which were more afraid of Wars, then of Tyranny. After that, there came other Ambassadors Another Amalfo, which faid that Tarquine would from thenceforth for ever give over and renounce his Title to baffiate from the Kingdom, and to make any more Wars; but befought them onely, that they would at the least Tarquine, dedeliver him and his friends their Money and Goods, that they might have wherewithall to keep them manding his in their banishment. Many came on apace, and were very ready to yeeld to this request, and speci-Goods. ally Collarinus, one of the Confuls did favour their motion. But Brutus, that was a fast and refolute man, and very fierce in his heat, ran immediately into the Market-place, crying out that his fellow Confull was a Traytor, and contented to grant the Tyrants matter and means to make War upon the City, where indeed they deserved not so much as to be relieved in their exile. Hereupon the recople assembled together, and the first that spake in this affembly, was a private man called Gaim Minnim, who speaking unto Bratun, and to the whole Assembly, faid unto them: O Noble Good counsel Confull and Senate, handle fo the matter, that the Tyrants Goods be rather in your cuftody to make of Minutius. War with them, then in theirs to bring War upon your felves. Notwithstanding the ROMANS were of opinion, that having gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the Tyrants, they should not disappoint the offered peace, with keeping back their Goods, but rather they should throw their not dilappoint the outered peace, with account of the peace of Tarquines intent, to feek his Goods Goods out after them. Howbeit this was the leaft part of Tarquines intent, to feek his Goods Tarquines Amagain : but under pretence of that demand, he fecretly corrupted the People, and practifed Trea-baffadors prafon , which his Ambaffadors followed, pretending onely to get the Kings Goods and his favourers to- fife treafon. gether, faying, that they had already fold fome part, and some part they kept, and sent them daily. The Aquilli So as by delaying the time in this fort with fuch pretences, they had corrupted two of the beft and and Vitellii So as by ucraying the time in this south, the Family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Sena- with Brutus ancienteft houses of the City: to wit, the Family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Sena- fons, Traytors tors: and the Family of the Vitellian:, whereof there were two Senators: all which by their Mo- to their Counthers, were Confull Collatinus Nephews. The Vitellians also were allied unto Brutus, for he had trey. married their own Sifter, and had many Children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawn to their string, two of the eldest of them, because they familiarly frequenced together, being Cousin germains, whom they had entited to be of their conspiracy, allying them with the House of the Tarquines, which was of great power, and through the which they might perfuade themselves to rife to great honour and preferment by means of the King, rather then to truft to their Fathers wilfull hardiness: for they called his severity to the wicked, hardness: for that he would never pardon any. Furthermore, Brutus had feigned himself mad, and a fool of long time for safety of his life, because the Tyrant should not put him to death : so that the name of Brutus onely remained. After these two young men had given their consent to be of the Consederacy, and had spoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great an horrible Oath, drinking the bloud of a man, and shaking stands in his bowels, whom they would sacrifice. This matter The Confederagreed upon between them, they met together to put their Sacrifice in execution, in the House of racy confirmed the Agridant. They had fithy pickt out a dark place in the House to do this Sacrifice in, and where al-with drinking most no body came; yet it happed by chance, that one of the Servants of the House called Vindicious, of mans blood. had hidden himself there, unknowing to the Traytors, and of no fet purpose, to spie and see what they eth all their did, or that he had any manner of inkling thereof before: but falling by chance upon the matter, even Treason. as the Traytors came into that place with a countenance to do some secret thing of importance, fearing to be feen, he kept himfelf close, and lay behind a coffer that was there, so that he faw all that was done, and what they faid and determined. The conclusion of their Council in the end was this, that they The conclusiwould kill both the Confuls: and they wrote Letters to Tarquinius advertifing the fame, which they on of their gave unto his Amballadors, being lodged in the house of the Aquiliant, and were present at this conflution. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindiciss came out also as secretly is he could, being marvelloufly troubled in mind, and at amaze how to deal in this matter. For he hought it dangerous (as it was indeed) to go and accuse the two Sons unto the Father (which was Bru-(ns) of so wicked and detestable Treason, and the Nephews unto their Uncle, which was Collatinus. On the other fide also, he thought this was a secret, not to be imparted to any private person, and not offible for him to conceal it, that was bound in duty to reveal it. So he resolved at the last to go to alerins to bewray this Treason, of a speciall affection to this man, by reason of his gentle and cour-tous using of men, giving easie access and audience unto any that came to speak with him, and specially for that he disdained not to hear poor mens causes. Vindicius being gone to speak with him, and having told him the whole Conspiracy before his brother Marem Valerim, and his wife, he was abasthed and fearfull withall: whereupon he stayed him less the should slip away, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watch the door, that no body went in nor out unto him. And willed his brother allo, that he should go and befet the Kings Palace round about, to intercept these Letters if it were possible, and to see that none of their Servants sled. Valerius self being followed (according to his manner) with a great train of his friends and people that waited on him, went traight unto the house of the Aquilians, who by chance were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he found the Letters in the chamber, were King Tarquines Ambalfadors lay: Whilft he was thus occupied, the Aquilians having intelligence thereof, ran home immediately, and found Valerius coming out at their Gate. So they would have taken those Letters from him by force and strong hand: but Valerius and his company did resist them, and moreover hudded them with their Gowns over their heads, and by force brought them (do what they could) into the Market-place. The like was done also in the Kings Palace, where Marcus Valeriss found other Letters also wrapt up in certain fardels for their more safe carriage, and brought away with him by force into the Market-place, all the Kings fervants he found there. There the Confuls having caused silence to be made, Valering sent home to his house for this Bond-man Vindui-10 be brought before the Confuls: then the Traytors were openly accused, and their Letters read, and they had not the face to answer one word. All that were prefent, being amazed, hung down their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durst once open his mouth to speak, excepting a few, who to gratific Bratus, began to say that they should banish them: and Collatinus also gave them fome hope, because he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner, for that he held his peace. But Britin calling his Sons by their names: Come on (faid he) Titin and thou Valerin, why do you Thus and Va- not answer to that you are accused of ? and having spoken thrice unto them to answer, when he saw terius, Braust they stood mure, and faid nothing the turned him to the Serieants, and faid unto them: They are now in your hands, do juftice. So foon as he had spoken these words, the Serieants layed hold immediately upon the two young men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound their hands behind them, and then whipped them with rods: which was such a pitifull fight to all the people, that they could not find in their hearts to behold it, but turned themselves another way, because they would not fee it. But contrariwife, they fay that their own Father had never his eye off them, neither did change his auftere and fierce countenance, with any pity or naturall affection towards them, but stedfastly did behold the punishment of his own Children, untill they were layed flat on the ground, and both their heads stricken off with an Ax before him. When they were execu-Brutus feeth Brutas praifed ted, Brutas role from the Bench, and left the execution of the reft unto his fellow Confull. This was such an act, as men cannot sufficiently praise, nor reprove enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his mind fo quiet, or else the greatness of his misery that took away thefeeling of his forrow : whereof neither the one nor the other was any finall matter, but patfing the common nature of man, that hath in it both Divinences, and sometime beaftly brutishfor the death nels. But it is better the judgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of of his fons. men by their judgements should diminish his vertue. For the ROMANS hold opinion, it was not for great an act done of Romnius first to build ROME, 28 it was for Brutus to recover ROME, and the best liberty thereof, and to renew the ancient Government of the same. When Bruttus was gone, all the People in the Market-place remained as they had been in a maze, full of fear and Collisions for wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was done. The Agnilians straight grew nels perillous, bold, for that they faw the other Confull Collatinus proceed gently, and mildly against them: and to made petition they might have time given them to answer to the Articles they were accused of, and that they might have their Slave and Bond-man Vindicius delivered into their hands, because there was no reason, he should remain with their accusers. The Confull seemeth willing to yeeld thereto, and was ready to break up the Affembly thereupon. But Valerius faid, he would not deliver Vindicius (who was among the Affembly that attended upon his person:) and stayed the People besides for departing away, left they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly Valerius bold. fought to betray their Countrey: until he himself had layed hands upon them, calling upon Brutus to affift him, with open exclamation against Collatinus, that he did not behave himself like a just and true man, feeing his fellow Brutu was forced for juffice fake to fee his own Sons put to death: and he in contrary manner, to please a few Women, sought to let go manifest Traytors, and open Enemies to their Countrey. The Confull being offended herewith, commanded they should bring away the Bond-man Vindicim. So the Sergeants making way through the prease, laid hands upon him to bring him away with them, and began to ftrike at them which offered to refift them. But Valerius friends stept out before them, and put them by. The People should ftraight, and cried out for Brutus: who with this noise returned again into the Market-place, and after silence made him , he spake in this wise : For mine own children, I alone have been their sufficient Judge, to fee them have the Law according to their defervings: the reft I have left freely to the judgement of the People. Wherefore (faid he) if any man be disposed to speak, let him stand up, and perswade the People as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more words, but onely to hearken what the People cried: who with one voice and confent condemned them, and cried execution, and accordingly they had their heads ftricken off. Now was Confull Collatinus long before had in fone fuspition, as allied to the Kings, and diffiked for his furname, because he was called Tarquining:

The people then affembled themselves, to place a fuc-Valerius choceffor in his room, they chose Valerins in his stead, without the contradiction of any, for his faith- fen Conful in ful travel and diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerius judging that Vindicius the bond. his place. man had well deferved also some recompence, caused him not onely to be manumissed by the wholese strate of the people but made him a free man of the City besides, and he was the first boundary full boundary. grant of the people, but made him a free man of the City, besides: and he was the first bondman manumilled. manumiffed, that was made Citizen of Rome, with permission also to give his voice in all elections of Offices, in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to curry favour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumified, to give their voices also in elections, as other Citizens did: and unto this day the perfect manumishing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vinditta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a freeman. These things thus passed over, the goods of the Kings were given to the spoil of the people, Vinlistato caland their Pallaces were razed and overthrown. Now amongst other Lands, the goodlieft part of the led, by reason field of Mars was belonging unto King Tarquine: the fame they confectated forthwith, unto the Vinlicius and a Mars, and not long before they cut down the wheat thereof the flexuse being was in floated. These sheaves thus thrown into the River, were carried down by the stream not far from thence, unto a foord and shallow place of the water, where they first did stay, and did let the other which came after, that it could go no further: there these heaps gathered together, and lay so close one to another, that they began to fink and settle fast in the water. Afterwards the stream of the River brought down continually such mud and gravell, that it ever encreased in the heap of corn more and more, in such fort, that the force of the water could no more remove it from thence, but rather foftly preffing and driving it together, did firm and harden it, and made it grow fo to Land. Thus this heap rifing still in greatness and firmness, by reason that all that came down the River stayed there, it grew in the end and by time to spread fo far, that at this day it is called the holy Island in Rome: in which are many goodly Temples Whereof the of divers gods, and fundry walks about it, and they call it in Latin, Inter duos pontes: in our holy Island of divers goos, and timitry wains about it, aim time the came in Rome trongue, between the two Bridges. As amongst others, it was Ordained, that her word and witness should stand good, and be allowed in matters judicial: which Priviledge, never Woman besides her self did enjoy. Tarquinius then being patt nope of ever entring into his Kingdom again, went yet unto the Thuscans for fuccour, which were very think on eth with a glad of him: and so they levied a great Army together, hoping to have put him in his Kingdom great power of again. The Confuls also hearing thereof, went out with their Army against him. Both the Armies the Thusant presented themselves in battle ray, one against another, in the Holy places consecrated to the gods: to wage battle whereof the one was called the wood Arfia, and the other the Meadow Afivvia. And as both Armies with the Robegan to give charge upon each other, Arnus the eldest Son of King Tarquine, and the Conful Arsa structure encountered together not by charge law fought for of the Brutus encountered together, not by chance, but fought for of fet purpose to execute the deadly feud, and malice they did bear each other. The one as against a Tyrant and enemy of the liberty of Armus and his Countrey: the other, as against him that had been chiefauthour and worker of their exile and Brutus en-Expulsion. So they fet Spurs to their Horses, so soon as they had spied each other, which more commerced and sury then reason, and sought so desperately together, that they both sell stark dead to the ground, the most way no less before the basels being so and the and thought way no less before the basels being so and thought way no less before the basels being so and thought way no less before the basels being so and thought way no less before the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being so and thought way to be so the basels being The first onset of the battle being so cruel, the end thereof was no less bloody: untill both the Armies having received and done like damage to each other, were parted by a marvellous great tempest that fell upon them. Now was Valerius marvellously perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wan the Field that day: feeing his fouldiers as forrowfull for the great loss of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the flaughter and Victory of their enemies. For, to view the multitude of the flain bodies of either fide, the number was so equal in fight, that it was very hard to judge, of which fide fell out the greatest slaughter : so that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remain of their Camp, were perswaded in their Opinion, that they had rather loft than won, conjecturing a far off the fall of their Enemies. The night being come, such things fell out as may be looked for after to terrible a battle. For when both Camps were all layed to reft, they fay the wood wherein they lay encamped quaked and trembled: and they heard a voice fay, that onely one man more was flain on the Thuscans fide, than on the ROMANS part. Out of doubt this was some voice from Heaven: for the ROMANS The Victory of thereupon gave a shrill shout, as those whose hearts received a new quickning spirit or courage. The of the Romant THUSCANS on the contrary part were fo afraid, that the most part of them stole out of the against the Camp, and scattered here and there: and there remained behind about the number of five thou. Thuscans. fand men, whom the ROMANS took prisoners every one, and had the spoil of their Camp. The carkaffes were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were flain in that battle, eleven thouland and three hundred of the THUSCANS: and of the ROMANS, fo many faving one. This battle was fought (as they fay) the last day of February, and the Conful Valerina triumphed, being the first of the Confuts that ever entred into Rome triumphing upon a Chariot drawn with four Horses, which fight the people found honourable and goodly to behold, and were not offended withall (as some seem to report) nor yet did erwy him for that he began it. For if it had been fo, that cuftom had not been followed with fo good acceptation, nor had continued fo many years as it did afterwards. They much commended also the honour he did to his fellow Confull Brains, in fetting out his Funerals and Obsequies, at the which he made a Funeral Oration in his praise. They ginning of Fu did fo like and please the ROMANS, that they have ever fince continued that custom at the buneral Orations neral Orations and Noble man, or great Perfonage, that he is openly praifed at his burial, by the wortheft man that liveth among them. They report this Funeral Oration is far more ancient than the first that was made in GREECE in the like case: unless they will confirm that which the Orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praifing the dead at their Funerals, was first of all in-Stituted by Solon. But they did most envy Valerius, and bear him grudge, because Brutus (whom was the first the people did acknowledge for Father of their liberty) would never be alone in Office, but had that minuted profess for the procured twice, that they should appoint Valerius fellow Conful with him. This man in contrariwife (faid the people) taking upon him alone the rule and foveraignty, sheweth plainly he will not be Brutus fucceffour in his Confulfhip, but Tarquinius felf in the Kingdom. For to great purpose was it to praise Brutus in words, and to follow Tarquinius in deeds: having born before him only all the Maces, the Axes and the Rods, when he cometh abroad out of his own house, which is far greater, and more stately, than the Kings Pallace which he himself overthrew. And to say truly, Valerius stately Valerius dwelt in a house a little too sumptuously built and seated, upon the hanging of the Hill called house flanding Mount Velia: and because it stood high, it overlooked all the Market-place so that any man might eafily fee from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very ill to come to it : but when he came out of his house, it was a marvellous Pomp and State to see him come down from so high Valering good a place, and with a train after him, that carried the Majefty of a Kings Court. But herein Valering leit a Noble example, fhewing how much it importeth a Noble man and Magistrate, ruling weighty causes, to have his ears open to hear, and willingly to receive free speech instead of flatteries, and plain troth in place of lies. For, being informed by some of his Friends, how the People milliked and complained of it, he flood not in his own conceit, neither was angry with them : but forthwith fet a world of Workmen upon it, early in the morning before break of day, and commanded them to pluck down his house, and to raze it to the ground. Informach as the next day following, when the Wateriur over threw histlatethrew histlatetop house.

ROMANS were gathered together in the Market-place, and saw this great studden ruine, they much commended the noble act and mind of Waterium, in doing that he did: but so were they angry, and sorry both, to fee to fair and stately a built house (which was an Ornament to the City) overthrown upon a fudden. Much like in comparison to a man, whom through spite and envy they had unjustly put to death: and to fee their chief Magistrate also like a stranger and a vagabond, compelled to feek his lodging in another mans house. For his friends received him into their houses, until such time as the people had given him a place, where they did build him a new house, far more orderly, and nothing to stately and curious as the first was, and it was in the same place, where the Temple called Vicus Publicus standeth at this day. Now because he would not onely reform his person, but the Office of his Confulfhip, and also would frame himfelf to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before he feemed unto them to be fearful; he put away the carrying of the Axes from the Rods, which the Sergeants used to bear before the Conful. Moreover when he came into the Market-place, where the people were affembled, he caused the Rods to be born downwards, as in token of reverence of the Soveraign Majefty of the People, which all the Magistrates observe yet at this day. Now in all this humble thew and lowliness of his, he did not so much imbase his dignity and greatness, which the common people thought him to have at the first : as he did thereby cut off envy from him, winning again as much true authority, as in femblance he would feem to have loft. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to submit themselves unto him: insomuch as upon this occasion be was furnamed Publicola, as much to fay, as the people pleafer. Which furname he kept ever after, was furnamed and we from henceforth also writing the reft of his Life, will use no other name : for he was contented to fuffer any man that would, to offer himself to ask the Consulfhip in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kind of man they would joyn fellow Conful with him, and fearing left through envy or ignorance, the party might thwart his purpole and meaning: employed his fole power and authority whilest he ruled alone, upon high and puble attempts. For first of all he supplied up the number of the Senators that were greatly decayed, because King Tarquine had put some of them to death not long before, and other also had been lately slain in the Wars, in whose places he had chosen new Senators, to the number of a hundred threefcore and four. After that, he made new Decrees and Laws, which greatly did advance the authority of the people. The first Law gave liberty to all offenders, condemned by judgement of the Confuls, to appeal unto the people. The second, that no man upon pain of death should take upon him the exercise of any Office, unless he had come to it by the gift of the people. The third was, and all in favour of the poor, that the poor Citizens of Rome Hould pay no more cultom, nor any impost whatfoever. This made every man the more willing to give himself to some crast or occupation, when he saw his travel should not be taxed, nor taken from him. As for the Law that he made against those that disobeyed the Confuls, it was found to be to favourable to the commonalty, as they thought it was rather made for the poor, than for the rich and great men. For the offenders and breakers of that Law, were condemned to pay for a penalty, the value of five Oxen and two Muttons. . The price of a Mutton was then ten Oboles, and of an Ox an hundred Oboles. For in those days the ROMANS had no store of covned money: otherwise, they lacked no Sheep, nor other beafts. Hereof it came that to this day they call their riches or substance Peculium, because Pecus signifieth Sheep and Muttons. And in the old time the Whereof Peflamp upon their Money was an Ox, a Mutton, or a Hog: and some of them called their Children cultum was cal-Bubulci, which fignifieth Cowheards: others Caprarii, to fay Goatheards: and other Porcii, as led. you would fay, Swineheards. Now though in all his other Laws, he was very favourable and temperate toward the people : yet in that moderation, fometimes he did fet grievous pains and punishments. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accufation, that did aspire to the Kingdom, and he did fet the murderer free of all punishment, so he brought forth manifest proof, that the party flain, had practifed to make himself King. As being impossible a man should pretend to great a matter, and no man should find it : and contrariwise being possible, albeit he were spied, that otherwife he might attempt it, by making himfelf fo ftrong, that he needed not pass for the Law. In this case he gave every man liberty by such an act or mean, to prevent him if he could of discretion, who by strength otherwise sought to aspire to raign. They greatly commended him also for the Law that he made touching the Treasure: For being very necessary that every private Citizen should according to his ability, be contributor to the charges and maintainance of the Wars: he himself would neither take fuch collection into his charge, nor fuffer any wan of his to meddle with the fame, nor yet that it should be laid in any private mans house, but he did ordain that Saturns Temple should be the treasury thereof. This order they keep to this very day. Furthermore, he granted the people to choose two young men Quastores of the same, as you would say the Treasurers, to take the charge of this Money; and the two fift which were chosen, were Publius Veiuvim, and Marfire fift Quafire with charge of this Money; and the two fift which were chosen, were Publius Veiuvim, and Marfire fift Quafire fift ing in this account Orphans nor Widdows, which were exempted from all payments. After he had Minutiur: established all these things, he caused Lucretius (the Father of Lucretia) to be chosen fellow Con- Lucretius and ful with him, unto whom, for that he was his ancient, he gave the upper hand, and commanded Pablicola Conthey should carry before him the Rods, which were the figns of the chief Magistrate: and ever fuls. fince they have given this honour unto age. But Lucretim dying not long after his election, they Publicola and chose again in his place Marcus Horatius, who held out the Consulfhip with Publicola the rest of the Confulsi the year. Now about that time King Tarquine remained in the Countrey of Thus CANE, where he prepared a fecond Army against the ROMANS, and there fell out a marvellous strange thing thereupon. For when he raigned King of Rome, he had almost made an end of the building of the Temple of Jupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any Oracle received, or upon any fantafie, it is not known) to fet up a Couch of earth baked by a Potter, in the highest place of the Temple, and he put it out to be done by certain Thus CANE Workmen of the City of VEIES: but whilst they were in hand with the work, he was driven out of his Realm. When the Workmen had formed this couch, and that they had put it into the furnace to bake it, it fell out contrary to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their work put into the furnace. For the earth did not shut and close together in the fire, nor dried up all the moisture thereof: but rather to the contrary it did swell to such a bigness, and grew so hard and strong withall, that they were driven to break up the head and walls of the furnace to get it out. The Soothfayers did expound this, that it was a celeftial token from above, and promifed great prosperity and increase of power unto those that should enjoy this Couch. Whereupon the VEIANS resolved not to deliver it unto the ROMANS that demanded it, but answered that it did belong unto King Tarquine, and not unto those that had banished him. Not many days after there was a solemn feast of Games for running of Horses in the City of VEIES, where they did also many other notable acts, worthy fight according to their cuftom. But after the Game was played, he that had won the Bell, being Crowned in token of victory, as they did use at that time, brought his Coach and Horses fair and softly out of the shewplace: and fuddenly the Horse being afraid upon no present cause or occasion seen, whether it was by chance, or by some secret working from above, ran as they had been mad with their Coach to the City of ROME. The Coach-driver did what he could possible at the first to stay them, by holding in the reins, by clapping them on the backs, and speaking gently to them: but in the end, perceiving he could do no good, and that they would have their fwing, he gave place to their fury, and they never lin running, till they brought him near to the Capitol, where they overthrew him and his Coach, not far from the gate called at this present Ratumena. The VEIANS wondring much at this matter, and being afraid withall, were contented the Workmen should deliver their Couch made of earth unto the ROMANS. Now concerning Jupiter Capitolinus Temple, King Tarquine the first (which was the Son of Demaratus) vowed in the Wars that he made against the SABYNS, that he would build it. And Tarquine the proud, being the Son of him that made this vow, did build it: howbeit he did not consecrate it, because he was driven out of his Kingdom before he had finished it. When this Temple was built and throughly finished, and set forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was marvelloully defirous to have the honour of the dedication thereof. But the Noble men and Senators envying his glory, being very angry that he could not content himself with all those honours that he had received in Peace for the good Laws he had made, and in Wars for the victories he had obtained and well deserved, but further that he would seek the honour of this dedication, which nothing did pertain unto him: They then did egg Horains, and perswaded him to make fuit for the fame. Occasion fell out at that time, that Publicola must have the leading of the ROMANS army into the field; In the mean time, while Publicola was ablent, it was procured that the people gave their voices to Horatim, to confecrate the Temple, knowing they could not fo well have brought it to pass he being present. Others say, the Confuls drew lots between them, and that it lighted upon Publicola to lead the Army against his will, and upon Horatius confectate this Temple, which may be conjectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication thereof. For all the people being affembled together in the Capitol with great filence, on the fifteenth day of the month of September, which is about the new Moon of the moneth, which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion; Horarius having done all the Ceremonies needfull in fuch a cafe, and holding then the doors of the Temple, as the use was even to utter the foleran words of dedication, Marcus Valerius the brother of Publicola, having stood a long time there at the Temple-door to take an opportunity to speak, began to fay aloud in this wife: My Lord Conful, your Son is dead of a fickness in the Camp. This gan to may around in this write; may both coming, your our is attached, it is made all the Affembly forry to hear it, but it nothing amazed Horains, who spake onely thus much; Cast his body then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to end his confecration. This was but a device and nothing true of Marcus Valerius, onely to make Horatius leave off his confecration. Horatius in this shewed himself a marvellous resolute man, were it that he straight found his device, or that he believed it to be true: for the foddennels of the matter nothing altered him, The very like matter fell out in confecrating of the fecond Temple. For this first which Tarquine had built, and Horarias confecrated, was confumed by fire in the Civil Wars; and the fecond was built up again by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus let up the Superfeription of the dedi-How of Fapir cation, because Sylla died before he could dedicate it. The fecond Temple was burnt again not long How ort 3491 carron, recause 25144 time the troubles and tumults which were at ROME under Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was re-edified and built again by Vespassan, from the ground to the top. But this good hap burnt and built he had above other, to fee his work perfected and finished before his death, and not overthrown as it was immediately after his death. Wherein he did far pass the happiness of Sylla, who died before he could dedicate that he had built; and the other deceafed before he faw his work overthrown. For all the Capitol was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported, the onely foundation How much was one of the first Temple cost Tarquinius forty thouland Pandos of filver. And to guild onely the Tem-How muchwas one of the life rempire cont. I arguments out a mountain a manual of life that the richeft Citizen of Rome from the had, will come nothing near tumo, for it cost above twelve thousand Talents. The pillars of this too. Temple are cut out of a quarry of marble, called pentlike marble, and they were squared parpine, as thick as long; Thele I faw at Athens. But afterwards they were cut again, and polified in Rome, by which dome they got not fo much grace as they loft proportion; For they were made too flender, and left racked of their first beauty. Now he that would wonder at the stately building of the Capitol, if he came afterwards unto the Pallace of Domitian, and did but fee force gallery, porch, hall, or hothouse, or his concubines chambers, he would say (in my opinion) as the Poet Epicharmus said of a prodigal man :

It is a fault and folly both in thee, To lash out gifts and prodigall rewards For fond delights, without all rule that be, Regarding not what happens afterwards.

So might they fastly say of Domitian: Thou art not liberal nor devout unto the gods; but it is a vice Demitian mad thou hast to love to build, and defirest (as they say of old Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold and precious stones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine after that great foughten battle wherein he loft his Son (that was flain by Brutus in fighting together hand in hand) went to the City of CLUSIUM, unto King Claras Porfena, the mightieft Prince that reigned at that time in all ITALY, and was both noble and a courteous Prince. Porfens promifed him aid; and first of all he fent to Rome to fummon the Citizens to receive their King again: But the ROMANS refusing the fummons, he feat forthwith an Herauld to proclaim open Wars against them, and to tell them where and when he would meet them; and then marched thitherwards immediately with a great Army. Publicola now being ablent was chosen Conful the second time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned Publicals and home again to ROME, because he would exceed King Parfens in greamers of mind, he began to build Time Lucreture a City called Sig Liuria, even when the King with all his Army was not far from Rome, and having walled it about to his mervellous charge, he fent thither feven hundred Citizens to dwell there, to flew that he made little account of this War. Howbeit Porfena at his coming did give there, to have a find a first of the state of the such a lusty assault to the mount Janiculum, that they drave our the Souldiers which kept the same; who flying towards Rome were purfued to hard with the Enemies, that with them they had entred the Town, had not Publicola made a fally out to refift them; Who began a hot skirmith hard by the River of Tyber, and there fought to have stayed the Enemies to follow any further; Which being the greater number did overlay the ROMANS, and did hurt Publicola very fore in this skirmish, so as he was carried away into the City in his Souldiers Arms. And even so was the other Conful Lucretius hurt in like case; which so discouraged and frayed the ROMANS, that they all took them to their legs and fled towards the City. The enemies purfued them at their heels, as far as the wooden Bridge; So that the City was in marvellous hazard of taking upon the fudden. But Horatiu Cocles, and Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefest noble young men of the City, stood with them to the defence of the Bridge, and made head against the Horst in Gules Enemy. This Horatists was furnamed Cocles (as much to fay as one eye) because he had lost one why so ca led of them in the Wars. Howbeit other Writers say, it was because of his flat nose, which was so sunk into his head, that they saw nothing to part his eyes, but that the eye-brows did meet together; by reason whereof the people thinking to surname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they lay) Cocles. But how loever it was, this Horarise Cocles had the courage to flew his face against the! Enemy, and to keep the Bridge, untill such time as they had cut and broken it up behind him. When he faw they had done that, armed as he was and hurt in the hip with a pike of the Thus CANES, he leaped into the River of Tyber, and faved himself by swimming unto the other fide. Publicola wondering at this manly act of his, perswaded the ROMANS straight, Good service every one according to his ability, to give him so much as he spent in a day; and afterwards also rewarded. he caused the common Treasury to give him as much land as he could compass about with his plough in a day. Furthermore he made his Image of brass to be set up in the Temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hip, whereof he was lame ever after. Now whileft King Porsena was hotly bent very straightly to besiege Rome, there began a famine among the ROMANS; and to encrease the danger, there came a new Army out of Thuscane which OVER-ran, burnt, and made waste all the Territory of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being chofen Conful then the third time, thought he should need to do no more to result Porfena bravely, Conful, but to be quiet onely, and to look well to the fafe keeping of the City. Howbeit fpying his opportunity, he fecretly ftole out of Rome with a power, and did fet upon the Thus CANES that destroyed the Countrey about, and overthrew and flew of them five thousand men. As for the history of Murius many do diversly report it ; but I will write it in fuch fort as I think shall best agree with the truth. This Mutius was a worthy man in all respects, but specially for the Wars. He wan the troop, among to kill King Perfena, difguiled himself in Thuscanes apparell, vola and speaking Thuscane very perfectly, went into his Camp, and came to the Kings Chair, in the which he gave Audience; and not knowing him perfectly, he durst not ask which was he, left he should be discovered, but drew his Sword at adventure, and slew him whom he took to be King. Upon that they laid hold on him, and examined him: And a pan full of fire being brought for the King that intended to do Sacrifice unto the gods, Mutius held out his right hand over the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whileft the flesh of his hand did fry off, he never changed hew nor countenance; The King wondring to fee fo strange a fight, called to them to withdraw the fire, and he himself diddeliver him his Sword again; Mussus took it of him How Mustus with his left hand, whereupon they say afterwards, he had given him the surname of Scavola, as came by the much to fay as left-handed, and told him in taking of it, Thou couldeft not Porfena with fear have name of Seaovercomed me, but now through courtefie thou haft won me. Therefore for good will I will reveal that unto thee, which no force nor extremity could have made me utter. There are three hundred ROMANS dispersed through thy Camp, all which are prepared with like minds to follow that I have begun, onely gaping for opportunity to put it in practife. The lot fell on me to be the first to break the Ice of the Enterprize, and yet I am not forry my hand failed to kill so worthy a man, that deserveth rather to be a friend than an enemy unto the ROMANS. Porfens hearing this. did believe it, and everafter he gave the more willing ear to those that treated with him of peace; not so much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in wait to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMANS noble mind and great courage. All other Writers call this man, Mutius Scavola : Howbeit Athenodorus furnamed Sandon, in a Book he wrote unto Oftavia, Augustus fifter, saith that he was also called Opsigonus. But Publicola taking King Porsena not Publicola mato be so dangerous an enemy to Rome, as he should be a profitable friend and ally to the same, keth Porsens let him understand that he was contented to make him Judge of the Controversie between them and Judge betweet Tarquine, whom he did many times provoke to come and have his cause heard before King Porfena, where he would justifie to his face that he was the naughtiest and most wicked man of the world, and that he was justly driven out of his Countrey. Tarquine sharply answered, that he would make no man his judge, and Porfens left of all other, for that having promifed him to put him again in his Kingdom, he was now gone from his word, and had changed his mind. Porfena was very angry with this answer, judging this a manifest token that his cause was ill. Wherefore Perfena being follicited again by his own Son Aruns, who loved the ROMANS, did eafily grant them peace, upon condition that they should re-deliver back again to him the Lands they had gotten before within the Countrey of Thuscane, with the prisoners also which they Peace granted had taken in this War, and in lieu thereof he offered to deliver to them again the ROMANS, Porfens. that had fled from them unto him. To confirm this peace the ROMANS delivered him Hoflages, ten of the Noblest mens Sons of the City, and to many of their Daughters; among which was Valeria, Publicola's own Daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porfena brake his Army, and withdrew his ftrength, trufting to the peace concluded. The ROMANS Daughters delivered for Hostages, came down to the Rivers side to wash them, in a quiet place where the ftream ran but gently, without any force or swiftness at all. When they were there, and saw they had no Guard about them, nor any came that way, nor yet any boats going up nor down the stream; they had a defire to swim over the River, which ran with a swift stream, and was marvellous deep. Some fay, that one Clalia swam the River upon her horse back, and that the did embolden and encourage the other to from hard by her horfe-fide, and recovering the other bank, and being paft all danger, they wein and prefented themselves before The boldness sing one other panis, and being part an uanger, they were any presented memories octore of classical Publicols the Conful. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had played, but ot class and other Raman was marvellous forry, fearing left men would judge him lefs carefull to keep his faith, than Virgins. was King Perfens and that he might furpect the boldness of these Maderis was but a crafty was any corjent, and use he might import the bounders of their readers was out a trans-fleight devifed of the ROMANS; Therefore he took them all again, and fear them immedarely unto King Perfens. Whereof Tarquine having intelligence, he laid shrambush for their that had the conduction of them. Who to foon as they were paff the River, did thew themselves and brake upon the ROMANS; they being far fewer in humber than the other, did yet very froutly defend themselves. Now whilst they were in extractly fight together, Valeria Public very nouncy acteur memory and three of her Fathers Servants, escaped through the midft of them, and faved themselves. The residue of the Virgins remained in the midst among their swords, in great danger of their lives. Aruns King Porfenas Son advertised hereof, run thither incominently to the refere ; but when he came the enemies fled; and the ROMANS held on their journey to re-deliver their hestages. Porfense seeing them again, asked which of them it was that began first to pass the River, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him unto her, and told him her name was Cletia. He-looked upon her very earneftly, and with a pleafant countenance, and commanded they should bring him one of his best Horses in the Stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and to he gave it unto her. Those which hold opinion that none but Clelia passed the River on horseback, do alledge this to which note opinion that none-out cleans paned the invert our normans, no assenge this to prove their Opinion true. Others do deny it, faying, that this True can it King did onely honour her noble courage. Afterwards the Saryns invading the ROMAN Territory with a great force; Marcin Valerius Publicola's Brother, was then cholen Conful, with one Polithamius Tuberrus. Howbeit Marcus Vale terrus ruomeota y Diviner, was men unoran control, with one roponamius superius. Provocit vius Polibumi- all matters of weight and importance passed by Publicola's countel and authority, who was present at any thing that was done; and by whose means Marcus his Brothet wan two great Battles, in the laft whereof he flew thirteen thouland of his enemies, not lofing one of his own men. For which his Victories, befides the honour of Triumph he had, the people also at their rise the bromen. For which me victories, occurs his honour of fruming ne man, the people and at their therefore Public own charges built him an house in the street of Mount Palarine, and granted him moreover that his door should open outwards into the street, where all other mens doors did open inwards into their houte: fignifying by grant of this honour and priviledge, that he should warus mito their from the Commonweal. It is reported that the GRECIANS doors of their houses in old time, did all open outwards after that fathion: And they do conjecture it by eth over the the Comedies that are played; where those that would go out of their houses, did first knock Sabyns. at their doors, and make a noise within the house, left in opening their door upon a sudden, they might overthrow or hurt him that tarried at the Street-door, or passed by the way, who hearing the noise had warning straight to avoid the danger. The next year after that, Publicola was chosen Conful the fourth time, because they stood in great doubt that the Sabyns and LATINS would join together to make Wars upon them: Befides all this, there was a certain superstitious fear ran through the City, of some ill hap toward it, because most part of the women with child were delivered of imperfect Children, lacking some one limb or other, and all of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in fome of Sybilla's Books, made private facrifice unto Pluto, and did fet up again fome Peafts and folemn Games that were left off, and had been commanded before time to be kept by the Oracle of Apollo. These means having a little rejoiced the City with good hope, because they thought that the anger of the gods had been appealed: Publicola then began to provide for the dangers that they were threatned withall by men, for that news was brought him that their enemies were up in all places, and made great preparation to invade them. Now there was at that time amongst the SABYNS a great rich man called Appins Glasgis, very strong and active of body, and otherwife a man of great reputation and eloquence, above all the reft of his countrey-men; But notwithstanding he was much envied, and could not avoid it; being a thing common to great men. He went about to ftay those intended Wars against the ROMANS. Whereupon many which before took occasion to murmur against him, did now much more encrease the same; with saying he sought to maintain the power of the ROMANS, that as emong the SARYNS, which was the cause of staying the Wars against the ROMANS. Publicola also for his part was very diligent, not onely to understand the original cause of this fedition, but to feed on further and encrease the tame, having gotten men meet for that purpole, which carried Appins, such a mediage from him. That Publicols knew very well be was a just man a and one that would not be revenged of his Conzens to the general burt of his Country validough the injuries he received at their hands delivered him just occasion to doing Nevertheless if he had any define to provide for his fafety and to repair to ROME, leaving them which causeless wished him so much evil, they would both openly and privately receive him with that due honour which his vertue deserved, and the worthiness of the ROMAN people required. Clausus having long and many times confidered this matter with himself, refolved, that it was the best way he could take, making vertue of necessity; and therefore being determined to do it, he did procure his Friends to do as he did, and they got other also to them, so that he brought away with him out of the Countrey of the SABYNS, five thousand Families with their Wives and Children (of the quietest and most peaceable people among the SABY NS) to dwell at ROME. Applias Chastas Publicola being advertised thereof before they came, did receive them at their coming to Rome goeth to dwell with great joy, and all manner of good courteous entertainment. For at their first coming he made them at Rome. all and their Families free Citizens, and affigned unto every person of them two Jugera of Land (which contained one acre, one rood, eleven pole, and fixty nine parts of a pole) by the River of Tyber : And unto Appins felf he gave five and twenty Jugera (to wit, fixteen acres and a half, four pole and feventy fix parts of a pole) and received him into the number of the Senators. And thus came he first unto the government of the Commonweal in ROME, where he did so wisely behave himself. that in the end he came to be the chiefest man of dignity and authority in Rome so long as he lived. After his death he left behind him the Family of the Claudians, descending from him; which The family of for honour and worthiness gave no place to the noblest Family in Rome. But now the sedition a- the Claudians. mongft the SABYNS being pacified, by the departure of those that were gone to ROME: The seditions Governours would not suffer those that remained to live in peace, but still cryed out, It were too much shame for them that Clausus being a fugitive, and become an enemy, should honour their enemies abroad, that being present durft not shew so much at home, and that the ROMANS should escape unrevenged, who had done them fuch apparent wrongs. So they raifed great force and power, and went and cocumped with their army near the City of FIDE NES, and laid an ambush hard by ROME in certain hidden and hollow places, where they put two thousand choice footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to fend certain light horimen to run and prey to Rome-gates; commanding them, that when the ROMANS came out of the City to charge them, they should feem leifurely to retire, untill they had drawn them within danger of their ambush. Publicola receiving full intelligence of all their intention; by a Traitor that fled from them unto him, made due preparation to encounter with their privy ambuilt, and so divided his Army into two parts; For he gave his Son in Law Postbumius Balbus three thousand footmen, whom he fent away by night, commanding them the fame night to take the hills, in the bottom whereof the SABYNS were laid in ambush. Lucretia fellow-Conful with Publicola, having the lightest and lustiest men of the City, was appointed to make head against the vantcurrers of the SABY NS that minded to approach the gates. And Publicola with the rest of the Army marched a great compass about to inclose his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chance it was a thick mift, and at that prefent time, Posthumius coming down from the hills, with great shouts charged them that lay in ambush, Lucretius on the other side set upon the light horsemen of the SABYNS, and Publicala fell upon their Camp. Sothar of all fides the SABYNS enterprize had very ill success; For they had the worst in every place, and the Romans killed them Hying, without any turning again to make reliftance. . Thus the place which gave them hope of beft falety, turned most to their deadly overthrow. For every one of their companies supposing the other had been whole and unbroken, when a charge was given upon them, did straight break, and never a company of them turned head toward their enemy; For they that were in the Camp, ran towards them that were in ambush; and those which were in ambush on the contrary side, ran towards them that were in Camp. So that in flying the one met with the other, and found those towards whom they were flying to have been fafe, to ftand in as much need of help as themselves. That which faved some that were not flain, was the City of FIDENES, which was near the Camp, and specially faved those which fled thither. But fuch as came thort of the City and could not in time recover it, were all flain The Sabyas in the Field, or taken prisoners. As for the glory of this honourable Victory, albeit the ROMANS flain. were wont to ascribe all such great notable matters to the special providence and grace of the gods, yet at that time norwithstanding they did judge that this happy success sell out by the wife foresight and valiantness of the Captain. For every man that had served in this journey, had no other talk in his mouth, but that Publicola had delivered their enemies into their hands, lame and blind, and as a man might fay, bound hand and feet to kill them at their pleasure. The people were marvelloully enriched by this Victory, as well for the spoil as for the ransom of the prisoners that they had gotten. Now Publico-La after he had triumphed, and left the government of the City to those which were chosen Consuls for Publicola. the Year following, died incontinently, having lived as honourably and vertuoully all the days of his life as any man living might do. The people then took order for his Funerals, that the charges thereof should be defrayed by the City, as if they had never done him any honour in his life, and that they had been still debtors unto him for the noble service he had done unto the State and Commonweal whilst he His Funerals. lived. Therefore towards his Funeral charges, every Citizen gave a piece of money called a Quatrine.

The Women also for their part to honour his Funerals, agreed among themselves to mourn a whole year in black for him, which was a great and honourable memorial. He was buried also by express year in orack for min, which was a great and nonsonable incurors; the was ourself and by express order of the people, within the City, in the firest called Velia, and they granted priviledge allounto all his posterity, to be buried in the left same place. Howbeit they do no more bury any of his there; But when any die, they bring the Coarfe unto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it under the place, and take it ftraight away again, to shew that they have liberty to bury him nous put a single use plate, and take it stranges away again, to like that they willingly refuse his honour; and this done, they carry the Coarse away again, there, but that they willingly refuse his honour;

THE COMPARISON OF SOLO N with PUBLICOLA.

OW prefently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them; which is not found in any other of their lives which we have written of before. And the same is, that the one hath been a witness, and the other a follower of him, to whom he was like. So as the fentence that Solon spake to King Crassus touching Tellus selicity and happiness, might have been better applied unto Publicola then to Tellus: whom he judged to be very happy because he died honourably, he had lived vertuously, and had lest behind him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his Poems: Neither did he ever bear any honourable office in all his time, nor yet left any Children that carried any great fame or renown after his death. Whereas Publicale to long as he lived, was always the chief man among the ROMANS, of credit and authoria y, and afterwards fince his death certain of the nobleft Families and most ancient Houses of Rome, in these our days, as the Publicoles, the Messales, and the Valerians, for fix hundred years continuance, do refer the glory of the Nobility and ancientry of their Houses unto him. Furthermore, Tellus was flain by his enemies, fighting valiantly like aworthy honest man: But Publiools died after he had flain his enemies; which is far more greater good hap then to be flain. For after he as General had honourably ferved his Countrey in the Wars, and had left them Conquerors, the first his far more greater good hap then to be flain. having in his life time received all honors and triumphs due unto his service he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accounted and effermed most happy and blessed. Also in wishing manner he would his end should be lamented to his praise, in a place where he consuteth Minnermus about the continuance of mans life, by faying,

Let not my death without lamenting pas, But rather let my friends be wail the fame : Whose grievous tears, and cries of out alas, Aday of resound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good hap, then most happy maketh he Publicola : for at his death, not onely his friend and kinefolks, but she whole City also, and many thousand persons besides, did bitterly bewail the loss of him. For all the Women of Rome did mouth for him in black, and did most pitifully lament his Death, as every one of them had loft either Fathen, Brother, or Husband.

Tyne it is, that I court goods to have :

Solon faith this, because vengeance followed ill gotten goods. And Publicola took great head, not onely to get his goods most justly, but had regard that those which he had, he spent most honestly in helping the needy, So that it Solon was justly reputed the wifest man, we must needs conjess also that netping the necay. So that it speam was jurity reputed the which that man, we muit needs contest alto that Publically was the happielt. For what the one defired for the greatest and most perfect good a man can have in the World, the other hath won it, kept it, and uted it all his life time, until the hour of his death. And, thus hath Solom honoured Publicala, and Publicala hath done the like unto Solon; thewing himlelf a perfect example and looking-glass, wherein men may see how to govern a popular state, when he made his Consulthip void of all pride and stately show, and became himself affable, courteous, and beloved of every body. So took he profit by many of his Laws; as when he ordained that the people onely should have authority to chuse and create all common Officers and Magistrates. and that they might appeal from any judge to the People: as Solon when he fuffered them to appeal unto the Judge of the people. Indeed Publical did not create any new Senate, as Solon did, but he did augment the first number, with as many persons almost as there were before. He did at o Publicola but he did augment the first manners, with a many persons and other collections of money. erected the office of Quality of the office of Quality o Because the chiefest Magistrate, if he were an honest man should not for so light an occasion be taken stores. from the care of better and more weighty affairs; and if he were wickedly given, and ill disposed, that he should have no such mean or occasion to work his wicked will, by having the treasure of the City in his hands, and to command what he lift. Moreover in hating the Tyrants, Publicola therein was far more sharp and terrible. For Solon in his Laws punished him that went about to make himself a Tyrant, yet after he was convicted thereof by Law; but Publicola ordained that they should kill him, before the Law did pass upon him, that fought to be King. And where Solon justly and truly vaunteth himfelf, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole consent of the Citizens, yethe did notwithstanding refuse it: This vaunt and glory is as due unto Publicola; who finding the dignity of a Conful tyrannical, he brought it to be more lowly and favourable for the people, not taking upon him all the authority he might lawfully have done. And it feemeth that Solon knew before him what was the true and direct way to govern a Commonweal upright. For he faith in Both great and small of power, the better will obey, If we too little or too much upon them do not lay.

The discharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of liberty: For little prevaileth Law to make equality among Citizens when debts do hinder the poor people to enjoy the benefit thereof. And where it feemeth that they have most liberty, as in that they may be chosen Judges and Officers, to speak their Opinion in the Council, and give their voices also; There indeed are they most bound and subject, because they do but obey the rich in all they do command. But yet in this act there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthy to be noted, That commonly discharging of debts was wont to breed great tumults and feditions in Commonweals. And Solon having used it in a very good time (as the Phylician venturing a dangerous medicine) did appeale the fedition already begun, and did utterly quench through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wisdom and verue, all the infamy and accusation that might have grown of that act. As for their first entry into the government, Solons beginning was far more noble: For he went before, and followed not another; and himself alone without any others help, did put in execution the best, and most part of all his notable and goodly Laws. Yet was Publicola's end and death much more glorious and happy; For Solon before he died, faw all his Commonwealth overthrown; But Publicola's Commonweal continued whole as he left it, untill the broil of civil wars began again among them. Solon after he had made his Laws, and written them in wooden Tables, leaving them without defence of any man, went his way immediately out of the City of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in Rome governing the state, did throughly stablish and confirm the Lawshe made. Furthermore, Solon having wifely foreseen Pyfistratus practises, aspiring to make himself King, he could never let him for all that, but was himself overcome and oppressed with the Tyrranny he saw stablished in his own sight, and in despight of him, where Publicola overthrew and did put down a mighty Kingdom, that had continued of long time, and was throughly stablished; his vertue and defire being equall with Solons, and having had besides fortune favourable, and sufficient power to execute his vertuous and well-disposed mind. But as for Wars and Martial Deeds, there is no Comparison to be made between them. For Daimachus Plateian

And as for matters of peace and civil government, Solon never durft prefent himself openly to perfunde the enterprize of SALAMINA, but under a counterfeit madnels, and as a fool to make sport: where Publicola taking his adventure from the beginning, shewed himself without diffimulation an where Thoseola taking its adventure from the organizing, mowed miniet, without unminimation and open Enemy to Tarquine, and afterwards he revealed all the whole confpiracy. THE LIFE OF THEMISTOCLES.

Anno Mundi. 3461.

Ant. Christ. 487.

MISTOCLES Parentage did little advance his glory, for his Father Neocles was of small reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, and tribe of Leoneis; and of his mother an alien or stranger, as these Verses do witness: Abresonen 1 am, yborn in Thracia, And yet this high good hap I have, that into Grecia I have brought forth a Sen, Themistocles by name,

The glory of the Greekish bloods, and man of greatest fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his Mother was not a THRACIAN, but born in the Country of CARIA; and they do not call her Abrotonon but Enterpé. And Neanthes faith furthermore, that the was of HALICARNASSUS, the chiefest City of all the Realm of CARIA. For which cause when the strangers did assemble at Cynosargos (a place of exercise without the gate dedicated to Hereuser, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortal place of exer-womans) Themispoeles perswaded divers youths of the most honourable houses, to go down with him, cife dedicated and to anoint themselves at Cynosargos, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right to H. render, and allied fore. But setting apart all these circumfances, he was no doubt allied unto the house of the Lycomedians; For Themssfordes caused the Chappel of this Family, which is in the Village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built up again at his own charges; and as Simonides faith, he did fet it forth and enrich it with pictures. Moreover every man doth confels it, that even from his childhood they did perceive he was given to be very hot-headed, stirring, wife, and of good spirit, Themistocles and enterprizing of himfelf to do great things, and born to rule weighty causes. For at such days and hours as he was taken from his Book, and had leave to play, he never played, nor would never be idle, as other Children were; But they always found him conning fome Oration without Book, or making is alone by himself; and the ground of his matter was ever commonly, either to defend or accuse some of his Companions. Whereupon his School-master observing him, oft faid unto him : Sure some great matter hangeth over thy head my Boy, for it cannot be chosen but that one day thou fhalt do fome notable good thing, or fome extream mischief. Therefore when they went about to teach him anything, onely to check his nature, or to fashion him with good manners and civility, or to fludy any matter for pleasure or honest pastime, he would slowly and carelessy learn of them. But if they delivered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state, they saw he would beat at it marvelloufly, and would understand more than any could of his age and carriage, trufting altogether to his natural mother wit. This was the cause that being mocked afterwards by some that had studied humanity and other liberal Sciences, he was driven for revenge and his own defence, to answer with great and ftour words, faying, that indeed he had no skill to tune a Harp, nor a Viol, nor to play on a Pfatterion; but if they did put a City into his hands that was of small name, weak, and little, he knew ways enough how to make it noble, strong, and great. Neverthelels Stefimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras School, and that under Meliffus was Anange he fludied natural Philosophy. But herein he was greatly deceived, for that he took no great heed unto the time. For Meliffus was Captain of the Samians againft Pericles, at what time he did lay fiege unto the City of Samos. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger than Themisfocles, and Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his own house. Therefore we have better reason and occasion to believe those that write, Themisfacles did determine to follow Anescephilus Phreavian. For he was no proteffed Orator nor natural Philosopher, as they termed him in that time; but made pro-fession of that which then they called wisdom; which was no other thing but a certain knowledge to handle great cautes, and an endeavour to have a good wit and judgment in matters of flate and government : Which profession beginning in Solon, did continue, and was taken up from man to man, as a fect of Philosophy. But those that came fithence, have mingled it with art of speech, and by little and little have translated the exercise of deeds unto bare and curious words: whereupon they were called Sophisters, as who would fay, counterfeit wife men. Notwithstanding when The-How the name miffocles began to meddle with the government of the Commonweal, he followed much Mnefiphilus. In the first part of his youth his behaviour and doings were very light and unconstant, as one carried away with a rash head, and without any order or discretion: By reason whereof his manners and conditions feemed marvelloufly to change, and oft times fell into very ill-favoured events, as himlest did afterwards confess, by faying, that a ragged Colt oft times proves a good horse, specially if he be well ridden and broken as he should be. Other tales which some will seem to add to this, are in my opinion but Fables. As, that his Father did difinherit him, and that his Mother for very care and forrow the took to fee the lewd life of her Son, did kill her felf. For there are that write to the contrary, that his Father being defirous to take him from dealing in government, did go and flow him all along the Sea flore, the (hipwracks and ribs of old galleys caft here and there, whereof no reckoning was made, and faid to him, thus the People use their Governours when they can ferve no longer. Howfoever it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gave himself to stare, and was suddenly taken with defire of glory. For even at his first entry, because he would fer soot before the proudeft, he ftood at pike against the greatest and mightiest persons that bare the sway and government, and specially against Aristides, Lysimachus Son, who ever encountred him, and grudge betwirt was still his adversary opposite. Yet it seemeth the evil will he conceived toward him, came of a very light cause. For they both loved Stefilans that was born in the City of TEOS, as Ariston the Philosopher writeth. And after this jealousie was kindled between them, they always took contrary part one against another, not onely in their private likings, but also in the government of the Commonweal. Yet I am periwaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions did much Arifilder a just encrease the grudge and discord betwire them. For Arifides (being by nature a very good man, a just dealer, and honest of life, and one that in all his doings would never flatter the people, nor ferve his own glory, but rather to the contrary would do, fay, and counfell always for the most benefit and commodity of the Commonweal) was oft times enforced to refift Themisforles, and disappoint his ambition, being ever bussly moving the people to take some new matter in hand: for they report of him, that he was enflamed with desire of glory, and to enterprize great matters, that being but a very young man at the battle of MARATHON, where there was no talk but of the worthines of Captain Militiades that had won the battle : He was found many times folitary alone devising with himself. Besides, they say he could take no rest in the night, neither would go to Plays in the day time, nor would keep company with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that wondred to see so great alteration in his manners, and asked him what he alled, that Militades victory would not let him sleep, because other thought this overthrow at MARATHON, would have made an end of all Wars. Howbeit Themisfocles was of a contrary opinion, and that it was but a beginning of greater troubles: Therefore he daily studied how to prevent them, and how to see to the faiety of GREECE; and before occasion offered, he did exercise his City in seas of war, foreseeing what should follow after. Wherefore where the Citizens of ATHENS before did use to divide among themselves the revenue of perfeaded his their mines of filver, which were in a part of ATTICA called Laurion, he alone was the first that Country men durft speak to the people, and perswade them, that from thenceforth they should cease that distribution among themselves, and employ the money of the same in making of galleys, to make Wars a gainst the ÆGYNETES. For their Wars of all GREECE were most cruel, because they were Lords of the Sea, and had to great a number of Ships. This perswasion drew the Citizens more easily to Themissiocles mind than the threatning them with King Darius, or the Persians would have done; who were far from them, and not feared that they would come near unto them. So this opportunity taken of the hatred and jealousite between the ATHENIANS and the ÆGYNETES, made the people to agree, of the faid money to make an 100 galleys, with which they fought against King Xernet, and did overcome him by Sea. Now after this good beginning and fuccess, he wan the Citizens by degrees to bend their force to Sea, declaring unto them, how by land they were feant able to make head against their equals, whereas by their power at Sea they should not onely defend themselves from the barbarous people, but moreover be able to command all GREECE. Hereupon he made them good mariners, and passing Sea-men, as Plato saith, where before they were stout and valiant souldiers by land. This gave his enemies occasion to cast it in his teeth afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike and the target, and had brought them to the bank and the ower. and so he got the upper hand of Miltiades, who inveighed against him in that, as Stefinibrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this Sea-service to pass, whether thereby he did overthrow the justice of the commonweal or not, I leave that to the Philosophers to dispute. But that the prefervation of all GREECE stood at that time upon the Sea, and that the galleys onely were the cause of setting up ATHENS again, Xerxes himself is a sufficient witness, besides other proofs that might be brought thereof. For his army by Land being yet whole, and unfet on, when he faw his Army by Sea broken, dispersed, and sunk, he fled straight upon it, confessing as it were that he was now too weak to deal any more with the GRECIANS, and left Mardonius his Lieutenant in Grecce, of purpole in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not follow him, then for any hope he had to overcome them. Some write of Themisfooles, that he was a very good husband for Themislacia his own profit, and carefull to look to his things; for he did spend liberally, and loved oft to make a good hus-Sacrifices, and honourably to receive and entertain strangers; wherefore he had good reason to be band to look carefull to get, to defray his charges. Other to the contrary blame him much, that he was too near and to his profit. miserable; For some say he would sell presents of meat that were given him. He did ask one Philides on a time which had a breed of mares, a colt of gift; who denying him flatly he was fo angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his house the horse of wood, with the which TROIA was taken. Meaning covertly to let him understand that he would shortly fet strife and quarrel betwixt Themislicales him, and his nearest kinsmen and familiar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of extreamly amthe world; For when he was but a young man, and scantly known, he earnestly entreated one Epicles bitious. born at HERMIONNA, an excellent player of the Citern, and counted at that time the cunningest man in all ATHENS at that instrument, that he would come and teach his art at his house, and all was no more but that many people being defirous to hear him play, should ask for his house, and come thither to him. And one year when he went unto the Feaft and affembly of the plays Olympicall. he would needs keep open house for all comers, have his tents richly furnished, and a great train of fervants and all other furniture, onely to contend with Cimon. This marvelloufly spited the GRECI-ANS, who thought Themistocles expences fit for Cimons countenance and ability, because he was a young gentleman, and of a noble house; but for him that was but a new come man, and would bear a greater port then either became his calling or ability they thought it not onely unallowable in him. but meer prelumption and vainglory. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedy which was plaied openly; and being fet out therein to have won the prife, and the ATHENIANS being marvellous defirous of the honour in fuch plays, he caused this Victory of his to be painted in a Table which he did dedicate and fet up in a Temple, with this Inscription, Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges; Phrynicus made it; Adimantus was chief Ruler. Yet notwithstanding he was well taken of the common people, partly because he would speak to every citizen by his name, no man telling him their names, and partly also because he shewed himself an upright judge in private mens causes. As one day he answered the Poet Simonides, born in CHIO, who did request an unreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was governour of the City. Thou couldst be no good A wife faving Poet, Simonides, if thou didft fing against the rules of musick; Neither my self a good governour of of Themistical a City, if I should do any thing against the Law. And mocking the same Simonides another time, he told him he was but a fool to speak ill of the Corinthians, considering they were Lords of so great and strong a City; and that he was not wife to make himself to be drawn, being so deformed and ill- Themisfoeles favoured. But being grown in credit, and having won the favour of the people, he was such an ene- made Aristimy to Ariftides, that in the end he made him to be expulsed and banished ATHENS for five years, des to be ba-When news were brought that the King of Persia was onwards on his journey, and coming nished. down to make wars upon the GRECIANS : the ATHENIANS consulted whom they should make their Generall. And it is reported that all their common Counfellors which were wont to speak in matters, fearing the danger, drew back, fave an Orator called Epicydes, Euphemides Son, very eloquent in speech, but somewhat womanish, faint-hearted, and greedy of money, who offered himself Episyder and to sue for this charge and had form have a characteristic National Section 1. to fue for this charge, and had some hope to obtain it. Wherefore Themistocles fearing all would not to be General. be well if it fell to this man to be Generall of the Army, he bought out Epicydes ambition with ready money, and so made him let fall his suit. It fell out Themistocles was greatly commended, about that was done to the Interpreter, that came with the King of Persia's Embassadours, and demanded the Empire of the Grecians both by Sea and Land, that they should acknowledge obedience to the King. For he caused him to be taken and put to death by a common consent, for using the Greek Tongue in the fervice and commandment of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing also, that at his motion Athmius born at ZELBA, was noted of infamy, both he, his children, and all his poster famed for bririty after him, because he brought gold from the King of Persia, to corrupt and win the Gre-bing. cians. But the greatest and worthiest act he did in those parts, was this: that he pacified all civill wars among the Grecians, perswading the Cities to leave off their quarrels untill the wars were done, in the which they fay Chileus Arcadian did help him more then any other man. He being now chosen General of the ATHENIANS, went about presently to imbark his Citizens in- Themisfacles to Galleys, declearing to them they should leave their City, and go meet with the barbarous King by General of the Sea, fo far from the coast of Greece as they could, but the people did not think that good. Where-Athenians and other coast of Greece as they could, but the people did not think that good. fore he led great numbers of Souldiers by Land into the Countrey of TEMPES with the LACEDE- gainft Xerxen

MONIANS, to keep the passage and entry into THESSALY, against the barbarous people, which Countrey flood yet found to GREECE, and not revolted to the MEDES. Afterwards the GRECIANS coming from thence without any act done, and the THESSALIANS also being won somewhat on the Kings fide, for that all the whole Countrey unto Boso TIA was at the devotion and good-will or the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS began then to find how Themsfiecles opinion to fight by Sea was very good. Whereupon they fent him with their Navy to the City of ARTEMISIUM, to keep the straight. There the other GRECIANS would have had the LACEDEMONIANS and their Admiral Eurybiades to have had the authority and commandment of the reft. But the ATHE NIANS Would not fet fail under any other Admiral then their own, because theirs were the greatest number of Ships in the Army, and above all the other Grecians. Themsspecies foreseeing the danger that was likely to fall out amongst themselves, did willingly yeeld the whole authority unto Eurybiades, and got the Athenians to agree unto it: affuring them, that if they behaved themfelves valiantly in these wars, the other GRECIANS of their own accord would alterward submit themselves unto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he onely of all other was at that time the original caule of the faving of GREECE, and did most advance the honour and glory of the Athenians, by making them to overcome their enemies by force, and their friends and allies, with liberality. In the mean time, Eurybiades feeing the barbarous fleet riding at anchor all along the Isle octanty. In the mean time, Encropance recing the bathalous necessaring at anchor an along the fire of Appendix, with such a great number of Ships in the vaward, he began to be afraid. And understanding moreover, there were other two hundred sail that went to coast about the 1ste of Sci-ATHE, and so to come in .: he presently would have retired further into GREECE, and would have drawn nearer unto Peloponnessus, to the end their Army by Sea might be near their Army by Land, as thinking it impossible to fight with King Xerxes power by Sea. Whereupon the Inhabitants of the Ille of EURORA, searing left the Gressans would leave them to the spoil of the enemy, they cauled Themistocles fecretly to be spoken withall, and fent him a good sum of money by one called Pelagon. Themisfacles took the money, as Herodorus writeth, and gave it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amongst the Athenians , Captain of the galley called the holy galley, that was much against Themistocles intended purpose; who having no money to pay his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with speed from thence. Themisfooles stirred up then his Souldiers more against him then before, infomuch as they went aboard his galley, and took his supper from him. Architeles being marvellous angry and oftended withall, Themisfrocks fent him both bread and meat in a pannier, and in the bottom thereof he had put a talent of filver, bidding him for that night to sup with that, and the next morning he should provide for his marriners, or else he would complain and accuse him to the Citizens that he had taken money of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbian. Moreover the first fights in the straight of Eubora, between the Grecians and the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the wars between them: For it was but a rafte given unto them which ferved the Grecians turn very much, by making them to fee by experience, and the manner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of Ships, nor the pomp and fumptuous fetting out of the same, nor the proud barbarous shouts and songs of victory, that could frand them to purpose against noble hearts and valiant-minded Souldiers, that durst grapple with them, and come to hand-ftrokes with their enemies, and that they should make no reckoning of all that bravery and brags, but should stick to it like men, and lay it on the jacks of them. The which (as it feemeth) the Poet Pindarss understood very well, when he faid touching the bat-The flout Athenians have now foundation layed tel of ARTEMISIUM:

The coast of Artemisium.

This plane liberty of Greece, by these assaults assayed.

To out of doubt the beginning of victory, is to be hardy. This place ARTEMISIUM is a part of the file of EUBOSA, looking towards the North, above the City of ESTIEA, lying directly over against the Countrey, which sometimes was under the obedience of the PHILOCTETES, and over against the Countrey, which sometimes was under the obedience of the PHILOCTETES, and fpecially of the City of OLIZON. There is a little Temple of Diana, firnamed Orientall, round fpecially of the City of OLIZON. There is a little Temple of the one, which when a man rubs with about the which there are trees, and a compass of pillars of white stone, which when a man rubs with shand, they she will be with the control of the colour and savour of fastron. And in one of those pillars there is an infeription of lamentable verses to this effect:

When bolde f blouds of Athens by their might,
Had overcome the numbers infinise
Of Asia: they then in memory
Of all their deeds and valiant wittory, Began to build this noble Monument,
And to Diane the same they did present,
For that they had the Medes likewise subdued,
And with their bloud, their bardy hands embrued.

There is a place feen also upon that coast at this day, a good way into the land, in the midst whereof are great sands sull of black dust like afters: and they think that they burnt in that place all dead bodies and old shipwracks. News being brought what had been done in the Countrey of Thermopyles, how that King Leonidas was dead, and how that Xerxes had won that entry into Greece by land; the Grecians then brought their whole Army by Sea won that entry into Greece, the Athenians being in the retreaval in this retrear, as men whose hears were lift up with the glory of their former valiant deeds. Now Themispooles passing by those places places where he knew the enemies must of necessity fall upon the Lee shore for harbour; he did engrave certain words spoken unto the IONIANS, in great letters in stone, which he found there by chance, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbour for Ships, and fit places also to lie in. These were the words, that the IONIANS should take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and anceftors, and fuch as fought for their liberty; or at the leaft they should trouble the army of the barbarous people, and do them all the mischief they could, when the GRECIANS should come to fight with them. By these words he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their part, or at the least he should make the barbarous people jealous and mistruffull of them. Xerxes being already entred into the uppermost part of the Province of DORICA, into the Countrey PHOCIDA, burning and destroying the Towns and Cities of the PHOCIANS, the other GRECIANS lay still and fuffered the invafion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANS did request them to meet with the barbarous army in BOEOTIA, to fave the Countrey of ATTICA, as before they had done, when they went by fea to ART EMISIUM: But they would not hearken to it in no wife; and all was because they were defirous they should draw to the straight of PELOPONNESUS, and there they should affemble the whole strength and power of GREECE within the bar of the same, and make a strong substantiall wall from the one Sea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this device, and were half discouraged and out of heart to see themselves thus forsaken and cast off by the rest of the GRECIANS. For it was out by all speech that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies, and therefore their onely remedy was, to leave their City, and to get them to the Sea, The people were very unwilling to liften hereunto, making their reckoning it was needless to be carefull to overcome, or to fave themselves, having once forfaken the temples of their gods. and the graves of their Parents. Wherefore Themsstocles seeing that neither reason nor mans perswafion could bring the people to like his opinion; He began to frame a device (as men do use fometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with figns from heaven, with oracles and answers from the gods. And the occasion of Minerva's dragon served his turn for a celestial fign and token, which by good fortune did not appear in those days in the Temple as it was wont to do; and the Priefts found the Sacrifices which were daily offered to him, whole and untouched by any. Wherefore being informed by Themistocles what they should do, they spread a brute abroad amongst the people, that the goddels Minerva, the protectour and defender of the City, had forfaken it, pointing them the way unto the Sea. And again he wan them by a Prophewhich commanded them to fave themselves in walls of wood, saying, that the walls of wood Wooden walls did fignifie nothing else but Ships. And for this cause he said, Apollo in the Oracle called SALA fignifies Ships.

MINA divine, not miserable nor unfortunate, because it should give the name of a most happy Vi-Gry which the Grecians thould get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this Decree, that they should leave the City of Athens to the custody of the goddes Pallas, that was Lady and Governour of the Countrey, and that all those which were of age to carry any weapon should get them to the galleys; and for the rest that every man should see his wife, children and bondmen placed in some sure place as well as he could. After this decree was past and autorstake Athens thorized by the people, the most part of them did convey their aged Fathers and Mothers, their by Themittocles wives and little children, into the City of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS received them perswasion, & very lovingly and gently. For they gave order that they should be entertained of the common go to the sea. charge, allowing them a peece, two oboloes of their money a day, and suffered the young children to gather fruit wherefoever they found it, and furthermore did hire Schoolmafters at the charge of the Commonwealth, to bring them up at School. He that was the penner of this decree was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time had no common money, but the Senate of the Areopagites (as Aristotle saith) furnished every Souldier with eight drachma's, which was the onely mean that the galleys were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craft devised of Themi-Stocles. The ATHENIAN'S being come down unto the haven of PIREA, he made as though Pallas target (on the which Medufaes head was graven) had been loft, and was not found with the Image of the goddess; and feigning to feek for it, he ransacked every corner of the galleys, and found a great deal of filver which private persons had hidden amongst their fardels. This money was brought out unto the people, and by this means the Souldiers that were shipped had wherewithall to provide them of necessary things. When time came that they were to depart the haven, and that all the City of ATHENS had taken Sea, one way it was a pity to behold them : another way it made all forts to wonder, that confidered the boldness and courage of those men, which before fent away their Fathers and Mothers from them, and were nothing moved at their tears, cries, shrikes, and embracings of their wives, their children, and departures, but stoutly and refolutely held on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding there were many old Citizens left still of necessity in ATHENS, because they could not be removed for very extreme age, which stirred many with compassion toward them. There was besides a certain pity that made mens hearts to yern, when they saw the poor dogs, beasts, and cattel run up and down bleating, lowing, and howling out aloud after their Mafters, in token of forrow, when they did imbark. Amongst these there goeth a strange tale of Xantippus dog, who was Perioles Xantippus Father; which for forrow his Mafter had left him behind him, did cast himself after into the Dog. Sea, and swimming still by the galleys side wherein his master was, he held onto the Isle of Sa-LAMINA, where so soon as the poor curr landed, his breath failed him, and he died presently.

They fay, at this day the place called the dogs grave is the very place where he was buried.

Their were strange acts of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS forry for the absence of Ariffides, and fearing left of fpight he taking part with the barbarous Nation, night have been the ruine and defiruction of the state of Grance, being banished five years also before the wars Arifiller by Themifocles procurement; that he did fet forth a Decree, that all those which had been banishreturneth from by toems produce mem, makine again, to do, to fay, and to give counfel to the Chizens in the chizens which they though ber for the prefervation of Granca. And allo where Envision there they should be the chizens the chizens the chizens the chizens the chizens are the chizens and the chizens the chizens the chizens are the chizens and the chizens are the chizens are the chizens and the chizens are des being General of the GRECIANS whole Army by Sea, for the worthmels of the City of Span-Ta, but otherwife a rank coward at time of need, would in any cafe depart from thence, and re-TA, OUR OURTWINE A JAIN COWNES IN THE ON THOSE A PROPERTY OF THE PALOPOWNES IANS WAS by land affembled; That Themissocles withfrood him and did hinder it all he could. At that time by tand antennied; That I nemifocles wanted on otable answers, which specially are noted and gathered toalso it was that Themistocles made so notable answers, which specially are noted and gathered together. For when Eurybiades said one day unto him, Themispocles, those that ar plays and games do rife before the company, are whiftled at : It is true, faid Thempfockes, but those also that tarry laft, do never win any game. Another time Eurybiades having a Staff in his hand, lift it up, as though he would have fricken him; Strike and thou wilt; faid he; fo thou wilt hear me. Enrybiades wondring to fee him fo patient, suffered him then to say what he would. Then Thems flocles began to uring to rec min to panent, america min that to any work he would, that to be my justiff to gain to bring him to reason, but one that stood by, said unto him, Themispoles for a man that hath neither City nor house, it is an ill part to will others that have to for lake all. Themispoles turning to the City nor house, it is an ill part to will other that have to for lake all. Themispoles turning to him, replied, We have willingly forfaken our houses and walls, said he, cowardly beast that thou art, because we would not become slaves for fear to lose things that have neither foul nor life: And yet our City I tell thee is the greatest of all GREECE; for it is a Freet of 200 galleys ready to fight, which are come hither to fave you if you lift. But if you will needs go your ways and forngut, which are come must to have your you into hour you will need be your ways and for-fake us the fectond time, you find hear tell ere it be long, that the ATRACIANS have another free City, and have poffelfed again as much good land, as that they have already loft. These words made Eurybiades presently think and fear that the ATHENIANS would not go, and that they would forfake them. And as another Eretrian was about to utter his reason against Themisfockes opinion, he could not but answer him: Alas, and must you my Masters talk of wars too, that are like to a Sleeve? Indeed you have a Sword but you lack a heart. Some write, that whileft Themiffecles was ralking thus from his galley, they fpied an Owl flying on the right hand of the Ships withoutes was taking titus from the galaxy, they speck at the hereign aff the other GRawhich came to light on one of the mafts of the galleys; and that hereign aff the other GRawhich came to light on one of the mafts of the galleys. But when the fleet of their enemies Ships shewed on the coasts of ATTICA, hard by the haven Phaleriem, and covered all the Rivers thereabouts, as far as any body could fee, and that King Krikes himfelf was come in person with all his army by land, to camp by the Sea-fide; So that his whole power both by Land and tea might be feen in fight; then the GRECIANS had forgotten all Themisfocles goodly persuasions, and began to incline again to the Peloponnasians, confidering how they might recover the gulf of Peloponisus, and they did grow very angry, when any man went about to talk of any other matter. To be short, it was concluded that they should fail away the next night following or the should be sho ing, and the Mafters of the Ships had order given them to make all things ready for them to depart. Themistocles perceiving their determination, he was marvellous angry in his mind, that the Gra-CIANS would thus disperse themselves afunder, repairing every man to his own City, and leaving the advantage which the nature of the place and the straight of the arm of the Sea, where they lay in harbour together, did offer them; and so he bethought himself how this was to be holpen. Suddenly the practice of one Sicinus came into his mind, who being a Parsian born, and taken priloner before in the war, loved Themisforles very well, and was School-master to his Children. This Sicinus he fecretly fent unto the King of Parsia, to advertise him that Themisfocles (General of the ATHENIANS) was very defirous to become his Majeffies fervant, and that he did let him understand betimes that the GRECIANS were determined to fly; and therefore that he wished him not to let them escape, but to set upon them whilest they were troubled and afraid, and far from their Army by land, to the end that upon a fuddain he might overthrow their whole power by Sea. Xerxes supposing this intelligence came from a man that withed him well, received the melfenger with great joy, and thereupon gave prefent order to his Captains by Sea, that they should imbarke their men into the other Ships at better leifure, and that prefently they should put out with all politible speed, two hundred Sail to follow the GRECIANS in the tail, to shut up the foreland of the fraight, and to compals the Isles all about, that not one of his enemies this might escape, and so it fell out. Then Aristides (Lycimacus Son) being the first that perceived it, went to Themisfocles tent, though he was his enemy, and through his onely means had been benished before, as ye have heard; and calling him our, told him how they were environed: Themiflocks who knew well enough the goodness of this man, being very glad he came at that time to feek him out, declared unto him the policy he had used by the message of Sicinus, praying him to put to his help to flay the GRECIANS, and to procure with him, confidering his word had more authority among them, that they would fight within the straight of SALAMIA. Arifides commending his great wisdom, went to deal with the Captains of the other galleys, and to procute the straight of SALAMIA. Arifides commending his great wisdom, went to deal with the Captains of the other galleys, and to procute the straight of the str them to fight. For all this, they would not credit that he faid, untill such time as there arrived a galley of TENEDIENA, wherreof one Panetius was captain, who being stolen out of the host of the barbarous army, brought certain news that the straight out of doubt was shut up. So that befides the necessity which did urge them, the spite which the GRECIANS conceived thereof did provoke them to hazard the battel. The next morning by break of day King Xerxes placed himself on a marvellous steep high hill, from whence he might discern his whole Fleet, and the ordering of his Army by Sea, about the Temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth, Which is the narrow way or channell between the Isle of SALAMINA, and the coast of ATTICA; or as Acestodorus saith, upon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, above the point which they commonly call the Hornes. There Xerxes fet up a Throne of gold, and had about him many Secretaries to write all that was done in the battel. But as Themistocles was facrificing unto the gods in his galley that was Admirall, they brought to him three young Prisoners, fair of complexion, richly arayed with gold and Jewels, whom they faid were the children of Sandace the Kings Sifter. and of Prince Autaritus. So foon as Euphrantides the Soothfayer had feen them, and at their arrivall observed, there arose a great bright flame out of the Sacrifice, and at the very self same inftant that one on his right hand had fneezed; He took Themistocles by the hand, and willed him to facrifice all those three prisoners unto the god Bacchus, surnamed Omestes, as much to say as the cruell Bacchus: For in doing it, the GRECIANS should not onely be faved, but they should have the victory over their enemies. Themistocles wondred much, to hear fo strange and terrible a commandment of the Soothfayer. Nevertheless the common fort following their custom, which is, to promile fafety sooner in the greatest dangers and most desperate cases, by strange and unreasonable. rather then by reasonable and ordinary means; they began to call upon the god with one voice. and bringing the three prisoners near unto the Altar, they compelled him to perform the sacrifice in that fort as the Soothsayer had appointed. Phanias Lesbian an excellent Philosopher, and well feen in Stories and Antiquities, reporteth this matter thus: As for the number of the Ships of the barbarous Navy, Afchilus the Poet in a Tragedy which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainly the troth, faith thus:

King Xerxes had a thousand Ships I know. Among ft the which two hundred were (I trow) And feven, which all the rest did over-fail With swifter course. This is withouten fail.

Xerxes King of Perlia had a thousand Ships.

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in every one of the which there were eighteen Souldiers, whereof four of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no less skill and wisdom choose his time and place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies untill the hour was come, that of ordinary custom the Sea-wind arose, and brought in a rough Tide within the Channell, which did not hurt the GRECIAN galleys, being made low and fnug, but greatly offended the PERSIAN galleys, being high cargued, heavy, and not yare of steredge, and made them lie sidelong to the GRECIANS, who siercely set upon them, having alwaies an eye to Themistocles direction that best foresaw their advantage. At the same time Artamenes, Xerxes Ad- Artamenes mirall, a man of great valour and worthieft of the Kings brethren, bestowed arrows and darts as Xerxer Adit were from the walls of a Castle, charging the galley of Aminias Decelian and Sosicles Pedian, which mirall. were joyned and grapled with him, and fiercely entring the fame, was by them valiantly received upon their Pikes, and thrust over board into the Sea.; Whose body floting amongst other shipwracks, Artemisia knowing, caused to be carried to King Xerxes. Now whilest this battel stood in these terms. they fay that there appeared a great flame in the Element toward the City of ELEUSIN, and that a loud voice was heard through all the plain of THRACIA unto the Sea, as if there had been a number of men together that had fung out aloud the holy Song of Jacobus. And it feemed by little and little, that there arose a cloud in the air from those which sang, that left the land, and came and lighted on the galleys in the Sea. Others affirmed, that they faw armed men, which did reach out their hands from the Isle of ÆGINA, towards the GRECIAN Galleys: and they thought they were the ÆACIDES, for whose help they all prayed before the battel was begun. The first man of the ATHENIANS that took any of the enemies Ships, was Lycomedes, a Captain of a galley; who having taken very rich furniture and flags, did afterwards confecrate them to Apollo laurel; as ye would fay, victorious. The other GRECIANS in the front being equall in number with the barbarous Ships, by reason of the straightness of the arm of the Sea wherein they fought, and so straightned as they could not fight but by one and one, whereby the Barbarians disorderly laid one another The Grecians aboord, that they did hinder themselves with their over multitude; and in the end were fore pressed victory of the upon by the GRECIANS, that they were constrained to fly by night, after they had fought and Persians Navy maintained battel untill it was very dark. So that the GRECIANS wan that glorious and famous victo- by Sea. ry, of the which may truly be affirmed that, as Simonides faith,

Was never yet nor Greek nor barbarous crew, That could by Sea so many men subdue : Nor that obtain'd fo famous victory , In any fight against their enemy.

Thus was the victory won through the valiantnels and courage of those that fought that battle, but especially through Themssfooles great policy and wildom. After this battle Xerxers being mad for his loss, thought to fill up the arm of the Sea, and to pass his Army by land, upon a Bridge, into the Isle of SALAMINA. Themistocles because he would feel Aristides opinion, told him as they were talking together, that he thought best to go and occupy the straight of Hall-Is spont with the army by Sea, to break the Bridge of Ships which Xerxes had caused to be made: to the end, faid he, that we may take Asia into Euro PE. Arifides liked not this opinion for we have ((aid he) fought all this while against this barbarous King, who thought but to play with us: but if we shut him within GREECE, and bring him to fight of necessity to save his life: such an enemy that commanded fo great an Army, will no more stand still, as a looker on, and sit at his eafe under his golden pavillion, to fee the partime of the battell, but will prove every way, and be himself in every place at all affaies to fave himself from such a straight and danger. Thus with politick care and forefight, he may eafily amend his former fault committed by negligence, and do well enough, when he shall see his life and Kingdom both depend upon it. Therefore Themissocles, Well emough, when he man he me me and hange at all, which he hath cauled to be made; but I would think best not to break down his Bridge at all, which he hath cauled to be made; but rather if we could, to build another to it, to drive him out of Europe as foon as we could. The mifforles then replied: Seeing you think this were best to be done, we must all lay our heads together, to devise how he may be forced to come our as foon as we could. They breaking off with this resolution, Themistocles sent immediately one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arfaces that was one of the Grooms of his Chamber, whom he found our amongst the Prifoners, and by him he fent this Meffage unto the King: That the GRECIANS having won the battell of him by fea, had decreed in their Counfel, how they would go to the straight of HELLESPONT, to break the Bridge of the Ships he had caused to be made there. Whereof he thought good to advertise him for the good will he did bear him, and to the end he might bethink him betimes, to get him away to the fea within his own Dominion, and so pass back again into Asia as soon as he could, whilest he gave or der to his allies and confederates, to flay following him at the poop. The barbarous King underftanding this news, was fo afraid that he hoifed away with all possible speed. The further torefight and great wisdom of Themistocles and Aristides, in marine causes, did manifestly appear afterwards in the battel the GRECIANS fought before the City of PLATEA, against Mardonisu King Watus in the Dated the Charles and power of the Kinghis Soveraigns there, did yet put the Xerxes Lieutenant: who having but a small power of the Kinghis Soveraigns there, did yet put the GRECIAN'S to great differes, and in hazard to have lost all. Of all the Towns and Cities that fought in this battel, Herodotus writeth, that the City of ÆGINA wan the fame for valiantness above the reft: and of private men, among the GRECIANS, Themisforles was judged the worthiest man; although it was fore against their wills, because they envied much his glory. For after the battel done, all the Captains being gotten into the straight of PELOPONNESUS, and having fworn upon the Altar of their facrifices, that they would give their voices after their confciences, to those they thought had best deserved it : every one gave himself the first place for worthines, and the fecond unto Themisfocles. The LACEDEMONIANS carried him into SPARTA, where they judged the honour and dignity of valiantness to their Admirall Eurybiades : but the wisdom and policy they artributed unto Themistocles. In token thereof they gave him an Olive branch, and the goodlieft Coach that was in their City: and moreover they fent three hundred of their lufty youths to accompany him, and conduct him out of their Countrey. And they say, that at the next Feasis and affemblies of the plays Olympicall which were made after this victory, when Themistocles was once come into the flew-place where these Games were played, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all cast their eyes on him, shewing him to the strangers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their hands did witners how much they effected him. Whereathe himlelf took for great delight, that he confessed to his familiar friends, he then did reap the fruit and handle for the finder an and benefit of his fundry and painfull fervices he had taken in hand, for the prefervation of GREECE: Themisfacter fo ambitious was he of nature, and coverous of honour, as we may easily perceive by certain of his ambition noted deeds and notable sayings they have noted of him. For being chosen Admirall of ATHENS, he deeds and notable sayings they have noted of him. never dispatched any causes private or publick, howsoever they fell our, until the very day of his departure and taking ship: and all because that men seeing him dispatch much business at once, and to fpeak with fo many persons together, they should efteen him to be the notabler man, and of the greater authority. Another time he walked upon the fands by the fea fide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the fea had caft up upon the shore : and feeing some of them that had on thill their chains of gold and bracelers, he passed by on his way, but shewed them yet to a familiar friend of his that followed him, and faid unto him : Take thou those, for thou art not Themisfoctes. And unto one Antiphates, who in his youth had been a goodly young boy, and at that time did fcornfully behave himself unto him, making no reckoning of him: and now that he saw him in great authority came to see him, be said: O my young son and friend; we are both even at one time that the same himself unto him, be said: O my young son and friend; we are both even at one time that the same of himself unto here. (but too late) grown wife. He faid the ATHENIANS did not effect of him nor honour him in time of peace: but when any florms of wars were towards, and they flood in any danger, they ran to him then, as men ran to the shadow of a Plane tree, upon any suddain rain : and afterwards when fair weather cometh again, they cut away the branches and boughs thereof. There was a man born in the Isle of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, did cast him in the teeth, that is was not for his worthiness, but for the noble City wherein he was born, that he had won fuch glory: Thou sayest true said he; but neither should I have won any great honour, if I had been a SPRIPHIAN, nor thou also if thou hadst been an ATHENIAN. Another time one of the Captains of the City, having done good fervice unto the Commonweal, made boast before Themisfincles, A pretty Tale and compared his service equal with his. Themistocles to answer him, told him a pretty tale, That a pretty 131e and compared ins service equal with the Holy-day, repining against her, that he laboured for his of Themistudes the Working-day brauled on a time with the Holy-day, repining against her, that he laboured for his living continually, and how the did nothing but fill her belly, and foend that they had gotten. Thou haft reason said the Holy-day: but if I had not been before thee, thou hast not been here now

And fo, if I had not been then; where had you my Mafters been now? His own Son was a little too fawcy with his Mother, and with him alfo, bearing himfelf over-boldly of her good will, by means of her cockering of him. Whereupon being merrily disposed, he would say that his Son Themissocles could do more then any man in all GREECE. For, faith he, the ATHENIANS command the GRE- faying of his CIANS, I command the ATHENIANS, my Wife commandeth me, and my Son commandeth Son. her. Moreover because he would be fingular by himself above all other men : having a piece of Land he would fell, he willed the Cryer to proclaim open fale of it in the market-place, and withall he should add unto the sale, that his Land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being fuiters to his Daughter, he preferred the honester before the richer, faying : he had rather have to his Son in law a man that lacked goods, then goods to lack a man. These were Themistocles pleafant conceits and answers. But after he had done all these things we have spoken of before, he took in hand to build again the City and walls of ATHENS, and did corrupt the Officers of LACED.E- Themisfacles MONIA with money, to the end they should not hinder his purpose, as Theopompus writeth: Or as built again the all other say, when he had deceived them by this subtilty, he went unto SPARTA, as Ambassadour, walls of the fent thither of purpose upon the complaints of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENI-City of Athens ANS did inclose their City again with walls, who were accused unto the Counsel of Sparta, by an Orator called Poliarchus, who was fent thither from ÆGINETES, of purpose to prosecute this matter against the ATHENIANS. Themistocles stoutly denied it to them, and prayed them for better understanding of the troth, they would fend some of their men thither to see it. This was a fetch onely to win by this delay, the ATHENIANS fo much more time to raife up their walls, and that the ATHENIANS should keep as Hostages for surery of his person, those they should fend to A- A subtill seach THENS to bring back the report thereof; and so it fell out. For the LACEDEMONIANS being of Themistocles. informed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but diffembling the milliking they had to be thus The haven of abused by him, fent him away safe and sound. Afterwards he made them also mend and fortifie the Piras fortified. haven of PIREA, having confidered the fituation of the place, and all to encline the City to the fea. Wherein he did directly contrary to all the counfel of the ancient Kings of ATHENS: who feeking (as they fay) to withdraw their people from the fea, and to accustom them to live upon the land by planting, fowing, and plowing their grounds, did devile and give out abroad, the Fable they tell of the goddels Pallas : And that is this : How she contending with Neptune about the patronage of the Countrey of ATHENS, brought forth and shewed to the Judges the Olive-tree, by means whereof the prevailed and obtained the preheminence. Even to Themistocles did not joyn the haven of PIREA unto the City of ATHENS, as the Comicall Poet Aristophanes faith: but rather joyned the City unto the haven PIREA, and the land unto the fea. By this means he made the people ftrong against the Nobility, and brought the commonalty to wax bolder then they were before, by reason the rule and authority fell into the hands of Saylers, Mariners, Pilots, Ship-masters, and fuch kind of feafaring men: fo as the Pulpit where all the Orations were made, flood in the market-place of PNIX, and did look towards the fea. But the thirty Tyrants that came in afterwards, did remove it, and turn it towards the land : holding opinion, to be ftrong by fea, was it that did maintain the authority of the popular state : and that contrariwise they which live by the labour and toil of the earth, do more willingly like the government of Nobility. Themistocles called to mind another matter also of greater importance, to make the City of ATHENS of greater power by sea. For after the retire of Xerxes, and that all the Fleet and Navy of the GRECIANS wintred in the haven of PEGASES: he faid one day in an open affembly of the people, that he had thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficial for them, but it was not to be told openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Ariftides; and if he thought it good, they would execute it speedily. Themistocles then told Aristides: the thing he had considered of was to burn the Arcenall where the GRECIANS Navy lay, and to let on fire all their Ships. Ariftides hearing his purpole, returned to the people, and told them; how nothing could be more profitable, but withall more unjust, then that which Themistocles had devised. The ATHENIANS then willed Aristides it should be let alone The equity of altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDAMONIANS had exhibited their Petition to the Coun- the Athenians. sel of the Amphittions (that is, the generall Counsel of all the states of GREECE, assembled) how the Towns and Cities of GREECE which had not been parties with the GRECIANS in the League against the barbarous people, should be put off wholly from this Counsel, Themestocles doubting that if the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS and the THEBANS also should by this means be exempted, that the LACEDEMONIANS would be then the greater number in voices, and by this means might do what they would in this Counsel: he spake so considerately for the Cities which they would have thus discharged, that he made the Petitioners in the affembly utterly to change their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirty Cities comprised onely in the League, and yet that some of them were very weak and small: and how it were no reason, that rejecting all the rest of GREECE, the greatest authority of this Counsel should fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefest Cities alone. For this cause chiefly the LACEDEMONIAN'S did ever bear him extreme harred, and did ftir up Ciman all they could, to be always adversary opposite unto him, and as it were to beard him in all marters of state, and the government of ATHENS. They procured him belides the ill will and displeasure of all the friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went fayling still to and fro along the Isles, exacting Money of the inhabitants of the same. And this is to be known by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would have had Money) and by the answer they made him, as Herodorus writeth. Which was, how he had brought them two mighty gods: Love and Force. And they answered him again, that they also had two great goddeffes, which kept them from giving of him any money : Powerty and Impossibility. And to make this good alfo, Timocreon the Rhedian Poet galled him to the quick, when he sharply taunted him, for calling many home again for money that were banished: and how for the covegoldeffes.

Taunted him, tor calling many nonic again to money and Friend. The verfes wherein this mattoufness of Money he had betrayed, and forfaken his hoft and Friend. The verfes wherein this mattourness of Money he had betrayed, and forfaken his hoft and Friend. Impossibility. ter is mentioned, are to this effect:

Who lift commend worthy Paufanias, Zanthippus or good Leotychides, Tet fhall I feem but light thereof to pafs, Compar'd with valiant Aristides. For yet was nay the like in Athens town, Nor never shall come none of like renown. Themistocles by right and due desert, Is hated of Latona, for his lies, And for he bare a traiterous wicked heart Who like a wretch, and niggard did devise, For small reward his bost Timocreon. To hold out of his Countrey falison. He took for bribe (unjustly yet therewhile) Of ready coin three talents fair and bright, Revoking such as pleas'd him, from exile, And banishing full many a worthy wight. Or putting them to death, without cause told, He gate thereby great heaps of coyn and Gold. But in the end (o right reward for fuch) This bribing wretch, was forced for to hold A sipling booth, most like a clown or snuch, At holy feasts and pastimes manifold, Which were among ft the people in those days, Istmician folke , did use the like always. And there he ferv'd his quests with cold meat still, Whilft they that tafted of his cookery, Gan wish that they (to ease their weary will) Had never lived, to fee the treachery Of false Themistocles, and that he might No longer live, which wrought them such dispight.

After this, he did more openly blase him to the world, when he was banished and condemned, in a fong that had beginning thus:

O Muse, let these my verses be disperst Throughout all Greece, since they deserve no less: And fince the truth which is in them rehearst, Deserveth fame, whom no man should suppress.

They fay the cause why this Timocreon was banished, was, the friendship which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giving them intelligence. Whereof Themissocles was one that judicially condemned bim. Wherefore when Themistocles himself was accused afterwards of the fame fault, Timocreen then made these verses following against him:

Timocreon was not without his pheere, Which did confer with Medes privily, Since others mo, the felf same blame might bear, Mo foxes lurke in dens , as well as 1.

Besides these verses, Themissocles own Citizens for ill will they bare him, began now with great contenument and applause, to hearken to those that gave out evil speeches and slanders of him. Therefore while he fought ways to redress all this, he was driven to use such means, which more increased their hatred towards him. For in his orations to the people, he did off remember them of the good fervices he had done them : and perceiving how they were offended withall, he was driven to fay: Why, are ye weary to often to receive good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him alfo, when he furnamed Diana (in the dedication of her Temple he made unto her) Aristobule, as much to fay, as the good counseller: meaning thereby, how he had given grave and wife counfel, both unto his City, and to all the reft of the GRECIANS. He built this Tentplealso near his house, in a place called Melica, where the hang-men did cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throw the Rags and halters ends of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by Law. There was also in our days in the Temple of Diana Aristobule, a little Image of Themissectes, which shewed plainly, that he was not onely wife, and of a noble mind, but also of a great majefty and countenance in the face. In the end the ATHENIANS banished him ATHENS for five years, because they would pluck down his over great courage and authority, as they did use to serve those, whose greatness they thought to be more, then common Themistodes equality that ought to be among Citizens would bear. For this manner of banishment for a time, banished for called Oftracissimon, was no punishment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away five years. of the envy of the people, which delighted to pluck down their ftomacks that too much feemed to exceed in greatness: and by this means they took away the poylon of his malice, with diminishing his glory and honour. So Themistocles being banished from ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS In this mean feafon, Paufanias treachery fell out, which gave his enemies occasion to lie heavy on his back. But he which became his accuser, and was partner of the treason, was one called Leabotes, (Alemeons Son) born in a Village called AGRAULA. Besides this, the SPARTANS also did fit on his skirts, and charged him forely. For Paufanias never before revealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although he was his very familiar friend. But after he saw Themstocles was banished, and did take his exile very unpatiently: then Pausaniae was bold to open his treason unto him, to procure him to take his part, and shewed him the Letters the King of PERSIA had written to him, and all to thir him up against the GRECIANS, as against ungratefull and unnaturall people. Howbeit Themistocles shook him off, and told him plainly he would be no parmer of his treason. Notwithstanding, he never revealed it to any living creature, nor discovered the practise he Paulanius intended : hoping either he would have given it over, or that shortly it would appear by some revealeth his other mean, confidering he fo fondly afpired to things of danger, and without purpose or posti- treason unto bility. After Paufanias was condemned, and had suffered pains of death for the same : they found amongst his papers, certain writings and Letters, which made Thems stocles to be very fore suspected. Whereupon the LACEDEMONIANS on the one fide cryed out of him, and his enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accused him on the other side. To the which he made answer by Letters from the beginning, and wrote unto the people; that it was not likely that he (who fought all the ways to rule, and was not born to ferve, neither had any mind thereto) would ever have thought in his head, to fell his own liberty, and the GRECIANS also unto the Barbarous people their Themistacles enemies. Notwithstanding this purgation of his, the people by the procurement of his enemies, sent suspected of to apprehend him, and to bring him before the States of all GREECE, to be judged by that counsel, treason. Whereof Themssfocles having intelligence in time, he did convey himself into the isle of CORPHU, Themssfocles because the City there was greatly beholding to him, for a certain pleasure he had done them in fled into the times past. For the being at fuit and strife with the CORINTHIANS he took up the matter be- Isle Corphu. tween them, and gave judgement on their fide, and condemned the CORINTHIANS to pay them twenty Talents damages : and did fet down an Order, that they should occupy the Isle of LEUCADE incommon together, as ground that had been inhabited with the people, aswell of the one City, as of the other. From thence he fled to Epirus, whither being followed by the ATHENIANS and the LACEDEMONIANS, he was compelled to venter himself upon a doubtfull and very dangerous hope. For he went to yeeld himself into the hands of Admetus, King of the MOLOSSIANS. Who having heretofore made certain requests unto the ATHENIANS, and being shamefully denied them by means of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefest height and authority) the King was marvelloufly offended with him : and it was a cleer case indeed , that if he could then have laid hands on him, he would have been revenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the prefent mifery of his exile, he thought he might less fear the Kings old quarrell and difpleasure, then the fresh hate and envy of his Countrey men. Whereupon he went unto King Admet us, trufting to his mercy, and became an humble futer to him in a strange extraordinary fort. For he took the Kings little young Son in his Arms, and went and kneeled down before the Altar in his Chappel: which humble manner of fuing the MOLOSSIANS take to be most effectuall, and fuch as they dare not deny nor refuse. Some tay that Queen Philia her self, the Kings Wife did inform him of this their Countrey cuftom and manner, and brought her little. Son also near the The manner Altar. Other write also, that it was Admet us himself that taught and shewed him this enforcing of supplication manner of Petition, onely for a cloke to excuse himself to those that should come to demand The- among the missionles of him: that by duty of Religion he was so straightly bound and restrained, that he might Molossians. not deliver him out of his Protection. In this mean time Epicrates Acharnian found the means fecretly to convey Themestocles Wise and Children out of ATHENS, and did send them privily unto him : whereupon he was afterwards accused and put to death, upon Cimons accusation and motion, as Stefimbrotus writeth. Who not remembring those matters I know not how, or making as though Themistocles had not remembred himself to say, that Themistocles sailed into SICILE, where he fought to Marry Hierons Daughter, the Tyrant of SYRACUSA: promiting him if he would let him have her, he would affure him to conquer all GREECE for him and to bring them under his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into A s I A: but that is not likely. For Theophrastus writeth in his book intituled of Kingdoms, that Hieron having fent certain running Horses, to the seast of the games Olympical, and having set up a marvellous rich and fumptuous Tent there: Themistocles made an Oration to the GRECIAN s, declaring unto them how they should tear the Tyrants Tent in peeces, and not to suffer his Horses to run with other swift and light Horses, and to carry away the prite in those holy games. Thucydides again declareth how he went unto the other sea, and imbarked in the City of PyDNE, being not known of never a man in the ship, untill such time as the wind began to carry them into the Isle of NAx-

Land, he was forced to bewray himself to the Master of the ship, and the Masters mate, and wrought them, what with fair words and what with threats (by faying he would accuse them to the ATHENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receive him in, but hired for money) so as he compelled them to fail no further, and to carry him into Asia. As for his goods, his friends faved the most part of them, and fent them into Asia to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate unto the State , Theopompus writeth, they did amount to the value of one hundred * Talents; and Theophrastus faith, but to fourfcore Talents onely: whereas all his goods was not worth three * Talents, when he began to govern the State of the Commonweal. When he came unto the City of Cuma, he perceived that all the coasts by the fea were layed for him to apprehend him , and that he had many spials upon him : among the which , these were two special noted men , Ergotels, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for men that fought their gain any way they could. For the King of Persia had proclaimed by found of Trumpet, two hundred Talents to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled unto a little town of EOLIA, called EGES, where no living body knew him, but his host onely, called Nicogenes: who was the richeft man of all the EQUIANS, and knew all the Noble men of authority that were about the King of Persia. Themistocles continued hidden certain days in his house : in which time, on a night after the feaft of a facrifice, one Olbim, schoolmaster to Nicogenes (hildren, by some secret working of the gods, suddenly fell besides himself, and began to sing these verses out aloud:

Do thou beleeve what so the night thee tells, And give thy voice thy counsell and concests Unto the night, in darksomeness that dwells, Thereon also thy victory awaits.

The next night following, Themisfocles being fast alleep in his bed, dreamed that a Snake wound ir felf round about his Belly, and glided upwards to his neck, untill it touched his face, and fuddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his wings: and fo at length did lift him up in the air, and carried him a marvellous way off, untill he thought he faw a golden rod (fuch as Heralds use to carry in their hand) whereupon the Eagle did fer him, and so was delivered of all this fear and trouble he thought himself in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this device in his head, how he might bring him fate to the King of Persia's court. The Barbarous Nations for the most part (and specially the Persians) are of a very strange nature, and marvellous jealous over their Women, and that not onely of their Wives, but also of their bondwomen, and concubines : which they keep fo straightly locked up, that no man ever feeth them abroad at any time, jealous of their but are alwaies like House-dows. And when they have any occasion to go into the Countrey, they are carried in close coaches covered all about, that no man can look into them. Themistocles was conveyed into one of these coaches drest after this manner, and had warned his men to answer those they met by the way, that asked whom they carried : that it was a young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the Countrey of IONIA, which they carried to the Court for a Noble man there. Thurydides, and Charon Lampfacenian lay, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and spake with his fon there. But Ephorms, Dino, Clisarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with himself. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thueydides words do best agree with the Chronicles and Tables, recording the fuccession of times, although they be of no great certainty. Themsficeles being come now to the swords point (as it were) and to the extremity of his danger, did first present him unto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand sootmen, and said unto him: Sir, Perfis's court. I am a Grecian born, and defire to speak with the King: 1 have matters of importance to open to his Majesty, and such as I know he will thankfully receive. Artabanua answered him in this manner: My friend fir stranger, the Laws and customs of men are diverse, and some take one thing for honest, other some another thing : but it is most honesty for all men, to keep and observe the Laws and manners of their own Countrey, For you GRECIANS have the name to love Liberty, and equality above all things: and for us, amongst all the goodly Laws and cuftoms we have, we efteem this above the rest: to reverence and honour our King, as the Image of the God of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt fathion thy felf after our manner to honour the King, thou mayest both fee him, and speak with him : but if thou have another mind with thee, then must thou of necessity use some third person for thy mean. For this is the manner of our Countrey: the King never giveth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he faid, answered him again : My Lord Artabanus, the great good will I bear unto the King, and the defire I have to god of nature. advance his Glory and Power, is the onely cause of my present repair unto his Court: therefore I mean not onely to obey your Laws (fince it hath so pleased the gods to raise up the Noble Empire of Parsia unto this greatness) bur will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there do at this present. Therefore let there be no stay, but that my felf in person may deliver to the King that I have to fay unto him. Well, faid Artabanus, Whom then shall we fay thou art? For by thy speech it seemeth, thou art a man of no mean state and condition. Themistocles answered him : As for that Arrabanus , none shall know before the King himself. Thus doth Phanias report it. But Eratosthenes, in his Book he wrote of riches, addeth further: how Themistocles had access unto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a Woman of ERETRIA, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought to his presence, after he had presented his humble duty and reverence to him, stood on his seet, and said never a word, untill the King commanded the interpreter to ask him what he was? and he answered : May it please your Majesty, O Noble King, I am Themistocles the ATHENIAN, a banished man out of my Countrey by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaireth to your Highnels, knowing I have done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I perswade my self I have done them far more good then harm. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS back they did not follow you, when the state of GREECE was delivered from thraldom, and my native Countrey from danger, and that I knew I stood in good state to pleasure you. Now for me, I find all mens good wills agreeable Themistocles to my prefent milery and calamity: for I come determined, most humbly to thank your Highness King of Persia.

for any grace and favour you shall shew me, and also to crave humble pardon if your Majesty be yet oftended with me. And therefore licence me (most noble King) to befeech you, that taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witness of the pleasures I have done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace use my hard fortune as a good occasion to shew your honourable vertue, rather then to fatisfie the passion of your heat and choler. For in faving my life, your Majesty saveth an humble futter that put himself to your mercy : and in putting me to death, you shall rid away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Having spoken thus these words, he faid further: That the gods by diverte figns and tokens had procured him to come to submit himself unto him, and told the King what vision he had seen in his dream in Nicogenes house: and declared also the Oracle of Jupiter Dodonian, who had commanded him that he should go unto him that was called as a god, and how he thought it was the person of his Majesty, because that god and he in troth were called both great Kings. The King having thus heard him speak, gave him then no present answer again, notwithstanding he marvelloully wondred at his great wisdom and boldness. But afterwards amongst his familiars the King said, he thought himself very happy to meet with the good fortune of Themistacles coming to him : and so besought his great god Arimanius, that he would always send his enemies such minds, as to banish the greatest and wifest men amongst them. It is reported also he did facrifice unto the gods, to give them thanks therefore, and disposed himself presently to be merry. Infomuch as dreaming in the night, in the midft of his dream he cryed out three times together for joy : I have Themistocles the ATHENIAN. The next morning the King having sent for the chiefest Lords of his Court, he made Themistocles also to be brought before him : who looked for no goodness at all, specially when he saw the souldiers warding at the Court gates, give him ill countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and underflood his name. Moreover, Resame, one of the captains, as Themispacles passed by him going to the King, (who was set in his chair of fare, and every man keeping silence) fostly sighing, said unto him : O thou Greekish serpent, subtle and malicious, the Kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Nevertheless when he came to the King, and had once again made him a very humble and low reverence : the King faluted him, and spake very courteously to him, saying : I am now your debter of two hundred Talents, for presenting your self. It is good reason I should deliver you the money promised him that should have brought you: but I give you a further warrant, be bold I charge you, and speak your mind freely, fay what you think of the state of GREECE. Themistocles then answered him : That mens An excellent words did properly resemble the stories and imagery in a piece of arras ; for both in the one and in the comparison of other, the goodly Images of either of them are seen, when they are unfolded and laid open. Con-Themistacles. trariwise they appear not, but are lost, when they are shut up, and close solded: whereupon he faid to the King: he must needs require some further time of answer. The King liked his comparifon passing well, and willed him to appoint his own time. Themistocles asked a year: in which time having pretily learned the Perfian tongue, he afterwards spake to the King himself without any interpreter. So, such as were no Courtiers, thought he onely talked with the King of matters of GREECE. But because the change and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noble men imagined he had been so bold to commune with the King of them also. Thereupon they greatly envied him, and afterwards murmured much against him, For indeed the King did honour Themisto- Themistocles cles above all other strangers whatsoever they were. On a time the King had him out a hunting honoured of with him, hemade him see his Mother, with whom he grew familiar : and by the Kings own com- the King of mandment he was to hear the disputations of the wife men of Persia touching secret Philosophy, which they call Magick. Mithropaustes, the Kings cousin, taking him by the hand, faid unto him: Demaratus the Kings has thou demandest, and if it were on thy head, it would cover but little wit: Nay, though Jupiter did give thee his lightning in thy hand, yet that would not make thee Jupiter.

But the King gave him to tharp a repulse for his unreasonable request, and was so angry with him for it, that it was thought he would never have forgiven him: howbeit Themistocles was so earnest a fuiter for him, that he brought him into favour again. And the report goeth, that the Kings fuccesfours which have been fince that time, under whom the PERSIANS have had more dealings with the

GRECIANS, then in former days: when they would retain any great state or personage of GREECE into their fervice, they wrote unto him, and promifed him they would make him greater about them, then ever was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirm it. For he being ftept up to great countenance and authority, and followed with great trains of futters after him by reason of his greatness: seeing himself one day very honourably served at his table, and with all forts of dainty meats, he turned him to his Children and said unto them: My Sons, we should have been undone, if we had not been undone. The most writers do agree, that he had given him the revenue of three Cities for his allowance of Bread, Wine, and Victuals: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACUS, and MYUNTA, But Neamthes Cyxicrnian; and Phanias do add two other Cities more, PERGOTA and PALESCEPSIA: the one to defray his charges of Apparrell, and the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themissocles going into the Low countries towards the lea, to take order against the practiles of the GRECIANS, there was a PERSIAN Lord called Epixies (Governour of the high Phrygia) that had laid a train to kill him (having of long time hired certain murderers of PISIDIA to do it) fo foon as he should come into a Town of his government, called the Lyons head. But as he slept on a day in his house in the afternoon, the Mother of the gods appeared unto him , and faid : Themisfocles , go not to the Lyons head, for fear thou meet with the Lyon: and for this warning, I do ask thy Daughter Mnessprolema for my serwant. Themisforles waking suddenly out of his dream, made his prayer unto the goddels, and turning out of the highway, fetched another compass about. Afterwards having passed that Town, he took his lodging being benighted: but one of the beafts which carried his Tent, fell by the way unfortunately in a River, and all his Arras and Tapethry hangings being throughly wet, his fervants were driven to lay them out a drying by Moon light. The Psilaians that lay in wair, and could not diferenby Moon light that they were Hangings layed out to dry, thought it had been the very Tent Themisfocles self did lie in : whereupon they went unto it with their Swords drawn in their hands, hoping to have taken him sleeping. But when they were come thither, and began to lift up a piece of the Hangings, some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watch) perceiving them, ran upon them and took them. So Themispactes having escaped this danger, wondered greatly at the favour of the goddels which had appeared unto him. In recompence whereof, when he was in the City of MAGNESIA, he built a Temple unto Dindymena, and made his Daughter Mnesiprolema Prioress of the same. As he passed by the City of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to visit the Temples and Offerings that had been given there : So he faw an Image of a Maid in Copper, in the Temples aim Chicago that had been supported by the Mother of the gods, being two yards high, which they called the Hydrophora, a much to fay as the Watercarrier. And it was a flatue, which himself had heretofore dedicated and caused to be made with the Fines of those that had paid forfeitures, for stealing or turning away the watercourse at ATHENS, at such time as he was Master-surveyer of the Water-works and Conduits there. Wherefore whether Themi neles was forry to fee this goodly Image a prisoner in the hands of the barbarous people, or that he would shew unto the ATHENIANS the greatness of his credit and authority through all the Kings dominions; he spake to the Governour of Lydia, and presed him for his fake that he would fend this Image again to ATHENS 1 But this barbarous Governour was very angry with his requeft, and told him he would advertise the King thereof. Then Themisfools: began to be afraid, and was driven to feek to the Governours Women and Concubines, whom he got for money to intreat him, and so made fair weather again with the Governour. But from thenceforth, he took better guard of him in all his doings, greatly fearing the envy of the barbarous people. For he progressed nor up and down Asia, as Theopompus writeth, but lay a long time in the City of MAGNESIA, quietly enjoying the Kings gracious gifts bestowed on him : where he was honoured and reverenced for one of the greatest persons of Persia, whilest the King was elsewhere occupied in the affairs of the Provinces of Asia, and had no leifure to think upon those of GREACE. But when news was brought him, that ÆGYPT was rebelled, by means of the favour and affiftance of the ATHENIANS, and that the GRECIANS Gallies did four the feas even unto the Isle of Cyprus, and unto the Coasts of CILICIA, and that Cimon had all the sea in fubjection: that made him then to bend all his thoughts how to refift the GRECIANS, that their greatness might not turn to his harm. Then Commissions went, out to leavy men, to affemble Caprains, and to dispatch Posts unto Themistocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings Letters, straightly charging him to have an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreover that he should faithfully keep his promise he had made to him. But he to thew that he neither maliced his (itizens, nor was moved with the defire of greatness and authority he might have grown unto in those wars, or else for that he thought the Kings expectation would prove to a greater matter then he could end or wade through, confidering GREECE was full at that time of famous Captains, and that Cimon amongst the reft had marvellous good fortune, and that it should be a reproach to him to stain the glory of to many Noble acts, to many Triumphs, and to great Victories as Cimon had done and won, he took a wife refolution with himfelf, to make fuch an end of his life, as the fame thereof deferved; for of Themijiseder he made a folemn Sacrifice unto the gods, and feafted at the fame all his friends. And after he had taken his leave of them all, he drank Bulls bloud, as most men think (or as other say) poyton, which dispatcheth a man in 24 hours, and to ended his days in the City of MAGNESIA, after he had lived threefcore and five years, and the most part of them always in Office and great charge. It is written, that the King of PERSIA understanding the cause and manner of his death, did more esteem him asterwards, then he did before, and that ever afterwards he continued to use his friends and familiars in very good fort. For he left Children behind him, which he had of Archippa (Lyfanders Daughter) of the Town of ALOPECIA: Archeptolis, Polyeuitus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plate the Philosopher maketh mention, faying that he was a good man at arms, but otherwife that there was no goodness in him. His other Sons that were elder, as Neocles, died being bitten with a Horse : and as for Discles another Son, MONGST many great matters which are spoken of this Furius Camillus, this seemeth most strange and wonderfull above the rest: that he having born the chiefest Offices of charge in his Countrey, and having done many notable and worthy deeds in the same as one that was chosen five times Diffator, and had Why Camillas triumphed four times, and had won himself the Name and Title of the second never came to founder of Rome, and yet never came to be Conful. his Grandfather Lyfander did adopt him for his Son. He had many Daughters, of the which Musippolema (which he had by a second Wife) was married unto her half brother Archeptolis, for they were not both of one wenter; another called Italia, was married unto one Pambides of CH10: Sybaris, unto Nicodemes an Arme NIAN: and Nichomacha, unto Pharficles, Themistocles Nephew, unto whom her Brethren did marry her within the City of MAGNESIA, after the death of their Father. This Pharficles did bring up Asia, which was the youngest of all his Daughters. Furthermore his fumptuous Tomb standerh yer in the Market-place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocides writeth of Themificeles his bones, in a book he made to his friends, is not to be credited: which was, that the ATHENIANS Tomb and having found the aftes of his bones, did caft them up into the air, as a device to ftir up the Noble men Reliques. against the people. And Phylarchus in his History (much like unto the feigned subtilities of a Tragedy) against the people. And a system is a supervision of the supervision of the supervision of the supervision of the supervision. However, and the supervision of the su the Cosmographer also in a book he hath written of Tombs and Monuments, faith, by conjecture, rather then of any certain knowledge: that along the haven of PIREA, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a foreland in form of an elbow, within the which when they have doubled the point, the fea is always calm, and there they find a great and long foundation or bafe, upon the which there is as it were the form of an Altar, and that is (faith he) Themisfocles Tomb. And he supposeth that Plato the Comical Poet doth witness it in these verses :

Thy grave is fet and plac't commodiously, Where paffengers and Merchants that come by May visit thee, and where it may regard All such as seek that port to be their ward. Sometimes also, it may rejoyce to see, The bloudy fights, upon the sea that be.

And furthermore, those of MAGNESIA did institute certain honours unto the iffue of Themistocles, Honour done And in reference, those of any and in my time, another Themistocles also of ATHENS did enjoy to Ibmistocles which continue yet unto this day. And in my time, another Themistocles also of ATHENS did enjoy after his death, the same honours, with whom I was familiarly conversant in the house of Ammonius the Philosopher.

THE LIFE OF FURIUS CAMILLUS.

news currant in the Camp, which lay at fiege of the City of VEIES : in fo much as the very bruit of it flew over the walls of the City, unto them that were befieged. And as it happeneth very oft in long fieges, that those which lie in camp do oftentimes talk with them that are befieged:

there was a ROMAN who fell acquainted, and commonly used to talk familiarly with one of the City, who could tell of many old and strange things done and happened, and was very skilfull he had heard him, was as merry as a Pye at thematter, and that he gibed at their fiege; he told him further, that this wonderfull chance was not onely happened unto the ROMANS at that time, but that they had been acquainted with many other far more strange then this, which he would very willingly open unto him, to fee if there were any remedy, that though the affairs of the Commonweal had but hard fuccess, yet he would procure that his own private matters might prosper well with him. The VEIAN answered them, he would hear them with a good will.

and give good ear unto him, hoping to have heard fome great fecret. So the ROMAN training him on still from one matter to another, holding on his way, untill he saw he was a good distance off from the gates of the City, he suddenly caught hold on him, and by strong hand carried him away with him, and with help of other Souldiers which came running out of the camp unto him, he brought him to the Captains. The VEIAN feeing himself thus forcibly used, and knowing also that fatall destiny cannot be avoided, began to declare unto the ROMANS, the ancient Oracles and Prophefies touching the fortune of their City : by which it was reported unto them, that the City of VEIES should never be taken, untill the enemy had caused the water of the Lake Albanus (which should break out) to be brought back again, and to turn it fome other way from thence, that it should not fall into the sea. This was carried unto the Senate at ROME, to be confulted of in the Councell: and there it was determined they should fend to the

Oracle of Apollo at the City of DELPHOS, and ask him what they should do therein. So thither omitted fome ancient Ceremonies in the Holy days of the LATINES. And another willed them, that they should by all possible means they could, keep the water of the Lake ALBANUS that it fell not into the sea, and should (if it were possible) bring it back again into his old place; if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be drunk up in the middest of the fields. When these Oracles were understood, the Priests prepared all things for Divine service, and the people went about the water of the Lake to turn it again. After these things were done, the Senate in the tenth year of the wars against the Vetans, put off all those it pleased them to grant a happy end of these Wars, in honour of them he would celebrate great cause a Chambermaid to enter into her Temple, and there they box her about the ears. Then they put her out of the Temple, and do imbrace their Brothers Children rather then their own. They make many other Ceremonies, and they are much like unto those that are done unto Bacchus Nurses, and to the misfortunes that chanced unto Ino, by reason of her Husbands Concubine. After all these vows and prayers made, he entred with his Army into the FALISSIANS territories, whom he overthrew in a great battel : together with the CAPENATES also, which came to aid them. From thence he went to the fiege of the City of VEIES, where perceiving to take it by affault, was not to be done without great danger: he began to undermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and withall so deep, that the enemies could perceive nothing. Now when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gave an affault to the walls in all places alike about the City at one instant, to bring out all the inhabitants of the City to man the walls. Whilft they were all thus upon the walls to make facrifice unto the gods, and that his Soothsayer having considered the intrails of the beaft offered up in facrifice, cried out aloud, that the gods gave the victory unto him, which should happen to come upon them in this Sacrifice. The ROMANS which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noyse with their weapons:

wherewith the enemies were fo aftonied, that they fled upon it, and fo the ROMANS took the intrails and carried them unto Camillus. And these be even much like the Poets Tales and Fa-

Now Camillus being at that time in his best credit and authority, and in the prime and glory of his doings, did not defire to be made Conful without the good will of the people, although whilst he was in authority there were many times Confuls created. But being called people, authorized within the was in authorized their water many times of the fort, that when he was alone, he and chosen to all other Offices and dignities, he behaved himself in such fort, that when he was alone, he made his authority common to other : and when he had companions and affociates, the glory of all redounded to himself alone. The cause whereof, was his modefly on the one side, for he commanded ever without envy: and his great wildom and fufficiency on the other fide, for the which all otherswillingly gave him place, and yeelded to him. The house of Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the first that began to set himself forwards. For in a great battel which was fought against the Aques and Volfees, he being but a private man at Arms under the Dietator Posthumius Tubertus, was the first that riding out of the Army, advanced himself and gave the charge. And being run into the thigh at that time with a staff broken upon his thigh, he plucked the truncheon our and retired not for all that : but giving charge again upon the floutest of the enemies , he fought it out fo valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chief cause they turned their backs. Whereupon, to require his fervice done at that time (befides other honours they did him) they made him Cenfor : an Office at that time of great preheminence and dignity. Inhis Office of Cenforship, hedid two notable acts, The one very honeft; when he brought Men that were not married; to marry the Women whom the one very monet; which were in number many. The other very nefton, and partly by threatnings, to fet round fines upon their heads that rejuled. The other very neceffary; in that he brought the Orphans to be contributories unto Taxes and Subfidies, which before payed nothing. The cause thereof was, the continual wars, about the which the Commonweal fulfained great charges, but specially about the sege of the City of the VEIES (which some call VENETIANS) that was a very fore burthen to them at that time. For it was the capital City of all THUSCAN, the which for store of Armour, and number of Souldiers, was nothing inferiour to

Witer befreged. the City of ROME. For the VEIAN'S being grown to stomack and courage in time, by reason of their wealth and prosperity, and for the fundry great battels they had fought against the ROMANS, that contended with them for glory and empire: and now it fell to out, that they finding themselves weakened by many great overthrows, which they had received of the ROMANS, they did let fall their former Peacocks bravery and ambition, to bid them battel any more in the field. Howbeir the inhabitants of the City of Veies having raifed the walls, and made very great high rampiers, began to fortifie themselves, and made good provision for Armour and munition, besides store of Corn, Shot and other necessary things: they valiantly, and without fear of any thing, defended the siege of the ROMAN'S, that continued a long time, and was no less hard and painfull unto them that did beliege, then it was unto those that were belieged. For where the ROMANS were wont beforetime to keep their houses in the winter season, and the field onely in the summer time : that was the first time they were compelled by the Captains and Tribuni militares, to build forts, and to intreach their Campwith a wall, even in their enemies countrey, and to winter abroad as they were wont to lie in the Camp in fummer. Now this fiege had continued feven years together. The Captains were burthened that they did not their duties, nor flood manfully to their charge: whereyears together upon in the end they were discharged, and other Captains placed in their rooms to follow the fiege. Amongst thole, Camillus was one, whom then the second time they created Tribunus mili-Camillar twice fark. Who notwithstanding did nothing then in that fiege, because it was his hap by Lot, to make wars upon the PHALERIANS and the CAPENATES. These people whilest the ROMANS were occupied otherwhere, had invaded their Countrey and done them great harm, during the time of their war with the Thuscans, But Camillas having overthrown a great number of them in the field, had the rest in chace; and drave them to take their City, and did shut them up within their own walls. The chance that happened at the Lake of ALBANUS, about the time the THUSCAN wars were greateft, did marvelloully amaze the ROMANS, being no less wonderfull, then the most strange and uncredible thing that could be told by man. For they could not find ing of the full, then the most strange and uncredible thing that could be toold by said in the latter end of Lake Albanus, out the cause of it by common reason, nor any naturall ground: confidering it was in the latter end of Lake Albanus, out the cause of it by common reason, nor any naturall ground: Autumn, and Summer was ended, and that there had not been much rain, nor notable South-winds.

And although there are many Lakes, many Brooks and Rivers, many Springs and other waters in ITA-Ly : yet Tome of them dried up altogether, other ran bur faintly by reason of the drought, and all the Rivers then were (as they are wont to be commonly in Summer) very low, and there was feant any water. But the Lake Alba Nus contrariwife, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth say whither out of it felf, being environed all about with hills and mountains, and where the earth is good: began to swell, and rife to every mans fight without any cause at all (but secret and histeen unto the gods alone) and went alwaies increasing along those hills sides, until such time as it came to be even with the height of the highest mountain, gathering upwards still without any waves or tempest of weather at all. This at the first, made poor Shepherds and Heardmen, keeping their Cartel there abouts, marvelloufly afraid: but at the length when the earth and the weight of one of the hills (which kept in the Lake as a wall, from running over into the field) began to break by reason of the weight and great quantity of water, that ran straight with a marvellous extream force and violence over all the arable Lands and grounds planted with Trees, and so took his course into the Sea : the ROMANS then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wonderfully afraid, and judged that it was fonce fign and prognostication of some wonderfull thing to come. And these was no other great good prosperity and victory, some bitter adversity and overthrow be predestined unto us : I befeech you then (most merciful gods) in sparing our City of Rome, and this her Army, you will (with as little hurr as may be) let it all fall and light upon my person alone. And as he had spoken thefewords, and was turning on his sight hand (according to the manner of the ROMANS after they have prayed unto the gods) he fell down flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somewhat troubled with the matter ; but after he got up on his seet again, he told them that the thing he requested of the gods was happened unto him. And that was, a little hurr, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole City being spoiled and rifled, he was also desirous to carry June's Image to ROME, to accomplish the vow he had made. And having fent for workmen for this purpose, he did facrifice first unto the goddes, befeething her to accept well of the ROMAN'S good will, and that the would willingly vouchtate to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the City of ROME. Some fay, that the Image answered, she was contented. But Livius writeth, that Camillus made this prayer as he touched the Image, and that the affiltants answered the was contented, and would go with a good will. Yet they which do affirm, it was the Image felf that spake, do favour this miracle, grounding their proof upon the opinion of the fortune of ROME; the which, from so base and mean beginning had impossibly attained unto so high glory and power

as it had, without the fingular favour of the gods : and that hath manifeltly appeared unto the world, by fundry great proofs and examples. They bring forth also such other like wonders: As, that Images have heretofore let fall drops of sweat from them : that they have been heard to figh : that they have turnders of Images ed, and that they have made certain figns with their eyes, as we find written in many ancient stories, And we could our felves also rell such like wonders, which we have heard men of our time affirm, which are not uncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for fuch matters, it is as dangerous to give too much credit to them, as also to discredit them too much, by reason of the weakness of mans nature, which hath no certain bounds, nor can rule it felf, but runneth sometimes after vanity and superstition, and otherwhile alfo despiteth and contemmeth holy and divine matters : and therefore the mean is the vertue, and not to go too far in this, as in all other things befides, it is the best. Now Gamillus, whether his late enterprise performed, in winning a City that stood out with Rome, and held siege with them ten years together, had put him into an overweening conceit of himself: or that the words of the people, which did bles and praife him, had made him look high, and prefume upon himself, more then became the modefty of a civil Magistrate and Governour of the Commonweal, and one that was subjects. to the Law : he showed a stately triumph, fer forth with all rich surniture, and specially for that himfeld was carried through Rome upon his triumphant Chariot drawn with four fair white courters. This , never Captain nor General before him durft undertake to do , neither any ever after him attempted it : for they, think it as a facred carriage, and onely meet for the King and Pather of the gods. This bred him much eavy amongst the Citizens, which had not been acquainted with so great featelines; There was another occasion also that made them mislike him much : which was, because he flood against the Law pur forth that they should divide the City of ROME. For the Tribunes of the people did fet our an Edict, that the senate and people of Roms should be divided into two parts : and that those on whom the Lot should fall, should abide still in ROME, and the other should go dwell in the new won City of VEIES. These were the reasons to perswade this: that both she one and the other fort should be richer then they were before, and should more easily keep their Lands and Goods from the invalion of their enemies, by means of these two great Cities. The people which were multipled now into great numbers, and had served dutifully and dangerously, thought it the best way in the world re Eberefore they, still cried out, and thronged with great tumult, about their Pulpir for Orations, praying that this Law might be put unto the voices of the people. But the whole Senate, and wheth Crizens among them, judging this motion of the Tribunes would be the destruction, and not the division of the City of ROME, could in no wife abide it should go any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus help: who fearing to bring it to the point, whether the Law should pass or no, did always seek new occasions and lets, still to delay and put off the matter, and stay the confirmation of this Law. For these caules, he was based of the common people. But the originall and apparent cause of the peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the terms. part of their spoils: and it was not altogether without some reason, and to say truly the people did him much wrong to bear him such malice for that. For before he went to the City of VBIBS, he made a folemn vow to offer the tenth part unto the gods, of the spoils of the City, if the wan the same. But when it was taken and facked, whether it was that he was loath to trouble the Citizens, or having a world of butinels in his head, that he easily forgot his vow, he suffered the Souldiers to divide the fooil amongst them, and to take the benefit to themselves. Shortly after he was discharged of his charge, he did enform the Senate of his vow. Furthermore, the Soothfayers made report at that very time, how they knew by certain figns and tokens of their Sacrifices, that the gods were offended for fomewhat, and how they must of necessity be pacified again. Whereupon the Senate presently made an Order, where it was unpossible every man should bring in again the self fame things he had gotten, to make a new division of every mans share : that every one therefore upon his Oath should prefent the renth part of his gains he had gotten by that boory. There was great trouble about it. They were driven to the great extremity to the poor Souldiers (which had travelled fore, and taken great pains in the wars) to make them reftore back such a collop out of their gain, and the rather, because many of them had already spone it every peny; and for this trouble, they all cried out with open mouth against Camillus. But he (not knowing otherwife how to excule himself) was forced to bring forth as cold and as unreasonable an excuse as he could make, which was for looth, that he had forgotten his Vow he had made: The people notwithflanding were eager still against him, saying, how he had vowed then to offer the tenth part of the enemies goods to the gods, and that now he would perform it with the tenths of the Citizens goods. Nevertheless every man having brought that he should for his part, it was thought A cup of gold good they should cause a massie cup of gold to be made to send to the Temple of Apollo at DEL- sent to Delphos PHO S. For after that they had fcaped drowning very narrowly by tempest, when the wind was down again, they fell into another danger which they escaped also beyond all hope. For hard by the Isles of Eozus, the galleys of the LIPARIANS fellupon them, as if they had been rovers. But when the LIPARIANS faw they made no resistance, and entreated them, holding up their hands, they gave no surther charge upon them, but onely sastened their galley unto theirs. So when they had haled them to the shore, they declared they were Pyrats, and offered to make port-fale of the men and goods, as if they had been a lawfull prize, and had fold them indeed, had not the wifdome and authority of Timefishess letted them, who was Governour at that time of the City, and had great ado to perswade them to let them go. And he did not so leave them, but sent out certain of his own Ships to accompany them in their journey, who did help them to go and perform their offering. For which courtefie of his, the ROMANS afterward did him great honour at ROME, according to his well-deferving. The Tribunes of the people began now to fet on foot against the Law for the dividing of the Inhabitants of ROME unto the City of VEIES. But the wars of the FALISCES fell our happily at that Comittee the time, whereby the Noble men did chuse such Officers as they would. So they chose Camillus, Tri- sen Tribune bunus militaris of the Souldiers, and five others to affift him, the fervice in that cafe requiring a Ge- of the foulneral that carried both authority and reputation among them, as an old experienced Souldier in the wars. When the people had confirmed the Election, Camillus immediately entred the territories Camillus beligof the FALISCES with the ROMANS Army, where he laid fiege unto the City of the FALE- gent the Fa-RIANS, being very well fortified, victualled and stored, with all other munition of war: Know-lerians, ing therefore that it was no small attempt to win this City, and that it would not be done in a short time, he politickly fought (whatfoever came of it) to keep his Countreymen occupied about fome thing, and to stay them for going home, left by repairing to Rome they should have many occasions to rebell, and raise some civill diffention. For the ROMANS did wifely use this remedy to disperfe abroad like good Physicians the humours which troubled the quiet state of their commonweal at home. But the FALERIANS trufting in the fituation of their City, which was very strong in all parts, made fo little account of the Siege, that those which kept not watch upon the walls, walked up and down in their Gowns in the City, without any weapon about them, and their Children went to School, the School-Mafter also would commonly lead them abroad out of the City a walking, to play and pass the time by the Town-walls. For the whole City had one common School-Mafter. Mafter, as the GRECIANS allohave, which do bring up their Children from little ones in company together, because one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This School-master spying his time to do the Falerians a shrewd turn, did accustomably take all his Scholars out of the City with him, to play not far from the walls at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the City again after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroad thus once or twice, he trained them out every day a little further, to make them to be bold, perfiwading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day having gotten all the Citizens children with him, he led them within the watch of the ROMAN'S Camp, and there delivered all his Scholars into their hands, and prayed them they would bring him unto their General. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was School-Mafter unto all these (hildren, ne- camillus worvertheless that he did more effecem to have his grace and favour, then regard his office he had by thy act to the this Name and Title. and men and women ran together one in anothers neck, to the Town-walls, and gates of the City, like people out of their wits, they were fo troubled. When they came thither, they faw their children bringing their School-mafter back again stark naked and bound, whipping of him, and calling Camillus their father, their god, and their Saviour; So that not onely the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the Citizens also in generall, did conceive in themselves a wonderfull The Falifeians admiration and great love, of the wifdom, goodness, and justice of Camillus. So that even prefently they called a Councel, and there it was concluded they should fend Embassadours forthwith unto ROME, where audience being given unto them by the Senate, the Embassadours said, Because the ROMANES preferred justice above victory, they taught them to be better contented to jubmit themselves unto them, then to be their own men at liberty; consessing their vertue did more overcome them then any force or power could do. The Senate dispatched Letters unto Camillus, giving him commission to do and determine as he thought good. So he having taken a certain lum or money of the FALERIANS, did furthermore make peace and league with all the reft of the FAfadours of the Fairfeinn unto LISCES, and thereupon returned back again to ROME: But the Souldiers grudged marvelloully Fatificans unto 213 223, and increasing a control of the City. Camillus not fearing the ill will of the commons, did boldly speak, and do in open presence all he could against it; So that plainly he was the chiefest cause that the people against their wills (entreat what they could) were driven to let it alone : But withall they were fo spightfull against him, that notwithstanding his forrow and misfortune for the death of his Son (dying of a fickness) was great, they would not of malice once take pity or compassion of him. The loss whereof (albeit he was of a very good and courteous nature) was fo grievous, and made him to unquiet, that being accused before the people, he ftirred not once out of his house, but was locked up Lucius Apaleius with the women, which lamented for his Son departed. He that did accuse him was one Lucius Apulcius, burthening him that he had stolen and taken away part of the spoil of the Thus canes; and faid, they had feen certain brafen gates at his house, which had been brought out of Thus CANS. Now the people were fo maliciously bent against him, that every man might fee if they could once take him in a trip, upon any advantage whatforver, they would doubitefs have condemned him. Wherefore calling together his triends and Souldiers that had ferved under him in the wars, or that had taken charge with him , which were many in number : He earneftly befought them that they would not futer him thus vilely to be condemned through false and unjust accurations laid against him, nor to be fo fcorned and defamed by his enemies. His friends having laid their heads together, and confulted thereupon, made him answer, how for his judgement they could not remedy it, but not pervert the if he were condensed, they would all joyn together with a very good will to help to pay his fine. But he being of mind not to bear such an open shame and ignominy, determined in choler to leave the City, and to exile himself from it. And after he had taken his leave of his Wife and Children, bidding them farewell: He went out of his house to the gates of the City, and said never a word; When he came thither he stayed suddenly, and returning back again, he lift up his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers unto the gods, that if it were of very spite and malice, and not of just deferving, that the common people compelled him thus shamefully to for take the City, that the ROMANES might quickly repent them, and in the face of the world might with for him, and have need of him. After being made these prayers against the Crizens (as Achilles did against the GRECIANS) he went his way, and was condenned for his contempt in the Sum of fifteen thousand Affer of the ROMANE coyn, which make of Greekish money, a thousand five history of films. The sum of the ROMANE coyn, which make of the ROMANE coyn, which make of the ROMANE coyn, a thousand five history of films. hundred Drachmas of filver; for an As was a little peece of money, whereof ten of them made a ROMANE peny. Howbeit there was not a Romane of any understanding but believed certainly that fome great punishment would follow them incontinently, and that the wrong and injury they had done him would be quickly required with fome most sharp and terrible revenge, not onely unpleasant to think upon, but further most notable to be spoken of through the world. There sellout fo suddenly upon it such mischief toward the City of Roms, and the present time also brought forth such occasion of danger and destruction thereof, to their shame and infamy; shat it was uncertain whether it happened by chance, or elfe it was the handy-work of fome god that would not fuffer vertue recompensed with ingratitude, to pass unrevenged. Their first token that threatned form great mitchief to light upon them, was the death of Julius, one of the Cenfors; for the ROMANES do greatly reverence the office of a Cenfor, and efteem it as a facred place. The fecond token that happened a little before Camillus exile, was, that one Marcus Cadisius, a man but of mean quality, and none of the Senate (but otherwise a fair-conditioned honest man, and of good conscience) told the Tribuni militares of a thing that was to be well considered of. For he said that the night before as he was going on his way in the New street, he heard one call him aloud, and returning back to fee what it was, he faw no living Creature, but onely heard a voice bigger then a mans, which faid unto him, Marcus Ceditius, go thy way to morrow morning to the Tribuni militares, and bid them look quickly for the GAULS. The Tribunes were merry at the matter, and made but a jeft at his warning, and straight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Now as touching the GAULS, they came (as they fay) of the CELT &, whose Countrey not being able to maintain the multitude of them, they were driven to go feek other Countreys to inhabit in and there were amongst them many thousands of young men of service and good Souldiers, but yet more women and little children by a great number. Of these people some of them went towards the North Sea, passing the mountains RIPHEI, and did dwell in the extream parts of Europe. Other of them remained between the mountains PIRINEI, and the greatest mountains of the Alps , near unto the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they continued a long time, untill they fortuned in the end to tafte of the Wine which was first brought out of Italy unto them. Which drink they found so good, and were so delighted with it, that suddenly they armed themselves, and taking their Wives and Children with them, they went directly towards the Alps, to go feek out the Countrey that brought forth such fruit, judging all other Countreys in respect of that to be but wild and barren. It is faid, that the first man which brought wine unto them, and that did procure them to pass into ITALY was a Nobleman of Thus CAN called Arron, and otherwise of no came the proceill disposed nature; howbeit he was subject to this misfortune following. He was Tutor unto an rer of the Orphan child, the richeft that was at that time in all the Countrey of Thus CAN, and of complex. Gaules coming ion was wonderfull fair : he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought up in Arrons house of a into Italy. child, and though he was grown to mans effate, yet he would not go from him, faining he was well and to his liking. But indeed the cause was that he loved his Mistress (Arrons Wife) whom secretly he had enjoyed a long time, and she him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the end love having to possessed them both, that neither party could withdraw from other, much less conceal it : The young man stole her away from him, and kept her still by force : Arron put them in fuit , but he prevailed not; for Lucuno overweighed him with Friends, money, gifts, and charges. Lack of fuffice But he took it so grievously that he left his Countrey; and having heard talk of the GAULS, he the cause of went unto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALY. So they conquered at their first the dellruction went unto them, and was then guide to oring them and ITALI.

coming all that Countrey which the Thuscans held in old time, beginning at the foot of the of Thuscane by mountains, and stretched out in length from one Sea unto the other, which environeth IT ALY, as the Gaules. the names themselves do witness. For they call yet that Sea which looketh unto the North, the The power of Adriatick Sea; By reason of a City built sometime by the Thus CANS, which was called Adria. The the Thuscanes other which lieth directly over against the South, is called the Thus CANE Sea. All that Countrey in old time. is well planted with Trees, and hath goodly pleasant pastures for beasts and cattel to feed in, and is notably watered with goodly running Rivers. There was also at that time eighteen fair great Cities in that Countrey, all of them very strong and well-seated, as well for to enrich the inhabitants thereof by traffique, as to make them to live delicately for pleasure. All these Cities the GAULS had won, and had expulsed the Thus CANS, but this was done long time before. Now the GAULS being further entred into Thuscan, did befrege the City of Clusium. Thereupon the Clusians Clusium a City feeking aid of the ROMANS, befought them they would fend Letters and Embassadors unto these of Thuscase be barbarous people in their favour. The Brennus King ROMANE Ambassadors did ask them what injury the Clusians had done unto them that they of the Gaules. came to make wars with them. Brennus King of the GAULS hearing this Question, smiled, and answered him thus, The Clusians do us wrong in this, they being but few people together, and not able to occupy much land, do notwithstanding possess much, and will let us have no part with them, that are strangers, and out of our Countrey, and stand in need of seat and habitation. The like wrong was offered unto you ROMANES in old time by those of ALBA, by the FIDENATES. and the ARDEATES; and not long fince by the VEIANS, and the CAPENATES, and partly by the FALISCES and the VOLSCES; against whom we have taken and do take arms at all times: And as oft as they will let you have no part of their goods, ye imprison their persons, rob and fpoil their goods, and destroy their Cities; and in doing this ye do them no wrong at all, but follow the oldest Law that is in the world, which ever leaveth unto the stronger that which the weaker cannot keep and enjoy: beginning with the gods, and ending with bearts, the which have this property in nature, that the bigger and stronger have ever the vantage of the weaker and leffer, Therefore leave your pity to fee the Clusians besieged, lest you teach us Gauls to take compassion also of those you have oppressed. By this answer the ROMANES knew very well there was no way to make peace with King Brennus. Wherefore they entred into the Cuty of Clusium, and encouraged the Inhabitants to fally out with them upon these barbarous people; either because they had a defire to prove the valiantness of the GAULS, or else to shew their own courage and manhood. So the Citizens went out, and skirmished with them hard by the walls, in the which one of the Fabians called Quintus Fabius Ambustus, being excellently well horsed, and putting spurs Fabius Ambuto him, did fet upon a goodly big personage of the Gauls, that had advanced himself far be- stus a Rowane fore all the troop of his companions. answer. The Senate hereupon affembled, and many of the Senatours blamed the rafinels of the Fabians : but most of all the Priests called Faciales. For they followed it very earneftly, as a matter that concerned Religion and the honour of the gods; declaring how the Senate in discharge of all the refidue of the City of the offence committed, should lay the whole weight and burthen of it upon him alone, that onely had done the fact. Numa Pompilius the justest and most peaceable of all the Kings of Rome that had been, was he that first erected the Colledge of these Faciales, and did ordain that they should be the Keepers of peace, and the Judges to hear and allow all the causes for the which they should justly begin any wars. Nevertheless the Senare in the end turned over the ordering of the matter unto the whole will and judgement of the people, before whom thefe Priests Faciales did also accuse Fabius Ambustus. The people made so little account of their propounded Religion, and honour of the gods in that case, that instead of delivering of this Fabius unto the enemy, they did chuse him for one of the Tribunes of the Souldiers with his Brothers. The GAULS understanding this were fo furious and angry thereat, that they would no longer linger march towards their journeys, but march with all speed unto Rome. The people that dwelt by the High-wates where they should pass by, were marvellously afraid to see the multitude of them, and their brave and univerfall furniture; and beginning to doubt the fury of their rage, they imagined first of all that they would destroy all the champion countrey before them, and afterwards would take all the ftrong Cities. They contrariwise did take nothing at all out of the fields, neither did any hurt or displeasure unto any body; but passing by their Cities, cried out they went to ROME, and would have no wars but with the ROMANES, and how otherwife they defired to be friends with all the world. These barbarous people marching on in this wife towards ROME, the Tribunes of the Souldiers brought their Army to the field to encounter them. They were no less in number then the GAULS, for they were 40000 Footmen; howbeit most part of them were raw Souldiers, that had never served in the warsbefore. They were very careless of the gods, and dissolute in matters of Religion: for they passed neither for good signs in their Sacrifices, neither to ask counsel of their Soothsayers, which the ROMANES were religiously wont to do before they gave any battel: To make the matter worfe, the number of the Captains having power and authority alike, did as much (or more then the reft.) diforder and confound their doings. For oft times before in far leffer matters and dangers then there, they did use to chuse special Officers that had sole and soveraign der, and put-teth the Army authority, which they called Distances; knowing very well of how great importance it is in dangerous times to have but one head and General, to command all, and to have supreme authority of justice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliver account of his doings to any. The injury allo which they had too ingratefully done to Camillius, brought great milchief and inconvenience then upon them. For the Captains after him durst no more command the people roughly, but ever after did flatter them much. When their Army was now brought into the Field, they encamped themselves by a little River called Alia, about the eleventh stone from Rome, and not far from the place where the same River falleth into Tyber. Thither came the barbarous Army to them, who overthrew them in battel by their discord and lack of government : For the left point or wing Allie where the Gaule was of their battel was broken off at the first by the Gaules, who charged them so surroundly that the Gauls wan they drave them headlong into the River. The right wing then retiring out of the plain, before the field of the they had any charge given, and having gotten certain hills hard by them, they had little hurt, and most of them saving themselves did recover Rome again. The rest that escaped after the enemies were weary of killing, fled by night unto the City of VEIES, thinking ROME had been loft, and all the City put to the Sword. This overthrow was on the longest day in Summer, the Moon being at the full; and the day before fortuned the great flaughter of the Fabians, of the which were flain dred of a name by the Thuscanes in one day 300 all of a Name. The very day it felf was afterwards called Alfain in one liade, of the name of the little River, by the which the fecond overthrow was given. But for the day. difference of daies , that some of them are naturally unfortunate , or that Heraclism the Philosopher had reason to reprove the Poet Hesiadus, for making some days good, and some days ill, as though he understood they were not all of one nature : we have written and declared our opinion thereof in other places. Yet because the matter delivereth present occasion to speak of the same, peradventure it will not be amils to alledge a few examples of it onely. It fortuned the BOEOTIANS on a time to win two honourable Victories, on the first day of the Moneth they call Hippodromu (and which the ATHENIANS called Hecatombeon) that is now the Moneth of June, by either of the which they did ftill reftore the GRECIANS to their liberty. One was the battel of Leuc-TRES, the other was the battel of GERASTE, which was twenty years before, when they overcame Dattamins, and the THESSALIANS in battel. The PERSIANS contrarily were overcome in battel by the GRECIANS the fixth day of August at the journey of MARATHON. The third day at the battel of PLATEES. And on the felf fame day near unto MYCALA. On the five and twentieth day at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wan the battel by Sea near unto the Ille of Naxos, under the charge and government of Chabrins, about the full of the Moon, in the Moneth of August. And on the twentieth of the same Moneth, they wan the battel of SALAMI-NA , as we have written more amply in our History of difference of daies. The Moneth of April also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the Great overcame the General of the King of Persia, at the field of GRANICA in the faid Moneth. The CARTHA-

CARTHAGINIANS also were vanquished in Cicile by Timoleon, on the seven and twentieth day thereof. On which day also it is thought the (ity of TROY was taken; as Ephorus, Califfrenes, Danaftes, and Phylarchus, have written in their Histories. Now contrariwise the moneth of July which the BOEOTIANS called Panemus, hath not been gracious to the GRECIANS. For on the seventh day of the same they were overthrown by Antipaten at the battel of CRANON, which was their unter defiruction. They had before also lost a battel the fame moneth, near unto the City of Cheronea, by King Philip. On the fame day also, and in the very felf moneth and year, those which came into ITALY with King Archidamus were Asin every one of them, by the barbarous people of the Countrey. The CARTHAGINIANS also fear the 27 day of the same moneth, as the day which had beforetime brought them into many great and forrowfull calamities. Contrarily also I know very well how about the Feast of Mysteries the City of THEBES was destroyed by Alexander, and that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receive a garifon of fouldiers into their City, about the 20 day of August, at which time they made the holy proceilion of the mysteries of lacchus. And on the felf fame day the ROMANS loft their Army, and their General Capio, who was flain by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards under the leading of Lucullus, they overcame King Tigranes, and the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus and Pompey also died both one the felf fame day they were born. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, unto whom after like revolutions of time there happened notable chances of good or ill. But to return again unto our History. The day of this overthrow is one of those which the ROMANS take for one of the unfortunatest daies that ever came unto them. And by reason of that day they reckon two other The Roman daies of every Moneth very unfortunate, engendred through fear and superstition, which spreadeth Superstition in far (as commonly it doth) upon such similter missortunes. But for this matter we have written observing of more largely and exquifitely in the Book we made, of the Ceremonies and cuftoms of the Ro-daies. MANS. Now after this battel loft, if the GAULS had hotly purfued the chafe of their flying enemies, nothing could have faved ROME from being taken, and the Inhabitants thereof from being put unto the Sword; for the ROMANS that fled from the battel brought such a fear upon those that received them, and filled the whole City of ROME with fuch grief and trembling, that they wist not what to do. The barbarous people again beleeving little their victory was so great as it was, fell to make good cheer for to great a joy received, and divided among them the spoil of their enemies goods they found in the Camp. So gave they time and leifure by this means, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to feek them fome place of fafety, and to fuch as remained still they left good hope to fave themselves, and to make some provision for defence. Thereupon they all fortified themselves within Mount Capitoll, and storing it with all kind of victuall, armour, and munition, they wholly did forfake the rest of the City. But the first work they took in band was this .; They did bring into their faid fort , part of their facred reliques : and the professed Vestals brought thither also their holy fire and all other their holy monuments. Some Writers say, that The holy fire. they had nothing else in keeping, but the sempternal fire, and were so consecrated by King Nama, who did first institute, that the fire should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the most motive and quickest substance that is of all naturall things; notwithstanding that generati- The force of on also is a moving, or at the least not done without motion. For we see that all other substance fire. which lacketh heat, remaineth idle and without action, and ftirreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craveth the force and heat of the fire; as the foul it felf recovering heat, beginneth fomewhat to move, and disposeth it self to do and suffer something. Wherefore Numa being (as they say) a man of great learning and understanding, who for his wisdom was reported to talk many times with the Mules, did confecrate the same as a most facred thing, and commanded that they never should suffer that fire to go out, but to keep it, as they would preserve the lively Image of the exernal God, the onely King and maker of the world. Others fay, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and facred things, fignifying a kind and manner of purification; which opinion the GRECIANS hold also, howbeir behind the same fire there were certain hidden things, which in no case any might see but those holy Veltall Nuns, Many also hold an opinion. that the Paladium of TROY (as much to fay as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Lucas into ITALY. Other do report also that Dardanus at that time when he first began to build the City of TROY, brought thither the holy Images of the gods of SAMOTHRACIA, and he did offer them up there; and how Aneas after the City was taken did fteal them away, and kept them untill he came to dwell in ITALY. Some other also that take upon them to know more therein then the common fort do, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and flandeth open, the other is full and fast locked up, howbeit they are not to be feen but by these holy Nuns. Other think also, that these imaginers invented that they spake of their own heads, because the Vestall Nuns did cast all that they could put in at that time und two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the Temple of Quirinus: and therefore that very place carrieth the furname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they carried about them the most precious things they had, and fled along the River, where one Lucius Albinus

(one of the common people) flying allo, and having brought away his Wife and little children, and other houtholdstuffs he had in a Cart, by chance he lighted upon the Vestall Nuns in the way.

But to loon as he perceived these holy Nurs (carrying the bleffed Reliques and Jewels in their

alfo, and willed them to get them up, and fly into some City or Town of GEECE. Thus methought I could not well pass over with filence, Albinus reverence and devotion he shewed unto the gods in fo dangerous a time and pinch of extremity. Furthermore the Priefts of other gods, and the most to using crous a time and purell of Cartonian, and the most forestime, or had past the honour honourablest old men of the City of ROME (that had been Confuls beforetime, or had past the honour of triumph) had not the heart to forfake ROME; but putting on all their most holy robes and vestments, did vow, and as it were willingly facrificed themselves unto the fortune that should befall them for the fafety of their Countrey. And using certain words and Prayers which their high Bishop Fabiwe had raught them, they went even thus apparrelled into the great market-place, and did fit them down there in chairs of Ivory, expeding the goodwill and pleafure of the gods what should become Rome taken by of them. But within three dairs after Brennus came to Rome with his Army, who finding the gates of the City all open, and the Walls without watch, he doubted fome devife in it, and feared fome prison vy ambush had been laid, as one hardly beleeving to have found the ROMANS of so base a mind as to forfake their City: After being informed of the truth, he entred into Rome by the gate Colliha, and took the same little more then 360 years after it was first builded; if it be true at the least that there hath remained any certain Chronicles of those times unto this present day, considering the trouble and confusion of that time bath made many things more certain then that doubtfull unto But so it was, that the rumour ran to GREECE incontinently how Rome was taken, but yet withall somewhat doubtfully and uncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) saith in a certain Book he wrote of the Soul, that there was news come from the West part, that an Army which came from the HYPERBORIANS had taken a City of GREECE called ROME, fituated in that Countrey near the great Sea. But I wonder not that Heraclides (who hath written fo many other fables and lies) did amplifie the true news of the taking of Rome, with adding too of his owndevice, of the HYPERBORIANS, and by the great Sea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the timony of the Philosopher had certain knowledge it was taken by the GALLS; howbeir he faith also, it was recovered again afterwards by one called Lucius; where indeed it was by Marcu Camillus, and not by Lucius. But all this in manner is spoken by conjecture. Moreover Brennus being entred ROME did appoint part of his souldiers to beliege those which were gotten into Mount Capitoll. And he with the relidue of his Army marched on towards the Market-place, where when he faw the ancient Senators fit fo gravely in their chairs, and spake never a word, nor offered once to rise, though they faw their enemies come armed against them, neither changed countenance nor colour at all, but lean-The Majesty and their flaves they had in their hands, feeming to be nothing afraid nor abashed, but looked so the upon another, he marvellously wondred at it. This their so strange manner at the first did so of the old Scnators fet in damp the Gauls, that for a space they stood still, and were in doubt to come near to touch them, the marketfearing left they had been forme gods, untill such time as one of them went boldly unto Marcus Pappfearing left they had been forme gods, untill such time as one of them went boldly unto Marcus Pappfearing, and laid his hand fair and softly upon his long beard: But Pappring, gave him such a rap on the place of Rome. pate with his Staff, that he made the bloud run about his ears. This barbarous beaft was in fuch a rage with the blow, that he drew out his Sword and flew him. The other Souldiers also killed all the rest wall the blow, that it can be continued many daies spoiling and sacking all things they found in the houses, and in the end did set them all one fire, and destroyed them every one, for despight of those that kept the Fort of the Capitoll, and would not yeeld upon their Summons, but valiantly repulfed them when they fealed the walls. For this cause they razed the whole City, and put all to the The City of Sword that came in their hands, young and old, man, woman, and child. Now this flege continuing long, and the ROMANS holding them out very flourly, victuals began to grow feant in the Camp of the Gauls, infomuch as they were driven of force to feek it abroad without the City. Hereupon they divided themselves, whereof some remained still with the King at the Siege of the Capitoll, the Gauls. and the reft went a forraging and spoiling all the Champion Countrey and Villages thereabours, scattered as it were by Bands and Companies, fome here, fomethere, fearing nothing, nor passing upon watch or ward, they lived in fuch fecurity of their victory. Howbeit the greatest company amongst them went by fortune towards the City of ARDEA where Camillus dwelt, living like a private man, medling with no matters of state from the time of his exile untill that present time. But then he began not to bethink himself as a man that was in safety, and might have escaped the hands of his ene-The City of mies, but rather fought to devife and find out all the means he could to fubdue them if occasion Ardea. were so offered. Whereupon considering that the Inhabitants of ARDEA were enough in Camillarwords number to fet upon them, although faint-hearted and cowardly, by reason of the sloth and unto the dridennegligence of their Governours and Captains, who had no manner of experience in the wars : he began to cast out these words among the young men: That they should not think the ROMANS mistortune fell upon them, through the valiantness of the Gauls; nor that their calamity (who had refused good counsel) had happened unto them by any work or act of the GAULS, having done nothing for their part to make them carry away the victory; but that they should think it was no other thing, but Fortune alone that would needs shew her power. Therefore that it were now a notable and honourable enterprise (although somewhat dangerous) to drive these strangers and barbarous people out of their Countrey; confidering that the onely end of their victory was, but to deftroy and confume and fire all that fell into their hands. Wherefore if they would but onely take a good lufty heart and courage unto them, he would with opportunity and space, assure them the victory without any danger. The young men were pleased with these words of life and comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to break the matter also unto the Magistrates and Counsellors, and having drawn them by perswasion unto this emerprise, he armed all that were of age to carry armour, and would not fuffer a man to go out of the City for fear left the enemies (which were not far off) should have intelligence of the same. Now after the Gauts had run over all the Champion Countrey, and were loaden with all forts of spoils, they did encamp themselves negligently in open fields, and never charged watch nor ward; but having their full carriage of wine laid them down to fleep, and made no noise at all in their Camp. Camillus being advertised thereof by his feverall footis, caused the Ande An s with as little noise as might be, forthwith to go out into the fields, and having marched fornewhat roundly the diffance between the City and the Camp of the Gaues, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his Souldiers make great shours and cries, and the Trumpers to be sounded on every side, to put a fear in their enemies, who yet with all the loud noise they made could hardly be made wake, they were so deadly drunk. Yet there were some notwithstanding that for fear to be taken tardy did builtle up at this fudden noise, and coming to themselves sell to their weapons to refist Camillus, which were flain by and by. The rest and the greatest number of them lay here and there scattered in Camillus flew the midft of the field without any weapons dead affeep, flark drunk with wine, and were put to the Gauls the Sword and never ftrake ftroak. Those that fled but of the Camp that night (which were but hard by Ardea few in number) were overthrown also the next day by the Horsemen that followed and killed them as they took them stragling here and there in the Fields. The bruit of this Victory was blown abroad incontinently through all the Towns and Villages thereabouts, which caused many young men to come and joyn themselves to Camillus: but specially the ROMANS desired the tame, that had saved themselves in the City of VEIES, after the Battel lost at ALLIA, who made their mones among themselves there, saying, O gods, what a Captain hath Fortune taken from the City of ROME? What honour hath the City of ARDEA by the valiantness and worthy deeds of Camillus; and in the mean feason his natural City that brought him forth is now lost and utterly deftroyed? We, for lack of a Captain to lead to are flut up here within others walls, and do nothing but fuffer ITALY in the mean space to go to ruine and unter destruction before our eyes. Why then do we not fend to the ARDEANS for our Captain? or why do we not arm our selves to go unto him? For he is now no more a banified man, nor we poor Citizens; fince our City is poffeffed with the forseign power of our hatefull enemies. So they all agreed to this counsel, and sent unto Camillus to befeech him to be their Captain and lead them. But he made answer, he would in no case consent unto it, unless they that were belieged in the Capitol had lawfully first confirmed it by their voices. For those (faid he) so long as they remain within the City, do represent the state and body thereof. Therefore if they commanded him to take this charge upon him, he would most willingly obey them; if otherwise they milited of it, that then he would not meddle against their good wills and commandment. They having received this answer, there was not a ROMAN against them but greatly honoured and extolled the wildom and justice of Camillus. But now they knew not how to make them privy unto it that were belieged in the Capitol; for they faw no possibility to convey a meffenger to them; confidering the enemies were Lords of the City, and laid fiege to it. Howbe- Pontius Comiit there was one Pontin Cominium among the young men (a man of a mean house, but yet desirous nine got up in-of honour and glory) that offered himself very willingly to venture to get in if he could. So he took to the Capitol no Lerrors to carry to them that were belieged, for fear left they might be intercepted, and fo they should discover Camillus intention; but parting on an ill favoured gown upon him, he conveyed certain pieces of cork under it, and travelling at noon-daies kept on his way without fear untill he came to Rown, bringing dark night with him. And because he could not pals by the Bridge, for that the barbarous people kept watch upon it, he wrapped fuch clothes as he had about his neck (which were not many nor heavy) and took the River, and fwimming with these corks he had brought, at the length he gor over to the other fide where the City flood. Then taking up those lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not, feeing fire, and hearing noife in other places, he went into the gate Carmental, where he found more filence then in other places, on the which fide also the hill of the (apitol was more steep and uptight, by reason of the great rocks that were hard to climb up upon. But he digged and crept up to long amongst them, that he got up with great pain unto the wall of the fortress, on the which fide also the enemy kept no watch, and faluting the Watch of the Capitol, he told them what he was. So they plucked him up unto them, and brought him to the Magistrates that ruled them, who caused the Senate to affemble presently, to whom he told the news of Camillan Victory, which they had not heard of before; and therewith also he did declare unto them the determination of the Roman Souldiers that were abroad, which was to make Camillus their Caprain and General, and did perfwade them also to grant him the charge, for that he was the onely man abroad whom the Citizens gave their confents to obey. When they heard this, all that were within the Capitol, confulred thereupon amongst themselves, and so did chuse Camillus Distator, and returned the Mellenger Poneiss Commission back again the felf fame way he came unto them. His fortune in re- Camillas choturning back was like unto his coming thither, for the enemies never faw him. And so he brought re- sen Diffator port to them that were abroad, of the Senates decree and confent, whereof they were all marvellous the fecond glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of general upon him, and found there were twenty thoufand good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further aid also of their allies and confederates, and prepared daily to go and fet upon the enemies. So was Camillus chosen now Diffusor the second time, and went into the City of VETES where he spake with the ROMAN Souldiers that were there, and levied a great number of the allies belides, to go fight with the enumber as floor as the could. But whileft Camilline was thus a preparing, certain of the barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chance on that fide of the Capitol where Pontius Cominius had gotten up the night before; fpied in divers places the prints of his feet and hands, as he had griped and gotten hold, ftill digging to get up, and faw the weeds and herbs also growing upon the rocks, and the earth in like manner that troden down. Whereupon they went prefently unto the King to let him understand the same, who forthwith came to view the place. And having confidered it well, he did nothing at that time; but when dark night was come, he called a company of the lightest Gauls together, and that used most to dig in mountains, and said unto them : Our enemies themselves do shew us the way how to take them, which we could not have found out but by themselves. For they having gone up before us, do give us easily to understand it is no impossible thing for us to climb up also. Wherefore we were utterly shamed, having already begun well, if we should fail also to end well, and to leave this place as invincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to climb up to the height thereof, much lets is it hard for many to get up one after another, fo that one do help another. Therefore Sirs I affure you, those that do take pains to get up, shall be honourably rewarded, according to their just defert. When the King had spoken these words unto the GAULS, they fell to it luftily every man to get up, and about midnight they began many of them to dig, and make steps up to the rock one after another, as foftly as could possibly, with catching hold the best they could, by the hanging of the rock, which they found very fleep, but nevertheless easier to climb then they took it at the beginning. So that the formost of them being come to the top of the rock, were now ready to take the wall, and to fet upon the Watch that flept; For there was neither man nor dog that heard them. It chanced then there were holy geefe kept in the Temple of Juno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: But Victuals being very straight and scant at that time even to find the men, the poor geele were to hard handled and to little regarded, that they were in manner flarved for lack of meat. This Fowl indeed naturally is very quick of hearing, and so is the also very fearfull by nature, and being in manner famished with their hard allowance they were so much the more waking and easier to be assaud. Upon this occasion therefore they heard the coming of the GAULS, and also began to run up and down and cry for fear; with which noise they did wake those that were within the Castle. The GAULS being bewrated by these soolish geese, lest their stealing upon The holy geele them, and came in with all the open noise and terrour they could. The ROMANS hearing this Alarm, every man took fuch weapon as came first to his hand, and they ran suddenly to refeue that place from whence they understood the noise, amongst those the foremost man of all was Marcus faved the Ca-Marcus Maniliss a man that had been Conful, who had a lufty body, and as front an heart. His hap being as repulfed the to meet with two of the GAULS together, as one of them was lifting up his Ax to knock him on the head, he prevented him, and firake off his hand with his Sword, and clapt his Target on the others face to fiercely, that he threw him backward down the Rock; And coming afterwards unto the wall the Capitol. with others that ran thither with him, he repulsed the rest of the GAULS that were gotten up, who were not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMANS having escaped this danger, the next morning they threw the Captain down the rocks from the castle, who had charge of the watch the night before, and gave Manlius in recompence of the good service he had done, a more honourable then profitable reward, which was this, Every man of them gave him half a pound of the Countrey wheat, which they call Far, and the fourth part of the measure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile; and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of every man by the day. After this repulse, the GAULS began to be discouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them , and durft no more forage abroad in the fields for fear of Camillus, and partly vexed with the also for that the plague came amongst them, being lodged amongst heaps of dead bodies, lying in plague at Rome every place above ground without burial, and amongst burnt houses destroyed, where the ashes been every place above ground without burial, and amongst burnt houses destroyed, where the ashes been every place above ground without burial. ing blown very high by the wind and vehemency of heat, did give a dry piercing air, that did marvelloully poyfon their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greatest cause of all their milchief was, the change of their wonted diet. Who coming out of a fresh Countrey, where there were excellent pleasant places to retire unto, to avoid the discommodity of the parching heat of the Summer, were now in a naughty plain Countrey for them to remain in, in the latter feason of the year. All these things together did heap diseases upon them, besides the long continuance of the fiege about the Capitol (for it was then about the feventh moneth) by reason whereof there grew a marvellous death in their Camp, through the great numbers of them that died daily and lay unburied. But notwithstanding all the death and trouble of the GAULS, the poor belieged ROMANS were nothing hopen the more, the famine did still grow so fast upon them. And because they could hear nothing of Camillus, they were grown almost unto a despair, and send unto him they could not, the GAULS kept so straight watch upon them in the

to cast out words of peace amongst themselves, and afterwards by consent of the heads, Sulpitius Tribune of the Souldiers came to parly with Brennus. In which parly it was articled, that the ROMANS should pay a thousand pound weight of gold, and that the GAULS should inconti-nently after the receipt of the same, depart out of their City and all their territories. This Decree being passed by Oath from both, the gold was brought. And when it came to be weighed, the GAULS at the first privily began to deal fallly with them; but afterwards they openly stayed the ballance, and would not let them weigh no more, whereat the ROMAN'S began to be angry with them. Then Brennus in fcorn and mockery to despight them more, plackt off his sword,

The Romans went about to red ecm their liberty of the Gauls with girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the gold was weighed. Sulpitim feeing that, asked him what he meant by it. Brennus answered him: What can it significelse, but forrow to the vanquished? This wordever after ran as a common Proverb in the Peoples mouthes. Some of the ROMANS took this vile part of theirs in such scorn, that they would needs take the gold from them again by force, and foreturn into their hold, to abide the fiege ftill, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrary, and thought it best with patience to put up this scorn of theirs. and not to think it was a shame to pay more than they had promised ; but onely to pay it by compulfion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to think it rather necessary, than honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, as well amongst themselves, as with the GAULS, Camillus C came to Rome Gates with his Army, and understanding all what had passed between them, he to Rome with commanded the rest of the Army to march fair and softly after him in good order, and he in the his Army. mean season with the best choice men he had, went before with all speed. As soon as the other ROMANS within the City had spied him, they shouted out for joy, and received him every one with great reverence, without any more words, as their Soveraign Captain and Prince, who had power over them all. And Camillus taking the Gold out of the Scales, gave it unto his men, and commanded the Gauls presently to take up the Scales, and to get them going: For, faith he, it is not the ROMANS manner to keep their Countrey with Gold, but with the Sword. Then Brennys began to be hot, and told him, it was not honourably done of him, to break the accord that had passed between them before by oath. Whereupon Camillus stoutly answered him again, that ac- Camillus specacord was of no validity: for he being created Dittator before, all other Officers and Magistrates what- keth floutly to foever, and their acts, by his election were made of no authority. And feeing therefore they had Brennut King dealt with men that had no power of themselves to accord to any matter, they were to speak to him, if they required ought: for he alone had absolute authority to pardon them if they repented, and would ask it : or else to punish them, and make their bodies answer the damages and loss his Countrey had by them fustained. These words made Brennus mad as a March Hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their Swords of all fides, and laid luftily one at another as they could, within the houses, and in open streets, where they could but no Battle in order. But Brennus suddenly remembring himself, that it was no even match for him, retired with his men about him into his Camp, before he had loft many of his People. The next night following he departed out of ROME with all his Army, and went to encamp himself about threescore furlongs from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the City of the GABIANS. Camillus with his whole Army well appointed, went after him immediately, and shewed at his Camp by the break of day. The ROMANS having taken heart again unto them, did luftily give them battle : the fame continued long, very cruel and doubtfull, untill the GAULS at the length were overthrown, and their Camp taken Camillus overwith great flaughter. As for those that did escape the fury of the Battle, they were killed, some by throweth the the ROMANS felves, who hotly followed the chafe after the Battle broken: the refidue of them, Army of the and the greatest part, were slain by those of the Cities and Villages near about that did for m. Gails, and the greatest part, were slain by those of the Cities and Villages near abouts, that did fet upon them as they fled scatteringly here and there in the Fields. And thus was the City of Rome strangely again recovered that was before strangely won and lost, after it had continued seven Rome was semoneths in the hands of the barbarous People. For they entred Rome about the fifteenth day of ven moneths July: and they were driven out again about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camil- in the hands of has triumphed as befeemed him, and as one that had faved and delivered his Countrey out of the the Gaste, hands of their Enemies, and for ROME again as liberty. Those that had been abroad all the in Comillat tihands of their Enemies, and fet ROME again at liberty. Those that had been abroad all the time umphed of the of this Siege, came into ROME again, following his triumphing Chariot: and those that had been Gauls. befieged within the Capitol (looking for no other but to have died by famine) went and presented themselves before him, and each one embraced other, in weeping wife for joy. The Priests and Ministers of the Temples also, presented their holy Jewels, whole and undefaced, which some of them had buried in the ground within the City felf: and other fome had carried away with them, when they fled our of ROME. All these the People did as gladly see, as if the gods themselves had returned home again into their City. After they had facrificed unto the gods, and rendred them most humble thanks, and had purged their City, as they had been taught by men experienced in those matters for satisfaction of the gods, Camillus began again to build up the Temples that were there before, hard by the which he built another new one also to the god Ains Locatius, in that very place where Marcus Caditius heard the voice warn him of the coming of the GAULS. So by Camillus good diligence, and the Priests great pain and travell, the situations of these Temples were with much ado found out again. But when they were to build again all the rest of the City, that was wholly burnt and destroyed to the ground, the People had no mind to it, but ever shrinked back to put any hand to the Work, for that they lacked all things necessary to begin the fame. Furthermore, weighing their late and long furtained trouble and miteries, they were fitter to take their ease and rest, then to begin new labour and toil, to kill their hearts and bodies altogether. For neither were their bodies able to perform it, nor yet their goods to reach to the charge of it. Wherefore disposing their minds to dwell in the City of VEIES, which remained whole, untouched, and furnished of all things to receive them, they delivered to the practing Orators The busine hea-(whose tongues did never cease to speak placentia to the People) trim occasion to set this ded Orators matter abroach. So they gave good eare, and were willing to hear certain feditions words flir the People spoken against Camillus, which were these: That for his private ambition he would deprive to tumult a them of a City well furnished already, and would against their wills compel them to lodge in Bainst Camillary people in ROME, walking out by chance on that fide of the Capitol where Pontius Cominius had gotten up the night before; foied in divers places the prints of his feet and hands, as he had griped and gotten hold, fill digging to get up, and faw the weeds and herbs also growing upon the rocks, and the earth in like manner that troden down. Whereupon they went prefently unto the King to let him understand the same, who forthwith came to view the place. And having considered it well, he did nothing at that time; but when dark night was come, he called a company of the lightest Gaus together, and that used most to dig in mountains, and said unto them : Our enemies themselves do show us the way how to take them, which we could not have found out but by themselves. For they having gone up before us, do give us easily to understand it is no impossible thing for us to climb up also. Wherefore we were utterly shamed, having already begun well, if we should fail also to end well, and to leave this place as invincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to climb up to the height thereof, much less is it hard for many to get up one after another, to that one do help another. Therefore Sirs I affure you, those that do take pains to get up, shall be honourably rewarded, according to their just defert. When the King had spoken these words unto the Gauls, they sell to it lustily every man to get up, and about midnight they began many of them to dig, and make steps up to the rock one after another, as foftly as could possibly, with catching hold the best they could, by the hanging of the rock, which they found very freep, but nevertheless easier to climb then they took it at the beginning. So that the formost of them being come to the top of the rock, were now ready to take the wall, and to fet upon the Watch that slept; For there was neither man nor dog that heard them. It chanced then there were holy geefe kept in the Temple of Juno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full : But Victuals being very straight and feant at that time even to find the men, the poor geefe were so hard handled and so little regarded, that they were in manner starved for lack of meat. This Fowl indeed naturally is very quick of hearing, and fo is the also very fearfull by nature, and being in manner famished with their hard allowance they were so much the more waking and easier to be asraid. Upon this occasion therefore they heard the coming of the GAULS, and also began to run up and down and cry for sear; with which noise they did wake those that were within the Castle. their own Houses, wholly burnt and pulled down. And moreover, that he would make them to racir own riouses, whoshy outing and puncte down, and the People might call him, not onely raise up again the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the People might call him, not onely Captain and Generall of the ROMANS, but the Founder of ROME also, and so drown Romulus Captain and General of the Albana so, on the Founder of Albana and, and to down Abmillist honourable Title thereof. The Senate confidering of this matter, and fearing fome tumult among the People, they would not fuffer Camillus to leave the Dictatorthip before the end of the year, the reope, may would not take that Office above fix Moneths. Then Camillus for his part did much endeavour himself, to comfort and appeale the People, praying them all he could to tarry: and further pointed with his finger unto the graves of their Ancestors, and pur them in mind also of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and fanctified by King Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongst many other tokens drawn out of holy and Divine things, he forgat detection of the bring for example, the head of a man found new and fresh, in making the foundation of the Capitol, as if that place by fatal deftiny had been once chofen to be the head and chief of all Traly. And moreover, that the holy fire of the goddess Vesta (which fince the Wars had been kindled again by the holy Vestal Nuns) would again come to be put out by them, if they did forfake their natural City: befides the great shame and dishonour it would be unto them, to see it inhabited in time to come by unknown ftrangers, or elfe to be left a common field and parture, for Beafts and Cattle to graze in: Such forrowfull examples and griefs, the honeft natural born Citizens, did ever blow into the Peoples ears, as well privately as openly. The People again to the contrary, did make their hearts to yerne for piry, when they laid before their eyes their penury and poverty they furtained: and befought them also not to enforce them to gather and join together again the broken pieces of a spoiled City (as of a Shipwrack that had caft them naked into the Sea, having onely faved bare life and perfons) fince that they had another City near at hand and ready to receive them. So Camillus counfel was, that the Senare should consult upon this matter, and deliver their absolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this Council, he himself brought forth many probable reasons, why they should not leave in any case, the place of their natural birth and Country; and fo did many other Senators in like cafe, favouring that opinion. Laft of all, after these perswasions, he commanded Lucius Lucretius (whose manner was to speak first in fuch Assemblies) that he should stand up and deliver his opinion, and that the rest also in order as they fate, should say their minds. So every man keeping filence, as Lucretius was ready to speak, they rate, mount say used managed by their Council-house, a Captain with his Band that warded that day, who spake aloud to his Ensign-bearer that went formost, to stay, and set down his Ensign day, who space aloud to his enugated that went follows, to may, and let down his enugathere: For, faidhe, here is a very good place for us to dwell in. These words being heard up into the Senate-house, even as they flood all in a doubt and maze what would be the resolution of this matter, Lucretins began to lay, that he most humbly thanked the gods; and allowed of the Captiature, and fo every one of the rest in their order, said as much. Moreover there was a wonderfull change and alteration of mind fuddenly among the common People: for every man did perfwade and encourage his fellow lively to pur his hand to this work. Infomuch as tarrying for no divition or appointing out of ftreets, nor fetting out every man his place he should build in, they fell to work of all hands, every one chusing that place he liked beft, and was most commodious for their Rome is built building, without any other order or divition amongst them. Whereupon, they running to this Building on a head, the ftreets were confused on heaps together, and their houses all built out of order and uniformity. For the report goeth, that the whole City (as well common as private Buildings) was built up new again in a year. But the Surveyors, to whom Camillus had given charge to find out all the holy places where the Temples had been overthrown, as they were about Mount Palatine, they came by chance to the place, where the Chappel of Mars had flood, which the GAULS had wholly burnt and destroyed, as they had done all the reft. They making clean the place, and surveying every corner, did find by chance Romulus Augures crooked fraff hidden under great mount of alhes. This staff is crooked at one of the ends, and they call it Litum, which Southfayers do use to quarter out the Regions of the Element, when they will behold the flying of Birds to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this art, did use this staff: and alter he was taken away from all mens fights, the Priests took it, and kept it as a holy Relick, suffering no creature to lay hands on it. Now when they found this ftaff whole and unbroken, where all things else were confumed and perished by fire, they were in a marvellous joy thereat: for they interpreted this to be a fign of the everlafting continuance of the City of ROME. But before they could make an end of all their building, there grew a new War again upon them. For at one very instant, all the Louis, the Volsces, and the Latins, entred with all their might and main into the Territories of the ROMANS. The THUSCANS also went then and besieged Surrimine the Territories of the ROMANS. UM, that was in league and amity with the ROMANS. The Tribuni militares got them ftraight to the Field with their Army, and encamped about Mount Martian. The LATINS befieged them fo straightly, that their Army stood in great danger to be overthrown, and they were driven to fend to ROME for a new supply. Thereupon the ROMANS did choose Camillus Distator again the mained within their Camp, were burnt to death with fire, untill the ROMANS themselves came to the Latins. quench it, for greediness of their spoil and goods. When all this was done, Camillus lest his Son third time. The occasion of this War is reported two manner of ways: whereof I will declare in the Camp, to keep the prisoners and spoils: and he himself, with the rest of the Army, went the third time, the first, which I do conceive to be but a tale. They say the LATINS sent unto the ROMANS, 10 to invade his Enemies Countrey, where he took the City of Eques. Then after he had overcome Camillus took the Volsces, heled his Army prefently from thence unto the City of Sutrium. For he had not the City of demand some of their free Maidsin marriage: which they did either to make a quarrel of War, or yet heard of their misfortune. Therefore he hasted himself to aid them, because he thought they were yet Aques. elte as desirous indeed to join both the Peoples again by new marriages. The ROMANS were besieged by the Thus CANS. But such was their hard fortune, that they had already yielded up their amazed very much at this, and fore troubled, as not knowing how to answer them, they were so afraid of Wars. For they were yet fcant new fettled at home, and dreaded much left this demand of their City by composition, and saved no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backs.

Daughters, was but a Summons made to give them Hostages, which they finely cloaked under the name of alliance in Marriage. Some fay that there was at that time a Bond-maid called Tutola, or Tutole or Phias some say, Philoris, that went unto the Senate, and counselled them they should send her away soils craft and with some other fair Maid-flaves, dressed up like Gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Se-substity. nate liked very well of this device, and choic fuch a number of Bond-maids as fhe defired to have. and trimming them up in fine Apparel, begawded with Chains of Gold and Jewells, they fent them forth to the LATINS, who were encamped not far from the City. When night was come, the other Maids hid their Enemies Swords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) did climb up to the top of a wild Fig-tree, from which she shewed a burning Torch unto the ROMANS, having made shift to hang somewhat behind her, to keep the light from sight of the Enemies. For this fignal the Senate of Rome had fecretly appointed her to fet up, which was the cause that the iffuing out of the Souldiers, being commanded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being pressed by their Captains, they called one another, and there was a great ado to put them in order of Battle. Thus they went to take their Enemies fleeping, who nothing miftrufting the Rome deliver'd fame, were flain the most part of them within their Camp. This was done on the fifth day of the from Wars by Moneth called then Quintilia, and now is named July: at which time they do yet celebrate a certain Tutola the Feaft in remembrance of that act. For first of all, going out of the City, they call aloud many of Bond-maid. their fellows names which are most common: as Cains, Marcus, and Lucius, shewing thereby how one of them called another after that fort, as they went in great hafte out of the City. Afterwards all the Maid-fervants of the City being trimly apparelled, go playing up and down the Town, plea- The Maids fantly jefting with those they meet: and in the end they make as though they fought together, in Feath, called token that they did help the ROMANS at that time to destroy the LATINS. Then they are fea. None Captail fted, fitting under Bowers made with wild Fig-tree boughs; and this Feaft is called Nona Caprati- ne. na, by reason of the wild Fig-tree (as some think) from the top whereof, the Bond-maid shewed to the ROMANS the burning Torch. For the ROMANS call the wild Fig-tree, Caprificus. Other fay, that all these things are done and spoken in remembrance of the mischance that happened unto Romulus, when he was taken out of their fight, the fame day without the Gates of the City, at which time there arose a sudden mist and dark cloud. Or as some other say, that then was the Eclipse of the Sun: and they hold opinion that the day was named None Capratine, because Capra in the ROMAN Tongue, signifieth a Goat. Romulus vanished out of mens sights, as he was making an Oration unto his People, near unto the place which is called Goat-marsh, as we have mentioned more at large in his life. The second occasion and beginning of this War (according to the opinion of most Writers) was, that Camillus being chosen Distator the third time, and knowing that the Trib. militares with their Army were straightly besieged by the LATINS and VOLSCES, he was enforced to armall the old men, who for very age were priviledged from further service in Wars. And having fetched a great compass about Mount Martian, because he would not be seen of his Enemies, he came to lodge his camp behind them, where he railed fires, to make the ROMANS know that were befieged, that he was come: which as foon as they perceived, they took to them courage again, and determined to fight. But the LATINS and VOLSCES kept within their Camp. and did intrench and fortifie themselves with a Wall of Wood, which they laid across, because they faw they were beset both before and behind: and determined to tarry the relief of a new supply, as well of their own, as of some other aid besides from the Thus CANS: which thing Camillus perceiving, and fearing left they should serve him, as he had already handled them, by compassing of him again behind, he thought it necessary to prevent this. So considering the inclosure and fortification of their Camp was all of Wood, and that every morning commonly, there came a great Camillus Itrawind from the fide of the Mountains, he made provision of a number of fire-brands. And lead-tagem against ing out his Army into the Fields by break of day, he appointed one part of them to give charge the Latins and upon the Enemies on the one fide, with great noise and shouting : and he with the other part determined to raife fire on the contrary fide, from whence the wind should come, looking for opportunity to do the same. When he saw the Sun up, and the wind beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the fide of the hills, and that the skirmish was begun on the other fide: then he gave a fignal unto the Company he led with him, to fet upon the Enemies, and made them throw into the inclosure of their Camp, divers pots and darts with fire, fo that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this inclosure of Wood, and Trees laid overthwart, did raise straight an exceeding great flame in the air, and still got way inwards into the LATINS Camp. Whereupon the LATINS being unprovided of present remedy to quench the slame, and seeing their Camp a fire all about their ears, they gathered themselves together at the first in a very small room. Nevertheless, they were enforced in the end to get them into the Field, and there they found their Enemies ready armed, and in battle ray. So as few of those escaped that came into the Field, and their fellows that re- Camillus flew

So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillon by the way as they were wandring abroad, So being turned out of an tiney man, tiney mere Commission by the way as tiney were waitering abroad, lamenting their milery with their Wives and little young Children: whose milery went to the very heart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, when he saw the Ro-MANS weep for pity also, to see the moan that these unfortunate People made unto him, and that it grieved them heartily to behold their great mischance: he determined with himself not to deter revenge, but prefently to go the felf-fame day before the City of SUTRIUM, imagining that he should find the Thus cans out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good chers, because they had newly taken a wealthy rich City, where they had left never an Enemy in the same to hurt them, neither feared any abroad to come near to affault them. And indeed it fell out rightly as he gueffed. For he had not onely paffed through the Territories of the City, without any intelligence given to the Enemies within the same : but he was come to the very Gares, and had taken the Walls before they heard any thing of his coming, by reason they neither kept Watch nor Ward, but were dispersed abroad in the City, in every house, eating and drinking drunk together. Infomuch as when they knew their Enemies were already within the City, they were fo full fraught with Meat and Wine, that the most of their wits ferved them not fo much as to fly, but rarried until they were flain or taken, like Beafts in the Houles. Thus was the City of Su-TRIUM twice taken in one day. And it chanced that those which had won it, lost it: and those which had loft it, recovered it again by Camillus means; who deferved both the honour and entry of triumph into ROME: the which wan him no lefs good will and glory, than the two first before had done praife, and gotten fame. For even his greatest Enemies that most spited and envied his former noble acts, afterbing them rather to Fortune that favoured him, than to his valiantness or wor-Sutrium. thinefs, were forced now by this deed of his to confess, that his wildom and valiantness deferved praife and commendation to the skies. Sometimes he took the Debtors out of the Creditors hands, and carried them away by force, that for lack of winners the multitude and ability to pay were by rigour of the Law condemned to be Bond-flaves. But by this practice, in short time he got him a marvellous number of such needy followers, and poor men, that the Noble men and honest Citizens were afraid of the infolent parts they played, and of the continual troubles and tumulis they daily stirred up in the Market-place. Therefore suspecting the worst in this common peocase, they did choose Quintus Capitolinus Dictator : who caused the said Manlius immediately to be apprehended, and committed to prison. Whereupon the People began to change their Appapriton by Capitolian rel: which they were never wont to do, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing left fome commotion would rife hereupon, they did fet him at liberty again. He being thus our of prison, was no whit the better, nor wifer thereby, but did still stir up the Commons, titus out of period, was no with the octier, nor which thereby, out that his up the commons, camillas tho more boldly and feditiously than before. Then was Camillas thosen again Tribunum militaria, fen again Tribunum and Manlium was accused in his time of Office. But when the matter came to pleading, the fight basas militaris of the Capitol troubled his Accusers much. For the very place it self where Manisus had repul-of the Gaules by night, and defended the Capitol, was easily feen from the Market-place, where the matter was a hearing; and he himself pointing with his hand, shewed the place unto the gods, and weeping tenderly, he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fight for their falety. This did move the Judges hearts to pity, fo as they knew not what to do, but many times they did put over the hearing of his cafe unto another day, and neither would they give judgement, knowing be was convicted by manifest proofs: neither could they use the feverity of the Law upon him, because the place of his so notable good service was ever still before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cause of delay of Justice, did make the place of Judgement to be removed without the City, into a place called the Wood Petelian, from whence they could not fee the Capitol. And there the Accufers gave apparent evidence againft him; and the Judges confidering all his wicked practifes, conceived a just cause to punish him, as he had deferved. So they gave tentence of death against him: that he should be carried to the Mount-Capitol, Marcus Manii and there to be thrown down headlong the Rocks thereof. Thus, one and the felf-place was a memory both of his notable good fervice, and also of his miserable and unfortunate end. Besides all this, they razed his house, and built in the same place a Temple to the goddess they call Msneta: and made a Law also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the put to death. Mount-Capitol. Camillus after this, being called again to take the Office of Tribunus militaru the fixih time, he thought to excuse himself, as well for that he saw he was well stept in years, as allo for that he feared Fortunes spight, or some mishap after he had obtained such glory for his noble acts and fervice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sickness, which troubled him much at that time. But the People would allow no excuse by any means, but cryed out, they did not desire he should fight on Foot nor on Horseback, but that he should onely give Counted and command: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to lead the Army with one of his companions named Lucius Frurius, against their Enemies the PRENESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who joyning together, did invade the Confines of the ROMANS friends. So he ld his part to draw the Wars out in length, that he might fight afterwards (if need required) when he had recovered strength. But Frurius contrarily covering glory, was wholly bent to hazard the Battle, what foever peril came of it: and to this end he stirred up and encouraged the Captains of every private Band. Wherefore Camillus fearing left they should think, for ill will he bare the young men. that he went about to hinder and take away the mean to win their honour, and to do some noble act: fuffered Fruting against his will to put his men in order of battle, and he in the mean season by reafon of his fickhefs, remained with a few about him in the Camp. So went Lucius upon a head Lucius Erurius to present battle to the Enemy, and so was he as headily also overthrown. But Camillus hearing the gave battle to ROMANS were overthrown, fick as he was upon his bed, got up, and taking his houlhold Servants the Praneftines with him, he went in hafte to the Gates of the Camp, and passed through those that fled, untill he and Vollces, came to meet with the Enemies that had them in chase. The ROMANS seeing this that were already thrown. entred into the Camp, they followed him at the heels forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they saw him, they gathered together, and put themselves again in array before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their Captain. So their Enemies hereupon stayed their chasing, and would purfue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his Army into the Camillus wan field, gave them battle, and wan the field of them by plain force : and following the victory hard, the field of the he entred amongst them that fled into their Camp pelmell, or hand over head, and slew the most Pranefines part of them even there, After this Victory, he was advertised how the Thuscans had taken the City of Sutrium, and had put to the sword all the Inhabitants of the same, which were Ro-MAN Citizens. Whereupon he fent to Rome the greatest part of his Army, and keeping with him the highest and lustiest men, went and gave affault unto the Thuscans, that now were harboured in the City of Surrium. Which when he had won again, he flew part of them, and the Camillus flew other faved themselves by flight. News being brought tinto the Senate that the Thus culanians were revolted, they fent Camillar tent millar thinter again, willing him of five other companions to take out one he liked beft, every of again against the which defired to be chosen, and made their sute unto him for the same. But he resusing all other, the Thuseuladid choose again Lucius Frurius beyond all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needs miant. would against his will hazard battle, in which he was overthrown. Howbeit Camillus, having a defire (as I think) to hide his fault and shame he had received, did of courtesie prefer him before all other: Now the Thusculanians hearing of Camillus coming against them, subtilly the craft of fought to colour the fault they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of the Thusculaist. people into the fields, some to plough, other to keep the beafts, as if they had been in best peace : and niant. did set the Gates of the City wide open, sent their Children openly to School, their Artisicers wrought their Occupations in their Shops, the men of haviour and honest Citizens walked in the Market-place in their long Gowns, and the Officers and Governors of the City went up and down to every house, commanding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMANS, as if they had stood in no fear at all, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit all these fine fetches could not make Camillus believe, but that they had intent to rebell against the ROMANS: yet they made Camillus pity them, seeing they repented them of that they had determined to do. So he commanded them to go to Rome to the Senate, to crave pardon for their fault : and he himself did help them, not onely to purge their City of any intent of Rebellion, but also to get them the Priviledge and Freedom of ROME. And these be the chiefest acts Camillus did in the fixth time of his Tribuneship. After this, one Licinius Stolo moved great fedition in the City, between the common People and the Great fedition Senate. For he would in any cafe that of the two Confuls, which were chosen yearly, the one of mored in Rome them should be a Commoner, and not that both of them should be of the ancient Noble Families, by Licinius called Patricians. The Tribunes of the People were chosen, but the Election of the Consuls, the Stolo. People stayed: fo that the Commonwealth went to decay, and declined to greater troubles, than ever it did before, for lack of Government. But to suppress this, the Senate created Camillus the Camillus creafourth time Dictator: but this was fore against his will, because it milliked the People much. Fur- ted Dictator thermore, he would not complain of the People, for that they having ferved him in many Wars and the fourth time Battles, might boldly and truly fay unto him: that he had done more notable acts by them in the Wars, than he had done by the Patricians in Peace. Yet was he created Distator in despight, to rule the People, and of envy in the Noblemen towards them. Thus necessity did urge him, either by force to suppress the People, if he were the stronger in this diffention: or else that he himself should be suppressed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithstanding, preparing to prevent this mischief, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to prefer the passing of their Law by voices of the People: he gave warning by Proclamation fet upon posts, that the same very day he would muster the People: and all was but to draw them from the Market-place into the field of Mars, and did fet great penalties upon those that should be lacking at the Musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the People on the contrary part, did withftand his threats, and sware they very in for min, being now an ore main, and one that have cone to many great and notable acts, or effe for that he thought himself not strong enough to withstand the force of the People : he kept his house that day, feigning himself to be lick, and certain other days following, and in the end he gave up his Office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dillator, who named the same Licinius Stolo General of the Horlemen, that was the Authour and furtherer of all this fedition: and besides did suffer him to preser another Law, and to pass it by voices of the People, that above all other Laws, did most trouble the Pariscians. Which Law did forbid any Citizen of Rome, to have, or occupy above five hundred jugera, which amount to 330 acres and a half, 12 pole, and liave, or occupy above the minimized profession aloft, and of great estimation at that time : for that he had in despight of the Senate established this Law. Howbeit shortly after it was found out, that himself had more number of Acres than his own Law permitted: by reason whereof, he received the juft punishment of his own devised forfeiture. Yet the most weighty matter of all this diffention that began first, and most of all troubled the Senate, touching the election of the Consuls, remained fill undetermined. But while these matters were thus in talk, the ROMANS had certain intelligence, how the Gauls were departed once again from the Adriatick Sea, and were coming with a great power straight unto ROME: upon report of which news, the Wars followed immediately. For the Gauls destroyed the champion Countrey as they went : and the poor Countrely. trey-men that could not recover ROME, were feattered here and there amongst the Mountains. The fear of this did somewhat appease the diffention. The People then affembling with the Senate, and the bafer fort with the Noble, did all with one voice and affent choose Camilla Distator the fifth the pater fortwhill the 1400K, and all wall one force and anothe common Distance like fifth ing the necessity and present danger, without framing any excuse, or flarting as he had before, he undertook the charge. Now that he had taken it upon him, he presently levied men, and prepared appointed his Service with his Army. And knowing very well how the flerceness of these barbarous Gaues consisted in down-soulders with Souldiers with the Almy amour and right blows with their Swords, with which they would firike off heads and shoulders of men at a blow, mangling them like Butchers, without any art or skill of fight: he caused iron Sallets, and Morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothly wrought on the outside as could be, that their Swords lighting on them, should either slide off, or break. Moreover, he caused their Shields to have bars made about them of copper, because the wood felf was not able to abide their blows. Furthermore, he did teach his Souldiers to carry long Javelins or Punchion-flaves, wherewith they might wound their Enenties lifting up their Swords to strike them. Now when the GAULS were come near ROME, having pitched their Camp upon the River of Anian, and being full laden and stuffed with all kinds of ying procession and population of the field, and went to lodge on a little fpoil and booties; then Camillus brought his Army also into the Field, and went to lodge on a little hill which was easie to get upon, where there were many little caves, so that the most of his Army was all hidden and covered, and those that were seen, seemed to be retired thither into those high places for an advantage, and of fear. Camillus to encrease this opinion more in his Enemies, and to make them the bolder, did suffer them to come and spoil even to the foot of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept himself quiet in his Camp and well fortified : untill such time as he spied occasion of advantage, that the best part of their Army were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the Fields: and those which remained in their Camp, fell to eating and drinking as they used carelesly at all hours. Then Camillus sent very early before day, his lightest armed men, to vex and trouble the barbarous People in coming out of their Camp, and to let them in any case from putting their men in order of battle: and he in the break of day came down into the Plain, and did fet his other men being well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and lufty fellows, and were not as the barbarous People thought, few, and fearfull. This at the very first discouraged the hearts of the Gauls marvelloully, because they thought themselves dishonoured, that the ROMANS should charge them first. Afterwards also Camillus Vaunt-guard did fer upon the GAULS, and that on a sudden, before they had leifure to put themselves in battle, or to order their Troops: compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chance. In the end also, Camillus came upon the necks of them, with all his whole force and Army together: against whom they ran notwithstanding, holding up their naked Swords aloft in their hands. But the ROMANS thrusting with their armed Javelins, received their Enemies blows upon them, and thereby fo rebated the edges of their Swords (their blades being very (harp and thin ground, and of so soft a temper) that they bowed again, and stood crooked unreasonably: and furthermore, having pierced their Shields thorow with their punchingstaves, the GAULS arms were so cloud and wearied with them, the ROMANS plucking them back to them again, that they threw away their Swords and Shields, and flying in, closed with the ROMANS and caught hold of their Javelins, thinking by plain force to have wrested them out of their hands. Howbeit they perceiving then the Gauls were naked, fell straight to their Swords: and so was the slaughter of their first ranks very great. The other fled (catteringly here and there, all about the Plain : because Camillus had caused all the Hills and Mountains about them to be occupied and possessed. Neither did they retire towards their Camp, for that it was unfortified, and also knew well enough it would be eafilly taken. This battle (as they fay) was thirteen years after their taking of ROME before. But after that Field, the ROMANS courages were good enough against these barbarous GAULS, whom they stood in fear of before: thinking the first time they came, that they had not overcome them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongst them, or through some other strange chance. For they did so how they excupted Priests fear them at that time, that they made a Law, that their Priests should be exempted from Wars, so it empted Pricits

the taking of the City of VELITRES, was an accident depending upon this Journey: because they yielded straight unto him, without striking any stroke. But the seditionsness of the People of ROME about Government, and the chusing of the year Confuls, was the hardest matter he ever had in hand. For they returning home to ROME strong and of great power, by their late obtained victory, would in any case have one of the Confils to be chosen of a Commoner, which was directly against their ancient custom. But the Senate stoutly withstood it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office : hoping the better by means of his authority, which was great then, that they should maintain and continue their ancient Dignity, and Prerogative of their Nobility. But as Camillus was fet in his chair in the Market-place, where he heard and dispatched causes, there came a Serjeant to him, sent from the Tribunes of the People, who commanded him to follow him, and therewithall laid violent hands upon him, as he would have carried him away by force. Notwithftanding, he would not refign up his Office, but taking those Senatorshe had about him, he went unto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept; and there, before he would go into it, he returned back again unto the Capitol, and made his Prayer unto the gods, that it would please them to bring his troubles again to a quiet, and so made a solemn vow and promise (if these tumults and troubles might be pacified) that he would build a Temple of Concord. § 1 9.

ESAR feeing in ROME one day certain rich and wealthy ftrangers, having little Dogs and Monkies in their arms, and that they made marvellous much of them, he asked them if the Women in their Countrey had no Children: wifely reproving them by this question, for that they bestowed their natural love and affection upon brute Beafts, which they should with all kindness and love bestow upon men. Nature in like case also, having planted in our minds a natural desire to learn and understand, we are in reason to reprove those that vainly abuse this good desire, fondly disposing it to learn things vain and unprofitable : and to cast behind them in the mean feafon things honeft and necessary to be learned. For as touching our outward sense, which with passion receiveth impression of the thing it seeth, peradventure it will be necessary to consider indifferently the thing feen, whether it will fall our beneficial or hurtfull unto him: but to fareth it not with our understanding, for every man may at his pleasure turn and dispose that to the thing he taketh delight in, the reason whereof we must always imploy to the best part, and that not only to consider and look upon the thing, but also to reap the benefit and commodity of the thing we see. For like as Wit always to be imployed to the eye is most delighted with the lightest and freshest colours; even so we must give our minds unto thole fights, which by looking upon them do draw profit and pleasure unto us. For such effects doth vertue bring: that either to hear or read them, they do print in our hearts an earnest love and defire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we esteem, neither are we always disposed to desire to do the things we see well done: but contrarily oftentimes, when we like the Work, we mislike the Workman, as commonly in making these persumes and purple colours. For both the one and the other do please us well: but yet we take Perfumers and Dyers to be men of mean Occupation. Thereforce Antifibenes answered one very wifely, that told him Ismenias was an excellent player of the Flute. But yet he is a naughty man, faid he: otherwise he could not be so cunning at the Flute as he is. Even fo did Philip King of Macedon faytohis Son Alexander the Great on a time: that at a certain Feaft had fung passing sweetly, and like a Master of Musick: Art thou not ashamed Son to fing fo well? It is enough for a King to bestow his leisure sometime to hear Mustitians sing, and he doth much honour to the Muses to hear the Masters of the Science otherwhile, when one of them fingeth to excel another. But he that perfonally thall bestow his time, exercising any mean Science: bringeth his pains he hath taken in matters unprofitable, a witness against himself, to prove that he hath been negligent to learn things honest and profitable. And there was never any young Gentleman nobly born, that feeing the Image of Japiter (which is in the City of P15A) defired to become Phidias: not Polycletus, for feeing of Juno in the City of ARGOS: nor that defired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archibeen, for that they took pleasure sometime to read their works. For it followeth not of necessity, that though the Work delight, the Workman must needs be praised. So in like case, such things do not profit those which behold them, because they do not move affection in the hearts of the beholders to follow them, neither do ftir up affection to refemble them. and much less to conform our selves unto them. But vertue hath this singular property in all her actions: that she maketh the man that knoweth her, to affect her so, that straight he liketh all her doings, and The power of desireth to follow those that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we onely desire to have them in possession on ; but of Vertue, we chiefly love the deeds. Wherefore we are contented to have Goods from other men : but good deeds we would other should have from us. For vertue is of this power, that she allureth a mans mind prefently to use her, that wifely considereth of her, and maketh him very desirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the onely understanding and knowledge of vertuous deeds, which suddenly bringeth unto him a resolute desire to do the like. And this is the reason, why me thought I should continue still to write on the Lives of Noble men, and why I made also this tenth Book : in the which are contained the Lives of Pericles and Fabius Maximus, who maintained Wars against Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many fundry vertues, and specially in courtesie and justice : and for that they could patiently bear the Follies of their People, and companions that were in charge of Government with them, they were marvellous profitable Members for their Countrey. But if we have forted them well together, comparing the one with the other : you shall easily judg that read our Writings of their Lives. Pericles was of the Tribe of the Acamantides, of the Town of CHOLARGUS, and one of the best and Pericles Stock. most ancient Families of the City of ATHENS, both by his Father and Mother. For Xantippus his Father (who overcame in battle the Lieutenants of the King of Persia in the journey of MyGALA) married Agarifie that came of Clifthenes, he who drave out of ATHENS Pyliftratus off-fpring, and valiantly overthrew their tyranny. Afterwards he established Laws, and ordained a very grave form of Government, to maintain his Citizens in peaceand concord together. This Agarifie dreamed one Pericles monight that she was brought to bed of a Lion: and very shortly after she was delivered of Pericles, who there dream. was so well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, saving that his Pericles had a head was somewhat too long and out of proportion to the rest of his body. And this is the onely cause long head, why all the Statues and Images of him almost, are made with a Helmet on his head: because the workmen as it should feem (and so it is most likely) were willing to hide the blemish of his deformity. But the ATTICAN Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to fay, as headed like an Onion. For those of ATTICA do sometime name that which is called in the Vulgar Tongue Scilla, that is to say, an Onion of Barbary, Schinos. And Cratinus the Comical Poet in his Comedy he intituled Chirones. faid:

Old Saturn he, and dreadfull dire Debate, Begotten have, between them carnally, This Tyrant here, this heavy jolting pate, In court of gods fo termed worthily.

And again also in that which he termeth Nemefis, speaking of him, he faith: Come Jupiter, come Jupiter, Come jolt-bead, and come In-keeper.

And Telecides mocking him also, saith in a place : Sometimes he stands amaz'd when he perceives, That hard it were sufficiently to know, In what estate his Government he leaves. And then will be be feldom feen below. Such heavy heaps wishin his brains do grow. But yet sometimes out of that monstrous pate, He thundreth fast, and threatneth every state.

And Eupolis in a Comedy which he intituled Demi: being very inquifitive, and asking particularly of every one of the Orators (whom he feigned were returned out of Hell) when they named Pericles the last man unto him, he said :

Truly thou hast now brought unto me here that dwell, The chief of all the Captains that come from dark some hell.

And as for Musick, the most Authors write, that Damon did teach him Musick, of whose name (as Pericles studies men fay) they should pronounce the first syllable short. Howbeit Aristotle faith, that he was taught and Teachers, Musick by Pythoclides. Howsoever it was, it is certain that this Damon was a man of deep understanding, and fubtil in matters of Government : for to hide from the People his fufficiency therein, he gave ir out he was a Mufitian, and did refort unto Pericles as a Mafter Wreftler or Fencer: but he taught him how he should deal in matters of State. Notwithstanding, in the end he could not so cunningly convey this matter, but the People faw his Harping and Musick, was onely a Vizer to his other pra-Cife: wherefore they did banish him ATHENS for five years, as a man that bufily took upon him to change the state of things, and that favoured Tyranny. And this gave the Comical Poets matter to play upon him finely, among which Plate in a Comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him: o Chi-

O Chiron, tell me first: art thou indeed the man, Which did instruct Pericles thus? make answer if thou can. He was sometime also Scholer to the Philosopher Zenon, who was born in the City of Elea, Zenon Elesn. and raught natural Philosophy, as Parmenides did : but his Profession was to thwart and contrary all men, and to alledge a world of objections in his Disputation, which were so intricate, that his adverfary replying against him, knew not how to answer him, nor to conclude his Argument. The which Timon Phliasius witnesseth in these words:

Zenon was subtil fure, and very eloquent, And craftily could wind a man by way of argument, If so he were disposed, his cumning to descry,

Or shew the sharpness of his wit to practise policy. But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was most familiar and conversant with him, and did put in him the majerty and gravity he shewed in all his fayings, and doings, who did far excell the common course of ordinary Orators that pleaded before the People: and to be short, he it was that did fathion his manners, altogether to carry that grave countenance which he did. For they called Anaxagora in his time, Xi, as much to fay, as understanding. Either because they had his singular wit and capacity in such great admiration, being grown to fearth out the cause of naturall things: or that he was the first man, who did ascribe the disposition and government of this World, not unto fortune or fatall necessity, but unto a pure, simple, and understanding mind, which doth separate at the first moving cause, the substance of such like parts as are medled and compounded of divers substances, in all other Bodies through the World. Pericles made marvellous much of Ana-Periete: man-xagoras, who had fully infructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of those specially ners and beha- that work above in the air and firmamient. For he grew not onely to have a great mind and eloners and behaquent tongue, without any affectation, or groß Countrey terms; but to a certain modest counrenance that fearly finited, very fober in his gate, having a kind of found in his voice that he net renance that fearly finited, very fober in his gate, having a kind of found in his voice that he net renance that fearly finited, very fober honeft behaviour, never troubled in his talk for any thing very lotter had been also fearly the second of the that croffed him, and many other fuch like things, as all that faw them in him, and confidered them, could but wonder at him. But for proof hereof, the report goeth, there was a naughty buffe fellow on a time, that a whole day together did nothing but rail upon Pericles in the Market-place, and revile him to his face, with all the villanous words he could use. But Pericles put all up quicily, and gave him not a word again, dispatching in the mean time matters of importance he had in hand, untill night came, that he went foftly home to his house, shewing no alteration nor semblance of trouble at all, though this lewd variet fellow followed him at the heels, with words of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his own doors, being dark night, he commanded one of his men to take a Torch, and to bring this manhone to his houle. Yet the Poet Ion faith, that Pericles was a very proud man, and a stately, and that with his gravity and noble nind, there was mingled a certain foorn and contempt of other : and contrarily, he greatly praifeth the civility, humanity and courtefit of Cimon, because he could fashion himself to all companies. But letting pass that which the Poet Ion said: who would that Vertue should be full of tragical Discipline, bringing in with it, a certain Satyrical Discourse to move laughter. Now Zenon contrariwife did counsell all those that said Perioles gravity was a prelumption, and arrogancy that they should also follow him in his presumption. For to counterfeit in that fort things honest and The benefit of vertuous, doth fecretly with time breed an affection and defire to love them, and afterwards with Natural Phic cuftom even effectually to the and follow them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras company, did not onely profit himself in these things, but he learned besides to put away all superstitious fear of celeftial fights and impressions seen in the air. For to those that are ignorant of the Caufes thereof, such figns are terrible, and to the godly also fearfull, as if they were utterly undone: and all is, because they have no certain knowledge of the reason that Natural Philosophy yieldeth, which instead of a searfull superstition, would bring a true Religion accompanied with affured hope of goodnets. Some fay a man brought Pericles one day from his Farm out of the Countrey, a Rams head that had but one horn, and that the Prognoflicator Lampon confidering this head, that had but one ftrong horn in the midft of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the fignification thereof. That being two Tribes and feveral Factions in the City of one horn, and ATHENS touching Government, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power touching the control of of both should be brought into one, and specially into his part, in whose house this sign did happen. Further, it is faid that Anaxagoras being prefent, did cause the Rams head to be cloven in two pieces, and shewed unto them that stood by, that the brain of this Ram did not fill the pan of his natural place, but inclosed it self in all parts, being narrow like the point of an Egg in that part where the horn took his first root of budding out. So Anaxagoras was marvel louily efterned at that present by all those that stood by but so was Lampon, soon after that Thurydidds was driven away, and that the Government of the whole Commonweal fell into the hands of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the Natural Philosopher and the Prognosticator did rightly meet together in troth: the one directly telling the caule, and the other the end of the event as it fell out. For the profession of the one, is to know how it cometh: and of the other, wherefore it cometh, and to foretell what it betokeneth. For where some say, that to shew the cause, is to take away the fignification of the sign: they do not confider that in feeking to abolish by this reason the wonderfull tokens and figns in the air,

What was fig-

they do take away those also which are done by art. As the noise of basons, the lights of fire by the Sea fide, and the shadows of needles or points of Dials in the Sun : all which things are done by some cause and handiwork, to be a sign and token of something. But this argument peradventure may ferve better in another Book. And now again to Pericles. Whilft he was yet but a young man, the People stood in awe of him, because he somewhat resembled Pysistratus in his coun-People likentenance: and the ancientest men of the City also were much afraid of his soit voice, his eloquent ed to Pysigiratongue, and ready utterance, because in those he was Pysistratus up and down. Moreover he was very rich and wealthy, and of one of the nobleft Families of the City, and those were his Friends also that carried the onely fway and authority in the State: whereupon, fearing left they would banish him with the banishment of Ofracisinon, he would not meddle with Government in any case, although otherwise he shewed himself in Wars very valiant and forward, and seared not to venture his person. But after that Ariftides was dead, that Themistocles was driven away, and that simon being ever in service in the Wars as General in Forraign Countries, was a long time out of GRECE: then he came to lean to the Tribe of the poor People, preferring the multitude of the poor Commonalty, above the small number of Nobility and rich men, the which was directly against his nature. For of himself he was not popular, nor meanly given: but he did it (as it should feem) to avoid suspition, that he should pretend to make himself King. And because he saw Perisles first Cimon was inclined also to take part with the Nobility, and that he was fingularly beloved and liked beginning to of all the honester fort : he to the contrary enclined to the common People, purchasing by this deal in the means fafety to himself, and authority against Cimon. So he presently began a new course of life, wealth. fince he had taken upon him to deal in matters of State : for they never faw him afterwards at any time go into the City, but to the Market-place, or to the Senate-house. He gave up going to all Too much fa-Feafts where he was bidden, and left the entertainment of his friends, their company and familiarity, miliarity bree-So that in all his time wherein he governed the Commonweal, which was a long time, he never deth contempt went out to supper to any of his friends, unless it were that he was once at a Feast at his Nephew Euryptolemus Marriage: and then he tarried there no longer, but while the Ceremony was a doing, when they offer Wine to the gods, and so he rose from the Table. For these friendly meetings at such Feafts, do much abase any counterfeit Majesty or set countenance : and he shall have much ado to keep gravity and reputation, thewing familiarity to every known friend in fuch open places. For in perfect vertue, those things truly are ever most excellent, which be most common: and in good and vertuous men there is nothing more admirable unto strangers, then their daily conversation is to their friends. Pericles now to prevent that the People should not be glutted with seeing him too oft. nor that they should come much to him: they did fee him but at some times, and then he would not talk in every matter, neither came much abroad among them, but referved himfelf (as Critolam faid they kept the SALAMINIAN Galley at ATHENS) for matters of great importance. And in the mean feason, in other matters of small moment, he dealt by means of certain Orators his familiar friends, amongst whom Ephialtes (as they fay) was one: he who took away the Authority and Ephialtes an Power from the Court of Areopagus, and did give too much liberty to the People, as Plato faid. Upon which occasion, as the Comical Poets say, he became so stout and head-strong, that they could no more hold him back, than a young unbridled Colt: and took fuch a courage upon him, that he would obey no more, but invaded the Isle of EUBOBA, and set upon the other Islands. Pericles also because he would fashion a phrase of speech, with a kind of stile altogether agreeable to the manner of life and gravity he had taken upon him: he gave himself to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagoras, shadowing his reasons of Natural Philosophy, with artificial Rhetorick. For having obtained a deep understanding by studying of Philosophy, and a ready way effectually to end any matter heundertook to prove, (besides that Nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacity, as the Divine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to serve his purpose) he did so artificially compass it with Eloquence, that he far passed all the Orators in his time. And for this cause washe (as they fay) furnamed Olympius, as much to fay, as Heavenly or Divine. But some are Why Periodes of opinion he had that furname, by reason of the common Buildings and stately Works he raif was furnamed ed up in the City of ATHENS, that did much fet forth the fame. Other think it was given him Oismpius. for his great Authority and Power he had in Government, as well in Wars as in Peace. But it is no marvel that this giory was given him, confidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the Comedies the Poets cauled to be played in those times (in which there were many words spoken of him, some in earnest, some in sport and jest) do witness that he had that furname given him, chiefly for his Eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundred and lightned in his Orations to the Péople, and that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an Answer Thucydides, Milesius Son, should pleasantly make concerning Thucydides Pethe force of Pericles Eloquence. Thucydides was a Nobleman, and had long time contended ricles advertaagainst Pericus in matters of the Commonweal. Archidamus, King of LACEDEMON, asked ry. Thueydides on a time whether he or Perieles wrestled best. Thueydides made him answer. When I have given him an open fall before the face of the World, he can fo excellently deny it, that he maketh the People believe he had no fall at all, and perfuadeth them the contrary of that they faw. Notwithstanding, he was ever very grave and wife in speaking. For ever when he went up into the Pulpit for Orations, to speak unto the People, he made his Prayers unto the gods, that nothing might escape his mouth, but that he might confider before, whether it would serve the purpole of his matter he treated on : yet are there none of his Works extant in writing, PERICLES.

unless it besome few Laws he made, and but very few of his notable sayings are brought to light, fave onely these. He said on a time, that they must take away the City of ÆGINA, because it was a ftraw lying in the eye of the Haven PIR.EA. And another time, he faid that he saw the Wars afar off, coming from Peloponnesus. And another time, as he took Ship with Sophocles (his companion in commillion with him as general of the Army) who commended a fair young boy they met as they came to the Haven: Sophocles, faid he, a Governour must not onely have his hands, but also his eyes clean. And Stesimbrotus writeth, that in a funeral Oration he made in the praise of those that were slain in the War of Samos: he said they were immortal as the gods. For we do not fee the gods (faid he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happiness they enjoy, we do conjecture they are immortal: and the same things are in those that nappmers they enjoy, we determine they are infinitely at a muture fair those that of the comment of die in fervice and defence of their Countrey. Now where Thucydides doth write the Government of Periodes Comment of Mobility, and yet had appearance of a product comment of the Common-weal under Periodes to be as a Government of Mobility, and yet had appearance of a product common-weal under Periodes to be as a Government of Mobility, and yet had appearance of a product common-weal under Periodes to be as a Government of Mobility. popular State: it is true, that in effect it was a Kingdom, because one alone did rule and govern the whole State. And many other fay also, he was the first that brought in the custom to divide the Enemies Lands won by conqueft among the People, and of the common money to make the People fee Plays and Paftimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this cuftom was ill brought up. For the common People that before were contented with little, and got their living painfully with sweat of their brows, became now to be very vain, sumptious, and riotous, by reason of these things brought up then. The cause of the alteration doth easily appear by those things. For Pericles at his first coming, sought to win the favour of the People, as we have faid before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had won. But coming far short of his Wealth The good decision and ability, to carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision Cimon and ability, to carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor, keeping open decision carry out the port and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poor and charge the carry of and adminy, to carry out the poor old People, breaking open befides all Inclosures and Pales house to all comers, cloathing poor old People, breaking open befides all Inclosures and Pales through all his Lands, that every one might with more liberty come in, and take the Fruits thereof at their pleasure: and seeing himself by these great means out-gone far in good will with the

The Oftracif-

Cimon from

common People, by Demonides counsel and procurement (who was born in the Isle of Ios) he brought in this distribution of the common money, as Aristoric writeth. And having won in a fhore time the favour and good will of the common People, by diffribution of the common Treafure, which he caused to be divided among them, aswell to have place to see these Plays, as for that they had reward to be prefent at the judgements, and by other such like corruptions: he with the Peoples help, did inveigh against the Court of the Areopagites, whereof he never was any member. For it never came to be his hap to be yearly Governour, nor Keeper of the Laws, dittibution nor King of the Sacrifices, nor Master of the Wars: all which were Officers chosen in ancient time by lot. And further, those on whom the lot fell, if they had behaved themselves well in their Office, they were called forwards, and raifed to be of the body of this Court of the Areopagies. Pericles now by these means having obtained great credit and authority amongst the People, he troubled the Senate of the Arcoparites in fuch fort, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes help: and in time made Cimon to be banished ATHENS, as one that favoured the LACEDEMONIANS, and contraried the Commonwealth and Authority of the People. Notwithstanding he was the noblest and richest person of all the City, and one that had won so many glorious Victories, and had so replenished Athens with the conquered spoils of their Enemies, as we have declared in his life: so great was the Authority of Pericles amongst the People. Now the banishment wherewith he was punished (which they call Offracismon) was limited by the Law for ten years. In which space the LACEDEMONIANS being come down with a great Army into the Countrey of TANAGRA, the ATHENIANS fent out their power presently against them. There Cimon willing to shew the ATHENIANS by his deeds, that they had fallely accused him for favouring the LACEDEMONIANS: did arm himself, and went on his Countrey-mens side, to sight in the company of his Tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a banilhed man, And this was the cause that Pericles sought that day more valiantly than ever he did, and he wan the honour and name to have done more in the person of himself that day, than any other of all the Army. At that Battle also, all (imons friends, whom Pericles had burdened likewise to favour the LACEDAMONIANS doings, died every man of them that day. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driven Cimon away, and wished he were restored, after they had lost this Battle upon the Confines of the Countrey of ATTICA: because they feared sharp Wars would come upon them again at the Peristacalled next Spring. Which thing when Peristes perceived, he fought also to further that the common People desired: wherefore he straight caused a Decree to be made, that Cimon should be called home again, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he advited that peace should be made between both Cities: for the LACEDEMONIANS did love Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other Governours. Some notwithstanding do write, that Pericles did never pass his consent to call him home again, before such time as they had madea fecret agreement amongst themselves (by means of Elpinice, Cimons Sister) that Cimon should be fent our with an Army of two hundred Galleys, to make Wars in the King of Persia his Dominions, and that Pericles should remain at home with the Authority of Government within the City. This Elpinice (Cimons Sifter) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at fuch time as he was accused before the Judge of treason. For Pexicles was one of the Committees, to whom this Accufation was referred by the People. Elpinice went unto him, and belought PERICLES.

him not to do his worst unto her Brother. Pericles answered her merrily : Thou art too old Elvinice. thou art too old to go through with these matters. Yet when this matter came to judgethent, and that his cause was pleaded : he rose but once to speak against him (for his own discharge as it Pericles modewere) and went his way when he had faid, doing lefs hurt to Cimion then any other of his accusers, ration unto How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuseth Pericles that he had caused the Orator Ephi- Cimon. altes to be flain by treason (that was his friend, and did always counsell him, and take his part in all kind of government of the Commonweal) onely for the jealousie and envy he did bear to his glory? I can but muse why Idemeneus should speak so slanderously against Pericles, unless it were that his melancholy humour procured such violent speech: who though peradventure he was not altogether blamelefs, yet he was ever nobly minded, and had a naturall defire of honour, in which kind of men fuch furious cruell passions are seldom seen to breed. But this Orator Ephialtes being cruell to those that took part with the Nobility, because he would spare or pardon no man for any offence whatfoever committed against the peoples authority, but did follow and perfecute them with all rigour to the uttermost: his enemies laid wait for him by means of one Aristodieus TANA-GRIAN, and they killed him by treason, as Aristotle writeth. In the mean Cimon died in the Isle of CYPRUS, being Generall of the Army of the ATHENIANS by fea. Wherefore those that took part with the Nobility, feeing Pericles was now grown very great, and that he went before all other The murther Citizens of ATHENS, thinking it good to have some one to stick on their side against him, and to of Ephlaltes. leffen thereby somewhat his authority, that he might not come to rule all as he would; they raised up against him one Thucydides of the Town of Alopecia, a grave wife man and Father in Law Perioteradyerto Cimon. This Thucydides had less skill of wars then Cimon, but understood more in Civil go- fary in the vernment then he; for that he remained most part of his time within the City: where continually Commoninveighing against Pericles in his Pulpit for Orations to the people, in short time he had stirred up wealth, a like company against the faction of Pericles. For he kept the Gentlemen and richer fort (which they call Nobility) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their estate and dignity was obscured, and trodden under foot. Moreover he did separate them from the people, and did affemble them all as it were into one body. who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and did put (as a man will fay) a counterpoise into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little lecret grudge onely between these two factions, as an artificiall Flower set in the blade of a Sword, which made those shew a little, that did lean unto the people; and the other also somewhat that favoured the Nobility. But the contention between these two persons, was as a deep cut; which divided the City into two factions: of which the one was called the Nobility, and the other the Commonalty. Therefore Pericles giving yet more liberty unto the people, did all things that might be to pleafe them, ordaining continuall Playes and Games in the City, many Feafts and Bankets, and open pastimes to entertain the commons with such honest pleasures and divises: and besides all this, he sent yearly an Army of threescore Gallies unto the wars, into the which he put a great number of poor Citizens that took pay of the State for nine moneths of the year, and thereby they did learn together, and practife to be good Seamen. Furthermore he fent into the Countrey of CHERRONESUS, a thoufand free-men of the City to dwell there, and to divide the Lands amongst them; five hundred also into the Isle of Naxos : into the Isle of Andros two hundred and fifty : into THRACIA, 2 thousand to dwell with the BISALTES : and other also into ITALY , when the City of Sy-BARIS was built again, which afterwards was furnamed the City of the Thurians, All this he did, to rid the City of a number of idle people, who through idleness began to be curious, and A politick care to defire change of things, as also to provide for the necessity of the poor Towns-men that had for idle persons nothing. For, placing the natural Citizens of ATHENS near unto their subjects and friends, they ferved as a Garifon to keep them under, and did suppress them also from attempting any alteration or change. But that which delighteth most, and is the greatest ornament unto the City of ATHENS, which maketh strangers most to wonder, and which alone doth bring sufficient testimony. to confirm that which is reported of the ancient power, riches, and great wealth of Greece, to Sumptuous be true and not false; are the stately and sumptuous buildings which perieles made to be built in the buildings ere-City of ATHENS: For it is the onely act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies eted by Perimost to spite him, and which they most accused him for, crying out upon him in all councils and cles. affemblies; that the people of ATHENS were openly defamed, for carrying away the ready Money of all GREECE, which was left in the Isle of DELOS to be fafely kept there. And although they could with good honefty have excused this fact, saying, that Pericles had taken it from them, for fear of the barbarous people, to the end to lay it up in a more ftronger place, where it should be in better fafety: yet was this too overgreat an injury offered unto all the rest of GREECE, and too manifest a token of tyranny also, to behold before their eyes, how we do employ the Money, which they were inforced to gather for the maintenance of the wars against the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and fetting forth our City, like a glorious woman, all to be ganded with gold and precious stones; and how we do make Images, and build up Temples of wonderfull and infinite charge. Pericles replied to the contrary, and declared unto the ATHENIANS, that they were not bound to make any account of this Money unto their friends and allies, confidering that they fought for their fafery, and that they kept the barbarous people far from GREECE without troubling them to fet out any one Man, Horse or Ship of theirs, the Money onely excepted, which is no more their that paid it, then theirs that received it, so they bestow it to that use they received it for.

For 10110 gained by same 19, 2011 Hewers of frone, Diers, Goldfmiths, Joyners working in Ivory, Painters, men that let in fundry colours of peeces of froze or wood, and Turners. Others gained to bring, fluff, and to furnish them, as Merchants, Mariners, and Shipmafters, for things they brought them by Sea: And by Land others got PRETELIBRIES, PRACTICES, 2010 SHAPMANESS, TOT CHARGES, Sallers, Coller-makers, and Pyoners to make allo, as Cart-makers, Carriers, Carters, Cord-makers, Sallers, Coller-makers, and Pyoners to make alto, as Cart-makers, Carriers, Cartiers, Coru-maccis, Januers, Jouner-maceis, and ryuners to make ways plain, and Miners, and fuch like. Furthermore every science and craft, as a Captain having SoulDivers Artific diers, had also their Army of the Workmen that served them, labouring truly for their living, who cers at them, ferred as apprentices and Journeysman under the workmafters, So the work by this means did disperse terved as apprentices and journeymen under the workmanners, some work by the means up a duperte abroad a common gain to all forts of people and ages, what occupation or trade foever they had. And thus came the buildings to rife in greatness and impruounces, being of excellent workmanthip, and for grace and beauty not comparable, because every workman in his Science did firite what he could TOE grace and orany not comparable, occasion was a monotonin in marchine and retire what he could to excell others, to make his work appear greaten in fight, and to be most workmanly done in shew, to execu oraces, to make up work appear greater in ugas, and to be more workingly gone into ex. But the greatest thing to be worked at wastheir speed and diligence. For where every man thought out the greatest unuglious womans and in many mens lives and ages, and from man to man; they those works were not likely to be finished in many mens lives and ages, and from man to man; they were all done and finished, whileft one only governour continued faill in credit and authority. And yet were any une any municu, winners one our ferrando boafted himself that he had quickly painted certain they say that in the same time as one Agatarchia boafted himself that he had quickly painted certain they say that in the same time 40 one against time or animeted, And I contrarily do rejoyce that I am a long beaths. Zenwie another Painter hearing him, aniwered, And I contrarily do rejoyce that I am a long peants; Zenne another Painter nearing nan, anivered, Ann contrarny corejoyee that 1 am a long time in drawing of them. For commonly fleight and funden drawing of any thing, cannot take deep colours, nor give perfect beauty to the work; but length of time adding to the Painters diligence and labour in making of the work, maketh the colours to continue for ever. For this cause therefore the works Periode made are more wonderfull, because they were perfectly made in so short a time, and have continued to long a kason. For every one of those which were finished up at that time, seemed then to be very ancient touching the beauty thereof; and yet for the grace and continuance of the fame it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done and finished, there is sixth a certain kind of flourishing freshness in it, which letteth that the injury of time cannot impair the fight thereof. As if every of those foreshid works had some living spirit in it, to make it seem young and sresh, and a foul that lived ever, which kept them in their good continuing thate. Now the chief Surveyor Generall of all these works was Philing, albeit that there were many other excellent Workmafters in every frience and occupation. For the Temple of Palas which is called Partherns (as a man would fay, the Temple of the Virgin and is furnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is an hundred foot every way was built by Himms, and Callierates, and the Chappel of Elegin (where the secret Ceremonies of the mysters were made) was first founded by Corabsu, who raised up the first pillars in order, standing beneath on the ground, and did fet them up unto the Mafter Chaptrels. But after he was dead, Missgents, born in the Town of XyPSTA, turned the arches over, and then did fet the pillars in order also which are above, and Xenocias of the Town of CHOLARGEA, was he that made the lamborn or top of the steeple which covereth the Sanctuary; but the long wall which Secretes heard Pericles himself give order for the building of it, was done by Callierates, who undertook the work, Cratissa

And as for the Theater or place appointed for mulick, where they hear all Mulicians play, and is called Odon; It is very well made within with divers seats and degrees, and many ranges of pilis called Odon; It is very well made within with divers seats and degrees, and many ranges of pilis. lars, but the top of the roof is altogether round, which is fortewhat hanging downward round about of it felf, coming together into one point. And it is faid that this was made after the partern and fathion of King Kernes royall Pavilion, and that Perieles was the first deviter and maker of it. Wherefore Crassam in another place of his comedy he maketh of the THRACIANS, doth play very pretily upon him, faying,

Pericles here doth come, Dan Jupiter sirnamed; (And onions head) which bath in his great noddle finely framed The plot of Odeon, when he delivered was

From banishment and dangers deep, wherein he long did pass. Pericles was the first that made marvellous earnest labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the Feaft called Panathenaa, they would fet up games for mufick. And he himself being chosen Ruler of these games, as judge to reward the best deserver; ordained the manner the Muficians should ever after keep in their singing, playing on their slutes, or upon the Peridet ere-Cithern, or other Instruments of musick. So the first games that ever were for musick, were kept for Musick. within the Odeon, and so were the other after them also ever celebrated there. The gate and entring into the Castle was made and finished within the space of five years, under the charge of Menelecles, that was Master of the Works. And whilest these gates were a building, there happened a wonderful chance, which declared very well that the goddes Minerva did not millike the Building but that it pleased her marvellously. For one of the most painfullest Workmen that wrought there tell by mischange from the height of the Castle to the ground, which fall did so fore bruise him, and he was fo fick withall, that the Physicians and Surgeons had no hope of his life, Pericles being very forry for his mischance, the goddels appeared to him in his sleep in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he did eafily heal the poor bruiled man, and that in short time. And this was the occasion why he caused the Image of the goddels Minerva (otherwise called of health) to be cast in brass, and fet up within the Temple of the Castle, near unto the Altar which was there before. as they fay. But the golden Image of Minerva was made by Phidias, and graven round about the base, who had the charge in manner of all other works, and by reason of the good will Pericles bare him, he commanded all the other workmen. And this made the one to be greatly envied, and the other to be very ill spoken of. For their enemies gave it out abroad, that Phidias received the Gentlewomen of the City into his house, under colour to go see his works, and did convey them to Pericles. Upon this brute the Comicall Poets taking occasion, did cast out many slanderous The Poets Speeches against Pericles, accusing him that he kept one Menippus Wife, who was his friend and raise up flan-Lieutenant in the wars : and burthened him further, that Pyrilampes one of his familiar friends alders against To brought up Fowl, and specially Peacoks, which he secretly sent unto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at those Satyrs that make profession to speak slanderously against all the world, as it were to facrifice the injuries and wrongs they cast upon honourable and good men, to the fpight and envy of the people, as unto wicked spirits; considering that Stelimbrotus THASIAN durft fallly accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his own Sons wife. And this is the reason in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of ancient things, by the Monuments of Historiographers; confidering long process of time doth utterly obscure the truth of matters done in former times. For every written History speaking of men that are alive, and of the time of things, whereof it maketh mention; fometime for hate and envy, fometime for favour and flattery, doth difguife and corrupt the truth. But Perieles perceiving that the Orators of Thucydides faction in their common Orations did still cry out upon him; that he did vainly waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed upon the works all the whole revenue of the City; One day when the people were affembled together before them all, he asked them if they thought that the cost bestowed were too much. The people answered him, a great deal too much. Well, faid he then, the charges shall be mine (if you think good) and none of yours; The noble provided that no mans name be written upon the works but mine onely. When Pericles had faid fo, faving of Pethe people cried out aloud, they would none of that (either because that they wondred at the great-ricks. nels of his mind, or else for that they would not give him the onely honour and praise to have done fo fumptuous and ftately works) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges . without sparing for any cost. But in the end, falling out openly with Thueydides, and putting Thueydides bait to an adventure which of them should banish other, with the banishment of Oftracismon: Pericles nithed by Pegot the upper hand, and banished Thucydides out of the City, and therewithall also overthrew the ricles. contrary faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the City again to unity and concord he found then the whole power of ATHENS in his hands and all the Perioles power ATHENIANS matters at his disposing. And having all the treasure, armour, galleys, the Isles, and the Sea, and a marvellous feigniory and kingdom (that didenlarge it felf partly over the GRECI-ANS, and partly over the barbarous people) fo well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of Nations subject unto them, with the friendship of Kings, and with the alliance of divers other Princes and mighty Lords , then from that time forward he began to change his manners toward the people, and not so easily to give place and frame himself to the peoples wills and desires, no more then what altereth as it were to contrary winds. Furthermore he altered his over-gentle and popular manner of go- the Commonvernment which he used untill that time, as too delicate and too effeminate an harmony of musick, weal. and did convert it unto an imperious government, or rather to a Kingly authority; but yet held still a direct course, and kept himself ever upright without fault, as one that did, said, and counselled that which was most expedient for the Commonweal. He many times brought on the people by perswasions and reasons to be willing to grant that he preferred unto them; but many times also he drave them to it by force, and made them against their wills do that which was best for them. Following therein the devile of a wife Physician, who in a long and changeable difease doth grant his Patient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate fort, and another time also, he doth give him a sharp or bitter medicine that doth vex him, though it heal him: For (as it falleth out commonly unto people that enjoy fo great an Empire) many times misfortunes did chance, that filled them full of fundry paffions, the which Pericles alone could finely free and govern with two principall rudders, Fear and Hope; brideling with the one the fierce and and govern with two principal rudgers, rear and riope; or design with the other conforting their grief infolent rathnels of the common people in profiperity, and with the other conforting their grief and discouragement in adversity. Wherein he manifeftly proved, that Rhethorick and Eloquence (as Plato faith) is an Art which quickeneth mens spirits at her pleasure, and her chiefest sail (as Figgs and) is an Art which quenches throughly, which are as frops and founds of the is to know how to move pallions and affections throughly, which are as frops and founds of the Soul, that would be plaied upon with a fine fingered hand of a cunning Mafter. All which, nor the force of Eloquence onely brought to pals, as Thucydides winnesseth, but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had of his great worthiness, because he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any coverousness in him. For, when he had brought way be corrupted with give, many business and wealthy, and had in power and authority his City not onely to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authority exceeded many Kings and Tyrants, yea, even those which by their Wills and Tertaments might have left great possessions to their Children; he never for all that encreased his Fathers Goods and Patrimony left him the value of a groat in filver. And yet the Hiftoriographer Thucydides doth fer forth plainly enough the greatness of his power. And the Comicall Poets also of that time do report it malicioully under covert words, calling his familiar friends the new Pyfifratides, faying, how they must make him swear and protest he would never be King, giving us thereby to understand that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular Government. And Teledides (amongst other) faith, that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the revenue of the Towns and Cities under their obedience, and the Towns themselves, to bind the one and loose the other, and to pull down their walls, or to build them again at his pleasure. They gave him power to make peace and alliance, they gave all their force, treature and authority, and all their goods wholly into his hands. But this was not for a little while, nor in a geer of favour, that should continue for a time, but this held out fourty years together, he being always the chief of his City amongst tor a time, but this held out fourty years together, he being anways the emer or his city amongst the Ephialies, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, and the Thurshides. For after he had prevailed against Thurshides, and had banished him, he yet remained chief above all other, the space of listen years. Thus having attained a regal Dignity to command all, which continued as aforefaid, where no other Captains authority endured but one year: he ever kept himself upright from bribes and money, though otherwise he was no ill husband, and could warily look to his own. As for his Lands and Goods left him by his Parents, that they mifcarried not by negligence, nor that they should trouble him much, in busying himself to reduce them to a value; he did to husband them as he thought was his best and easiest way. For he fold in gross ever the whole years profit and commodity of his lands, and afterward fent to the market daily to buythe vitore years prom and commonly of the saids, and ancerwant to the marke daily to dry the cates, and other ordinary provision of houshold. This did not like his Sons that were men grown, neither were his women contented with it, who would have had him more liberal in his house; for they complained of his overhard and straight ordinary, because in so noble and great an house as his, there was never any great remain left of meat, but all things received into the house, ran under account, and were delivered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his was kept upright in this good order, by one Evangelm, fleward of his house, a man very honest and skilfull in all his houshold provision, and whether Pericles had brought him up to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not known. But these things were far contrary to Anaxagoras wildom; For he despising the world, and carting his affection on heavenly things, did willingly for fake his houle, and fuffered all his land to run to layes and to pasture. But (in my opinion) great is the diversity between a contemplative life and a civil life. For the one emploieth all his time upon the speculation of good and honest betweet contemporate and things; and to attain to that, he thinketh he hath no need of any exterior help or inftrument. The other applying all his time upon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men, he thinketh that he needeth riches as an Instrument not onely necessary but also honest. As, look upon the example of Pericles, who did relieve many people; And Anaxagoras specially among other; of whom it is reported, that Pericks being occupied about matters of flate at that time, having no leifure to think upon Anaxagorus, he feeing himfelf old and forfaken of the world, laid him down, and covered deactions upon America, in the head clote, determining to starve himself to death with hunger. Pericles understanding this, ran familia himfell prefently to him as a man half caft away, and prayed him as earnestly as he could that he would distinct the state of t pofe himfelf to live, being not onely forry for him, but for himfelf also, that he should lose to pore manuelle are, come not only only of the same and government. Then Anaxagoras shewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, those that will see by the light of a Lamp, must put oyl to it, to make the light burn. Now began the LACEDEMONIANS to grow jealous of the greatness of the ATHENIANS, wherefore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hearts greater, and fodraw their minds to great enterprifes; fet down an order they should fend Ambassadors to perswade all the GRECIANS (in what part soever they dwelt in Europe or Asia, as well the little as the great Cities) to fend their Deputies unto ATHENS, to the general affembly that should be holden there pointeth age Currey to take order for the Temples of the gods which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the facrifices they had vowed for the prefervation of GREECE, when they gave battel upon them, and touching Sea matters also, that every man might fail in fafety where he would, and that all might live together in good peace and love one with another. To perform this commission, mgar are together in 500 per and and any one of them being fifty years of age and upward. Whereof five of them went to the DORIANS dwelling in ASIA, and to the Inhabitants of the Isles, even unto the Isles of LESBOS, and of the RHODES. Five other went through all the Countrey of HELLESPONT, and of THRACIA, unto the City of BIZANTIUM. Other five were commanded to go into BOEOTIA, into PHOCIDES, and through all PELOPONNESUS, and from thence by the Countrey of the LOCRIANS, into the upland Countrey joyning to it, untill they came into the Contrey of ACARNANIA and of AMBRACIA. And the other five went first into the Ifle of EUBOEA, and from thence unto the OET AIANS, and through all the gulf of MALBA unto the PHIIOTES, unto the ACHAIANS, and the THESSALIANS; declaring to all the people where they came the ATHENIANS Commission, perswading them to send unto ATHENS, and to be present at the Councill which should be holden there for the pacification and union of all GREECE. But when all came to all nothing was done, and the faid Cities of GREECE did not affemble, by practice of the LACEDEMONIANS (as it is reported) who were altogether the let : for the first retufall that was made of their Summons was at PELOPONNESUS. This have I written to make Periol s noble courage to be known, and how profound a wife man he shewed himself unto the world. Furthermore when he was chosen Generali in the wars he was much esteemed, because he ever took great regard to the fafety of his Souldiers. For by his good will he would never hazard battel, which good Generals, neither would he follow them that had obtained great Victories by hazard, howfoever the faker of other did esteem or commend them. For he was wont to say, that if none but himself did lead them his men in to the shambles, as much as lay in him, they should be immortal. And when he saw Tolmides, the Son wars. of Tolmans (trufting to his former Victories, and the praise and commendation of his good service) did prepare upon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the Countrey of BOEOTIA, and had procured also a thousand of the luftiest and most valiant men of the City, to be contented to go with him in that journey, over and above the rest of the Army he had levied; He went about to turn him from his purpole, and to keep him at home, by many perswasions he used to him before the peoples face, and spake certain words at that time that were remembred long after, and these they were, That if he would not believe Pericles counsell, yet that he would tarry time at the least, which is the wifest Counsellor of men. These words were prettily liked at that present time. But within few days after, when news was brought that Tolmides felf was flain in a battel he had loft near unto the Time the best City of CORONEA, wherein perished also many other honest and valiant men of ATHENS: His Counsellor. words spoken before did then greatly encrease Pericles his reputation and good will with the common Tolmides slain people, because he was taken for a wise man, and one that loved his Citizens. But of all his journeys in the field. he made, being General over the army of the ATHENIANS, the journey of the CHERRONESUS was neys, best thought of and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefit and preservation of all the GRECIANS inhabiting in that Countrey. For besides that he brought thither a thousand Citizens of ATHENS to dwell there (in which doing he strengthned the Cities with so many good men) he did fortifie the bar alfo, which did let it from being of an Ille, with a fortification he drew from one Sea to another, fo that he defended the Countrey against all the invasions and piracies of the THRACIANS inhabiting thereabouts, and delivered it of extream war, with the which it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongst them, who onely lived upon Pyracy and robbing on the Seas. So was he likewise much honoured and esteemed of strangers when he did environ all Peleponnesus, departing out of the Haven of Peges, on the Coast of MEGARA, with a Fleet of a hundred Galleys. For he did not onely spoil the Towns. all along the Sea fide, as Tolmides had done before him, but going up further into the main Land, far from the Sea, with his Souldiers he had in the Galleys, he drave some of them to retire within their walls, he made them so afraid of him, and in the County of NEMEA he overcame the SICYONIANS in battel, that tarried him in the field, and did erect a pillar for a notable mark of his Victory. And imbarking in his Ships a new Supply of Souldiers which he took up in ACHAIA, being Friends with the ATHENIANS at that time, he passed over to the firm Land that lay directly against it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the River of Achelous, he invaded the Achelous ft. Countrey of ACHARNANIA, where he shut up the OENEADES within their walls. And after he had laid wast and destroyed all the Champion Countrey, he returned home again to ATHENS: Having shewed himself in this Journey a dreadfull Captain to his enemies, and very carefull for the fafety of his Souldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this Journey (by chance or otherwise) unto the Souldiers under his Charge. And afterwards going with a great Navy marvellous well appointed unto the Realm of Pontus, he did there gently use and entreat the Cities of GREECE, and granted them all that were required of him, making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the same also, to know the great power and force of the ATHENIANS, who failed without fear all about where they thought good, keeping all the Coasts of the Sea under their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteen galleys, with certain number of Souldiers under Captain Lamachus to defend them against the Tyrant Timesileus, who being expulsed and driven away with those of his Faction, Pericles caused Proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that fix hundred freemen of the City, that had any defire to go, without compulsion, might go dwell at SINOPA, where they fhould have divided among them the goods and Lands of the Tyrant and his Followers. But he did not follow the foolish vain humours of his Citizens, nor would not yeeld to their unfatiable covetoufness, who being fet on a jollity to see themselves so strong and of such a power, and

But Pericles did hinder their going out, and cut off altogether their curious defire, employing ucine. Due Persets and united the force, to keep that they had already gotten: judging it no fmall the most part of their power and force, to keep that they had already gotten: judging it no fmall matter to keep down the Laced Amonians from growing greater. For he was always an matter to acce down and analysis as he shewed himself in many things, but specially in the war he made, called the Holy war. For the LACEDEMONIANS having put the Procians from ne mane, cancumer rong wath for an the City of Delphos, which they had usurped, and having the charge of the Temple of Apollo, in the City of Delphos, which they had usurped, and having reftored the DELPHIANS again unto the fame, fo foon as they were gone thence, Pericles went allo with another Army, and reftored the PHOCIANS in again. And whereas the LACED.#MOand with another charge, encountering the forehead of a Wolf of brafs, the priviledge the Del-PHIANS had granted them, to be the first that should make their demands of the Oracle: he having attained the like priviledge of the PHOCIANS, made his Image also to be graven on the right side of the same Image of the brasen Wolf. Now how wisely Pericles did govern Greece by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deeds do plainly shew. For first of all, the countrey of EUROFA did rebell, against whom he brought the Army of the ATHENIANS. And suddenly in the neck of that, came news from another Coaft, that the Megarians also were in armes against them, and Pliffonix King how they were already entred into the countrey of ATTICA with a great Army, led by Pliffonix of Lacedman. King of Laced & Mon. This occasion drew him homeward again, and so he marched back with fpeed into his countrey, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entred into the territories of ATTICA. He durft nor offer them battell, being fo great a number of valime Souldiers: but hearing that King Pliftmax was yet but a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleardrides counsell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counsell and direct bim) he fought privily to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had won him foon with his money, he perfeaded him to draw back the Peloponnesians out of their countrey of Attica: and foliedid. But when the LACED MONIANS faw their Army cassed, and that the people were gone their way, every man to his own City or Town, they were fo mad at it, that the King was Pericles. condemned in a great fum. The King being unable to answer his Fine, which was so extream great, to materials and a great mail. A see asing orange manufactured market making which was no caucian great, the was driven to ablent himself from LACED EMON. Cleandrides on the other fide, if he had not fled Gylippus over in time, even for splice had been condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus Father, that afcame the Ather rerwards overcame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it feemed nature bred coverousnels, as a difease inheritable by soccession from the Father to the Son. For he being shamefully convi-Gjippus 106- Red allo, for certain vile parts he had plaid, was likewife banished from Sparta: as we have more bed part of the amply declared in the Life of Lyfander. And Pericles delivering up the account of his charge, and ferting down an Article of the expence of ten Talents he had employed, or should employ in needfull causes: the people allowed them him, never asking question how, or which way, nor whether it was true that they were bestowed. Now there are certain writers (amongst whom the Philosopher Theophrassus one) who write, that Pericles sent yearly unto SPARTA ten Talents, with the politic in for- which he entertained those that were in authority there, because they should make no wars with them: not to buy peace of them, but time, that he might in the mean feafon, with better commodity, and triament. not to only peate of them, our time, that he man he mean hearth, with other commontry, and period acts in that leifure, provide to maintain the wars. After that, as the Army of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the countrey of ATTICA, he returned against the Rebels, and passed into the life EURORA with fitty layle, and five thouland Footmen well armed: and there he overcame all the Cifies that had taken armes against him, and drave away the Hyppobores, who were the most famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their valiantness. He drave away also all the Hestieians, whom he chased clean out of all the Countrey, and placed in their City, onely the Citizens of ATHENS. And the cause why he dealt so rigoroully with them was, because they having taken a Galley of the ATHENIANS prisoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards between the ATHENIANS and LACEDEMONIANS for thirty years : he proclaimed open wars against those of the Isle of Samos, burthening them, that they being commanded by the ATHENIANS to pacifie the quarrels which they had againft the MILESIANS, they would not obey. But because some hold opinion, that he took upon him this Alpassa a pass war against Samos, for the love of Aspassa, it shall be no great digression of our story, to tell you fing wife Wo- by the way, what manner of Woman she was , and what a marvellous gift and power she had, that the could entangle with her love the chiefest Rulers and Governours at that time of the Commonweal, and that the Philosophers themselves did so largely speak and write of her. First of all, it is certain that the was born in the City of MILETUM, and was the Daughter of one Axiochus: the following the steps and example of an old Curtifan of Ionia, called Thargelia, gave her self onely to entertain the greatest Persons and chiefest Rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being passing fair, and carrying a comely grace with her, having a sharp wit and pleasant tongue, she had the acquaintance and friendship of the greatest of all GREECE, and wan all those that did haunt her company, to be at the King of Persia's commandment. So that she sowed through all the Critis of GREECE great beginnings of the faction of the Medes : for they were the greatest men of power and authority of every City, that were acquainted with her. But as for Aloasia, some lay that Perioles reforced unto her, because the was a wife woman, and had great understanding in matters of state and government. For Sucreots himself went to see her sometimes with his friends: and those that ufied her company also, brought their Wives many times with them to hear her talk : though her train were . to entertain such as would warm them by her fire, Afchines writeth, that Lyficles a Grafier, being before but a mean man, and of a clubbish nature, came to be the chief man of ATHENS, by frequenting the company on Afpafia, after the death of Pericles. And to Plato' book intituled Menerous, although the beginning of it be but pleasantly written, yet in that, this story is written truly : that this Afpafia was repaired unto by divers of the ATHENIANS, to learn the Art of Rhetorick of her. Yet notwithflanding it feemeth most likely, that the affection Pericles did bear her, grew rather of love then of any other cause. For he was married unto a Callies the Rinfwoman of his own , and that before was Hipponics Wife , by whom he had Calling, furnamed rich the rith : and had afterwards by Pericles, Kantappus and Panalus; But not liking her company, he Pericles margave her with her own good will and confent unto another, and married Afpafi whom he dearly ried Afpafia lovedt. For ever when he wens abroad, and came home again, he faluted her with a kifs. Whereup the famous on in the ancient Comedies, the is called in many places, the new Omphale, and formetimes Deianira, and fometimes funo. But Cratinus plainly calleth her Whore in these verses:

His Juno he him brought , Afpafia by Name , which was indeed an open whore, and past all kind of Shame.

And it feemeth that he had a Baftard : for Eupolia in a Comedy of his called Demofie, bringeth him in, asking Pironides thus :

I pray thee is my bastard-Son yet alive ?

And then Pironideranswered him:

A perfect man long lince, he surely had been found, If that this tend and naughty whore, his vertue had not drownd.

To conclude, this Apafe was fo famous, that Cyrus (he that fought against King Artanernes his Brother , for the Empire of PERSIA) called Afpafia his best beloved of all his Concubines, which before was called Milito, and was born in PHOCIDES, being Hermetimus Daughter. And Cyrus being flain in the field , Alpafra was carried to the King his Brother , with whom afterwards she was in great favour. As I was writing this Life, this ftory came in my mind: and me thought I should have dealt hardly, if I should have left it unwritten. But to our matter again. Perioles was charged that he made wars against the SAMIANS, on the behalf of the MILESIANS, at the request of Afpasia: for these two Cities were at wars together for the City of PRIENA, but the SAMIANS were the stronger. Now the ATHENIANS commanded them to lay afide their armes and to come and plead their matter before them, that the right might be decided': but they refused it utterly. Wherefore Pericles went thither and took away the government of the small number of Nobility, taking for hoftages, fifty of the chiefest Men of the City, and so many Children besides, which he left to be kept in the 1fle of LEMNOS. Some fay every one of these hostages offered to where he had a Talent: and besides those, many other offered him the like, such as would not have the Pissurbner the foveraign authority put into the hands of the people. Moreover Pissithnes the Persian, Lieu- Persian. tenant to the King of Perfia, for the good will be bore those of Samos, did fend Pericles ten thou- A good proof fand Crowns to release the holtages. But Perioles never took Penny : and baving done that he de- that Perioles fermined at Sanos, and established a popular government, he returned again to Athens. Notwithstanding, the Samians rebelled immediately after, having recovered their hostages again by means of this Piffathnes that Role them away, and did furnish them also with all their munition of war. Whereupon Perieles returning against them once more, he found them not idle, nor amazed at this coming, But resolutely determined to receive him, and to fight for the seigniory by sea, So there was a great bartell fought between them neer the Ille of THRACIA, and Perieles wan the battell : having with forty four fail onely nobly overcome his enemies, which were threefcore and Fertiles Viten in number, whereof twenty of them were Ships of war. And so following his victory forthwith, the samitars. he wan also the Port of Samos, and kept the Samians besieged within their own City: where they were yet to bold, as they would make fallies out many times, and fight before the walls of the City. But when there arrived a new supply of Ships, bringing a greater aid unto Pericles, then were they shet up on all sides. Pericles then taking threescore Galleys with him, lanched out into the fea, with intent (as some fay) to go meet certain Ships of the PHOENICIANS (that came to aide the Samians) as far from Samos as he could : or as Stefimbrotus faith, to go into Cyprus, which me thinketh is not true. But whatloever was his intent, he committed a foul fault. For Meliffus (the fon of Ithagenes , a great Philosopher) being at that time Generall Meliffus a Phiof the Samtans, perceiving that few ships were left behind at the siege of the City, and that the losopher, General of the Captains also that had the charge of them were not very expert men of war, perswaded his Citizens to make a fallie upon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANS overcame : the ATHENIANS were taken prisoners , and they funk many of their ships. Now they being Lords again of the fea, did furnish their City with all manner of musicion for wars, whereof before they had great want. Yet Arifforle writeth, that Peritles felf was once overcome in a batteff at fea by Miliffm. Ephorus the Historiographer writeth, that it was there, where first of all they begun to use Engines of war to pluck down great walls, and that Pericles used first this wonderfull invention; and that Artemon an Engineer was the first devifer of them. He was carried up and down in a Chair, to fet forward these Works, because he had a lame Leg; and for this cause he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Pemicos consunction Ephorus therein, by the verse of Anarrem, in the which Artemon is Periphoreto, many years be Artemon portion and forethis war of Samos began and faith, this Periphoretos as a marvellous tender man, and fo Peripheress 2 sore this war of SANOS occasis; and latting this cripporess, was a mary chous critical man, and to timerous man, foolifhly afraid of his own shadow, that the most part of his time he stirred not out of his house, and nonlining arrain or his own manow, marine more part or mistrance over his head, for fear leaft did fir alwayes having two of his menby him, that held a copper Target over his head, for fear leaft any thing should fall upon him. But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and flood mute in his own conceit, after he had fubdued the nice, with Archilochus verle, fmiling: SAMANS, faying: Agamemnon was ten years taking of a City of the barbarous people; and he in nine moneths onely had won the strongest City of the whole Nation of Ionia. Indeed he had good caule to glory in his victories: for truly (if Thucydides report be true) his conquest was no less doubtfull, then he found it dangerous. For the SAMIANS had almost been Lords of the Sea, and taken the feigniory thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the wars of PELOPONNE and dascular leignous whereof from the Alaskans. Auer this, me was of Periods did sus being hot again, the CORINTHIANS invading the filanders of CORPHU: Periods did sus being not again, the Correlation in the Correlations and to joyn in league with that periwaue the Athenians to kind and thind the Corphians, and to joyn in reague with the Island, which were of great power by sea, saying: that the Peloponnesians (before it were long) would have war with them. The Athenians consented to his motion, to aid those the control of of CORPHU. Whereupon they fent thither Lacedemonius (Cimons Son.) with ten Gallies onely or OKPHU. WHITEUPOHILIE, I among family and friends, were wholly at the LACEDEMONIANS devotion: Therefore did Pricles cause Lacedemonius to have so sew Ships delivered him, and further, fent him thither against his will, to the end that if he did no notable exploit in this service, that they rent mini timitet aganut inswing to the cinetiat it in and no notable captor, in this territe, that insmight then the more juftly suspect his good will to the LACED EMONIANS. Moreover whilest his lived, he did ever what he could to keep Cimons Children back from rifing : because that by their Names they were no naturall born ATHENIANS, but strangers. For the one was called Lacedamo- Cimons Sons. nim, the other Theffaulus, and the third Alius : and the Mother to all them three, was an Arcadian woman born. But Pericles being blamed for that he fent but ten Gallies onely, which was but a flender aid for those that had requested them, and a great matter to them that spake ill of him: he sent thither afterwards a great number of other Gallies, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were marvellous angry, and went and complained to the Council of the LACEDEMONIANS, where they laid open many grievous complaints and accufations against the The Athenians ATHENIANS, and so did the MEGARIANS also: alledging that the ATHENIANS had for accorded at Labidden them their havens, their ftaples, and all traffick of merchandise in their territories under their obedience, which was directly against the common Laws and Articles of Peace, agreed upon by Oath among all the GRECIANS. Moreover, the ÆGINETES finding themselves very ill and cruelly handled, did fend fecretly to make their mone and complaints to the LACEDEMONIANS, being afraid openly to complain of the ATHENIANS. While these things were a doing, the City of POTIDEA, subject at that time unto the ATHENIANS (and was built in old time by the CORINTHIANS) did rebell, and was besieged by the ATHENIANS which did hasten on the wars. Notwithstanding this, Ambassadors were first sent unto ATHENS upon these complaints: and Archidamus King of the LACEDEMONIANS did all that he could to pacifie the most part of these quarrels and complaints, intreating their friends and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no wars at all, for any other matters, wherewith they were burthened, if they would have granted to have revoked the Decree they had made against the MEGARIANS. Whereupon Pericles, that above all other stood most against the revocation of that Decree, and that did stir up the people and made them fland to that they had once decreed and ordered against the MEGARIANS : was thought the original cause and author of the PELOPONNESIAN wars. For it is faid that the LA-Perieles author CEDEMONIANS dent Ambaffadors unto ATHENS for that matter onely. And when Perioles of the wars alledged a Law that did forbid them to take away the Table whereupon before time had been writ- against Peloten any common Law or Edict: Poliances, one of LACEDEMON Ambaffadors, faid unto him: Well, ponnefus. faid he, take it not away then, but turn the Table onely ; your Law I am fure forbiddeth not that This was pleasantly spoken of the Ambaffadour, but Pericles could never be brought to it for all that. And therefore it seemeth he had some secret occasion of grudge against the MEGARIANS: Periodes malice that. And therefore it deemeth he may some retre occasion of grounge against the MEGARIANS: against the yet as one that would finely convey it under the common cause and cloak, he took from them the Megarians. holy lands they were breaking up. And to bring this to pass, he made an Order, that they should fend an Herauld to summon the MEGARIANS to let the Land alone, and that the same Herauld should go also unto the LACEDEMONIANS to accuse the MEGARIANS unto them. It is true that this Ordinance was made by Pericles means, as also it was most just and reasonable: but it fortuned to, that the meffenger they fent thither died, and not without fulpition that the MEGA-RIANS made him away. Wherefore Charinus made a Law presently against the MEGARIANS; that they should be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for ever, without any hope of after reconciliation. And also it any MEGARIAN should once put his foot within the territories of ATTICA, that he should suffer the pains of death. And moreover, that their Captains taking yearly their ordinary Oath , should swear among other Articles , that twice in the year they should go with their power, and destroy some part of the MEGARIANS Land. And lastly, that the Herauld Anthimocritus, should be buried by the place called then the Gates Thriaftenes, and now called Dipylon. But the MEGARIANS stoutly denying, that they were any cause of the death of this Anthimocritus, did altogether burthen Afpafia and Pericles with the fame, alledging for proof thereof Ariftophanes verses the Poet, in his Comedie he intituled the Archarnes, which are so common, as every boy hath them at his tongues end.

The young men of our Land (to drunken bibbing bent) Ran out one day unrulily , and toward Megara went : From whence in their outrage, by force they took away, Simetha noble Curtifan, as fhe did fort and play. Wherewith enraged all (with pepper in the nose) The proud Megarians came tous , as to their mortall foes , And took by flealth away of Harlots eke a pair , Attending on Aspasia, which were both young and fair.

But in very deed, to tell the originall cause of this war, and to deliver the troth thereof, it is very hard. But all the Historiographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefest author of the war; because the Decree made against the MEGARIANS, was not revoked back again. Yet some hold opinion, that Pericles did it of a noble mind and judgement, to be constant in that he thought most expedient. For he judged that this commandment of the LACEDEMONIANS was but a triall, to prove if the ATHENIANS would grant them: and if they yeelded to them in that, then they manifestly shewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarily say, that it was done of a selfwill and arrogancy, to shew his authority and power, and how he did despite the LACED EMO-NIANS. But the shrewdest proof of all, that bringeth best authority with it, is reported after this fort. Phideas the Image-maker (as we have told you before) had undertaken to make the Image of Pallos: and being Pericles friend, was in great estimation about him; but that procured him many Philiss the ill willers. Then they being defirous to hear by him what the people would judge of Pericles, they inticed Menon, one of the Workmen that wrought under Phidian, and made him come into the marketinticed Azeron, one of the working that wrought under 1 Marso, and made that come into the market-place to pray affurance of the people that he suight openly accuse Phidias, for a fault he had commitplace to pray anurance of the people man is might openly acture a man a sauther had committed about Pallas Image. The people received his obedience, and his accuration was heard openly in teu about Pauas mage. The propie receive his obsenties, and his actuation was near u openly in the market-place, but no mention was made of any theft at all, because that Philaias (through the market-place, but no mention was made or any tites at any because that rmains (inrough Perieles counsell and device) had from the beginning to laid on the gold upon the Image, that it might Perietes counten and device) nad from the beginning to rate on the goin upon the image, that it might be taken off and weighed every whit. Whereupon Perieles openly faid unto his acculers, take off the betall and the state of the work of the work of the state of the work of the wor be taken our and weighed every wint. Whereupon Fericus openny sam unto his accusers, take off the gold and weigh it. The glory of his works did purchase him this envy: For he having graven upon the conductor of the added. gold and weigh it. The giory of the works was purchase than this entry; For the traving graven upon the Scutcheon of the godders, the bartell of the AMAZONS, had cut out the portraiture of himfelf marvellous lively, under the person of an old bald man, litting up a great from with both his telt marvellous ivety, uniter the perion of an one part man, many up a great none want both inshands. He burdened her further, that the was a Bawd to Pericle, was Hermippin, maker of the Confeders, the butterful net future; that the was a Dawn to Pericles and received Citizens Wives into her house, which Pericles kept. And Diopherer at the same time and received Chizers we'ves mad not note, which retries kept. One Disposers at the ametime made a Decree, that they should make fearth and enquiry for Hereticks that did not believe in the gods, and that taught certain new Doctrine and opinion touching the operations of things above in gods, and that taught certain new Potential and opinion touting the operations of things above in the element, turning the furpition upon Periolis because of Anaxagoras. The people did receive the element, turning the impulsion upon Leviers because of Lanaxagoras. The people and receive and confirm this inquifition; and it was moved also then by Dracondites, that Pericles should de-Pritani, Trea-liver an account of the Money he had spent, unto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treasurers of Pritail, Trea-liver an account of the Money He had been, and that the Judges deputed to give judgement, should give fen-facers of the turers of the the common times and revenues; and that the jonges depicte to give plagement, insome give incommon fines tence within the City upon the Altar. But Agnon put that word out of the Decree, and placed intence within the City upon the Atlast. Goods for the old love and familiarity that was between them, or rather to give his enemies occa-

for fally to accuse him: that from thenceforth, he gave all the Lands and Tenements he had in the Country unto the Commonwealth. So it fortuned that the LACED #MONIANS with all their monitar invade friends and confederates, brought a marvellous Army into the Countrey of ATTICA, under the leading of King Archidamu: who burning and spoiling all the Country they came along, they came nature of a line and the second of Acharnes, where they encamped, inposing the Athenians would not follow have a second following the s never fuffer them to approach fo near, but that they would give them battell for the honour and

But Perielts wifely confidered how the danger was 100 great to hazard battell, where the loss of the City of ATHENS flood in peril, feeing they were threefcore thousand Footmen of the PELOPONNESIANS, and of the BEOTIANS together: for fo many was their number in the first voyage they made against the ATHENIANS. And as for those that were very desirous to fight, and to put themselves to any hazard, being mad to fee their Countrey thus wasted and destroyed before their eyes, Pericles did An excellent comfort and pacific them with these words: That Trees being cut and hewn down, did fpring again comparison to in short time: but men being once dead, by no possibility could be brought again. Therefore her they the Soulthay the Soulthat the Soulthat the Soulthat the Soulthat direct to the soulthat direct to the soulthat the Soult do fomething still against his will. doth straight give order to make all things sase in the Ship, preparing every thing ready to defend the ftorm, according to his art and skill, not hearkening to the paffengers fearfull cries and pititul tears, who think themselves cast away : even so did Pericles rule all things according to his wisdom. having walled the City substantially about, and set good watch in every corner; and passed not for those that were angry and offended with him, neither would he be perswaded by his friends earnest request and intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threats nor acculations against him, nor yet reckoned of all their foolish scoffing Songs then sung of him in the City to the shame and reproach of his government, faying that he was a cowardly Captain, and that for dastardliness he let the enemies take all, and spoil what they would. Of which number Cleon was one that most defamed him, and Cleon as used began to enter into some prety credit and sayour with the common people, for that they were angry, Perietes, and milliked with Pericles: as appeareth by these slanderous verses of Hermippus, which were then O King of Satyres thou, who with such manty speech, Of blondy wars and doughty deeds, dost daily to me preach : Why art thou now afraid to take thy Lance in hand .

With biting words, with trenchant blades, and deadly dannting froak. All this notwithstanding, Pericles was never moved any thing, but with silence did patiently bear all injuries and scoffings of his enemies, and did fend for all that, a navy of a hundred sail unto PELOPONNESUS, whether he would not go in person, but kept himself at home, to keep the people in quiet, untill fuch time asthe enemies had raifed their Camp, and were gone away. And to entertain the common people that were offended and angry at this war, he comforted the poor Note Pericles people again, with caufing a certain diffribution to be made amongst them of the common Trea- policie to pafure, and divition also of the Lands that were got by Conquest. For after he had driven all the ÆGI- cific the peo-NET ES out of their Countrey , he canfed the whole life of EGINA to be divided by Lot amongst ples anger. the Citizens of Athens. And then it was a great comfort to them in this advertity, to hear of by the Athetheir enemies hurt and loss in fuch manner as it did fall out. For their army that was fent by sea ninn. unto Peloponnesus, had wasted and destroyed a great part of the champion countrey there, and had facked besides many small Cities and Towns. Perietes self also entring into the MEGARIANS Countrey by land, did wast the whole Countrey all afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receiving by fea as much hurt and lofs at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land ento the ATHENIANS; they had not holden our wars follong with the ATHENIANS, but Athens. would foon have given over (as Pericles had told them before) had not the gods above fecretive hindred mans reason and policie. For first of all there came such a fore plague among the ATHE-NIANS, that it took away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakned the force of the whole City befides. Furthermore, the bodies of them that were left alive being infected with this difeafe. their hearts also were so sharply bent against Pericles, that the fickness having troubled their brains they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the Patient against his Physician, or Children against their Father, even to the harring of him, at the provocation of his enemies; who brusted abroad, that the plague came of no cause elle, but of the great multitude of the countrey men that came into the City on Accusations prague came of no came end, out of the great minimum of the Summer, where they were compelled to lie many against Perio together, fmothered up in little Tents and Cabines, remaining there all day long, cowring downwards, and doing nothing, where before they lived in the Countrey in a fresh open air, and at liberty. And of all this (fay they) Perioles is the onely cause, who procuring this war, hath pent and fhrouded the countrey men together within the walls of a City, employing them to no manner of use nor service, but keeping them like Sheep in a pinfold, maketh one to poison another with the infection of their plague fores running upon them, and giving them no leave to change air, that they might fo much as take breath abroad. Pericles to remedy this, and to do their enemies a little mischief, armed a hundred and fifty Ships, and shipped into them a great number of armed Footmen and Horsmen also, Hereby he put the Citizens in good hope; and the enemies in great fear, feeing fo great a power. But when he had shipped all his men , and was himself also in the Admirall ready to hoife fail: fuddenly there was a great eclipse of the Sun, and the day was very dark, that the Sun. all the Army was stricken with a marvellous fear, as of some dangerous and very ill token towards them. Pericles feeing the Master of his Galley in a maze withall, not knowing what to do, cast his Cloak over the Mafters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harm or no. The Mafter answered him , he thought it none. Then faid Pericles again to him : There is no difference between this and that, faving that the body which maketh the darknels is greater, then my Cloak which hideth thy eyes. These things are thus disputed of in the Schools of the Philosophers. But Pericles hoifing fail notwithstanding, did no notable nor special service, answerable to so great an Army and preparation. For he laying flege unto the Holy City of Epidaurum, when every Perides hard man looked they should have taken it, was compelled to raise his fiege; for the plague, that was so vehement, that it did not onely kill the ATHENIANS themselves, but all other also (were they never fo few) that came to them or near the Camp. Wherefore perceiving the Athenians were perites deprimarvelloufly offended with him, he did what he could to comfort them and put them in heart again; ved of his but all was in vain, he could not pacifie them: for by the most part of voices, they deprived him of charge. his charge of Generall, and condemned him in a marvellous great fine and fum of Money, the which those that tell the least, do write, that it was the sum of fifteen Talents : and those that say more those that ten the tear, no were, that it was the fall of this condemnation, was Clean, as Idomentus or freak of fifty Talents. The accuser subscribed in this condemnation, was Clean, as Idomentus or Simmin lay, or as Theophrastin writeth: yet Heraelides Pontiem saith, one Lacratidas. Now his common griefs were foon blown over, for the people did eafly let fall their displeasures towards common gries were soon nown over; not the people and eating he had frung. But his own private him, as the Wafp leaveth her fring behind her with them she had frung. But his own private home affairs and houshold causes were invery ill case; both for that the plague had taken away many of troubles. anairs and noumoid taines were in very in care; noum for that he paged has taken away many of his friends and kinfmen from him, as also for that he and his house had continued a long time in difgrace. For Xantippu (Pericus Son and Heir) being a man of a very ill disposition and nature, grace. For Aunispyne (Ferreis son and roa / Joseph a main or a very in ampointment and nature, and having married a young woman very produgall and lavish of expence, the Daughter of Isander, and having married a young woman very produgal and taviln of expence, the Daughter of Islander, Son of Eppliches, he grudged much at his Pathers hardness, who scamby gave him Money and bur a little at a time. Whereupon he fent on a time to one of his Pathers friends in Pericles Name, to pray him to lend him fome Money, who fent it unto him: But afterwards when he came to demand it again, Pericles did not onely refuse to pay it him, but surther also he put him in sujt. But this made the young man Xantippus fo angry with his father, that he spake very ill of him in every place where he came : and reported in way of mockery , how his Father spent his time when he was at home, and what talk he had with the Sophisters, and the Master Rhetoricians. For a mischance forming on a time, at the game of the throwing of the Dart, who should throw best, that he that threw, did unfortunately kill one Epitimem a THESSALIAN : Xantippu went practing up and down the Town, that his Father Perioles was a whole day diffuting with Protagoras the Rhetorician, to know which of the three by Law and Reafon should be condemned for this murther: The Dart, he that threw the Dart, or the deviler of the game. Moreover Stefinbroton writeth, that the bruit that ran thorough the City, that Periode did keep his Wife, was fown abroad by Xantippus that ran thorough the City, that Periode did keep his Wife. himfelf. But fo it is, this quarrell and hate betwirt the Father and the Son continued without reconciliation unto the death. For Xantippus died in the great plague, and Pericles own Sifter also: conculation unto the death. For Austreption used in the great prague, and Persetts own States also: moreover he loft at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinsfolks, and those moreover he loft at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kinsfolks, and those Periotes con- specially that did him greatest pleasure in governing of the State. But all this did never pull down his countenance, nor any thing abate the greatness of his mind, what misfortune foever he had fufrained. Neither faw they him weep at any time, nor mourn at the funerals of any of his kinfmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his youngest and lawfull begotten Son: for, the loss of him alone did onely melt his heart. Yet be did ftrive to fhew his naturall conftancy, and to keephis accustomed modesty. But as he would have put a Garland of Flowers upon his head, forrow did fo pierce his heart when he faw his face, that then he burft out in tears and cried amain; which they never faw him do before all the days of his life. Furthermore the people having proved other Caprains and Governours, and finding by experience that there was not one of them of judgement and authority fufficient for fo great a charge: in the end, of themselves they called him again to the Pulpit for Orations to hear their Countels, and to the state of a Captain also to take charge of the state. But at that time he kept himself close in his house, as one bewaiting his late grievous loss and forrow. Howheit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friends, perfwaded him to fhew himfelf unto the people; who did excuse themselves unto him, for their ingratitude towards him. Pericles then taking the Government again upon him, the first matter he entred into was: that he prayed them to revoke the Statute he had made for base born Children, fearing left his lawfull Heirs would fail, and so his house and Name should fall to the ground. But as for the Law, thus it stood: Pericles when he was in his best authority, caused a Law to be made, that they onely should be counted Citizens of ATHENS, which were natural ATHENIANS born by Father and Mother. Not long time after, it for tuned that the King of EGYPT having fent a guit unto the people of ATHENS, of fourty thousand thens for bale born Chilbushels of Corn, to be diffributed among the Citizens there : many by occasion of this Law were accufed to be base born, and especially men of the baser fort of people, which were not known before, or at the leaft had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were fallly and wrongfully condemned. Whereupon fo it fell out, that there were no lefs then five thousand of them convicted and fold for flaves: and those that remained as free-men, and were judged to be naturall Citizens, amounted to the number of fourteen thouland and fourty persons. Now this was much milliked of the people, that a Law enacted, and that had been of fuch force, should by the self same maker and deviser of the same be again revoked and called in, Howbeit Pericles late calamity that fortuned to his house, did break the peoples hardned hearts against him: who thinking these forrows smart, to be punishment enough unto him for his former pride, and judging that by Gods divine juffice and permillion this plague and lofs fell upon him, and that his request allo was tollerable: they fuffered him to enrole his bate born Son in the Register of the lawfull Citizens of his family, giving him his own Name Pericles. It is the felf fame Pericles , who after he had overcome the PELOPONNESIANS in a great battell by fes, near unto the Ifles of Arginuses, was put to death by fentence of the people, with other Captains his companions. Now was Pericles at that time infected with the plague, but not fo vehemently as other were, but more temperately: which by long space of time, with many alterations and changes, did by little and little decay and confume the strength of his body, and overcame his senses and nets.

A philosophi noble mind. Therefore Theophraftsu in his Morals declareth, in a place where he disputeth, whether mens manners do change with their misfortunes, and whether corporall roubles and afflictions do fo alter men, that they forget vertue, and abandon reason: that Perieles in his sickness shewed a friend of his that came to feehim, I cannot tell what a preferving Charm, that the women had tied (as a mens manners Carkanet) about his nock, to let him understand he was very ill, fince he suffered them to apply by misfortunes Carkanet) fuch a foolish bable to him. In the end Pericles drawing fast unto his death, the Nobility of the City, and fuch his friends as were left alive, standing about his bed, began to speak of his vertue, and of the great authority he had born, confidering the greatness of his Noble acts, and counting the number of his victories he had won (for he had won Nine foughten battels being General of the ATHENIANS, and had fet up so many tokens and triumphs in honour of his Countrey) they reckoned up among themselves all these matters, as if he had not understood them, imagining his senses had been gone. But he contrarily being yet of perfect memory, heard all what they had faid, and thus he began to speak unto them: That he marvelled why they had so highly praised that in him, which was common to many other Captains, and wherein fortune dealt with them in equality alike, and all this while they had forgotten to speak of the best and most notable thing that was in him, which was, that no ATHENIAN had ever worn black gown through his occasion; and fure so was he Anotable saya noble and worthy person. For he did not onely shew himself mercifull and courteous, even in weighty ing of Perioles matters of government among so envious people and hatefull enemies; but he had this judgement also to think, that the most noble acts he did were these; that he never gave himself to hatred, envy nor choler, to be revenged of his most mortall enemy, without mercy shewed towards him, though he had committed unto him fuch absolute power and sole government among them. And this made his surname be Olympius (that is, divine or celeftial) which otherwise for him had been too proud and ar-vedly called rogant a Name, because he was of so good and gentle a nature, and for that in so great liberty he had Olympius. kept clean hands and undefiled ; even as we efteem the gods authors of all good, and caufers of no evil, and fo worthy to govern and rule the whole Monarchy of the world. And not as Poets fay, which do confound our wits by their follies and fond feignings, and are also contrary to themselves, considering that they call Heaven (which containeth the gods) the everlafting feat, which trembleth not, and is not driven nor moved with winds, neither is darkned with clouds, but is always bright and clear. and at all times shining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and mansion place of the eternal God, onely happy and immortal: and afterwards they describe it themselves, full of diffentions and enmitties, of anger and passions, which do nothing become wise and Learned men. But this discourse peradventure would be better spoken of in some other Book. Now the troubles the A- The Athenians THENIANS felt immediately after Pericles death, made them then lament the loss of fo Noble a mem-lamented the ber. For those who unpatiently did brook his great authority while he lived, because it drowned their loss of Pericles own, when they came after his death to prove other speakers and Governours, they were compelled being dead. then to confess, that no mans nature living could be more moderate nor grave, with lenity and mercy, then was his. And that most hated power, which in his life time they called Monarchy, did them most plainly appear unto them, to have been the manifest rampier and bulwark of the safety of their whole State and Commonweal: fuch corruption and vice in government of the State did then foring up immediately after his death, which when he was alive, he did ever suppress and keep under, in such fort, that either it did not appear at all, or at least it came not to that head and liberty, that such faults were committed, as were unpossible to be remedied.

THELIFEOF FABIUS MAXIMUS.

Ann. Mund. 3628.

Ant. Christ.

Aving already declared unto you fuch things worthy memory as we could collect and gather of the Life of Pericles: it is now good time we should proceed to write also of the Life of Fabius Maximus. It is said the first Fabius, from whom the House and Family of the Fabians did descend, (being the greatest and Noblest house of all other in ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymph, or (as other fay) a Woman of the Countrey by the River of Tyber. And some say, that the first of this House, were called at the beginning Fodians, because they did hunt wild beafts, with pitfals and dirches. For unto this present the Romans occasion they have called them Fabians. But howfoever it was, this is certain, that many Noble men have come out of that House: and among other, there was one of that House called Fabius Rullus, whom the ROMANS for his nobleacts did furname Maximus, very great After him Fabius Maximus, whose Life we have now in hand, was the fourth lineally descended of the same line, and he was surnamed Verrucosus, because of a certain birth-marke he had upon one of his lips, like a little wart. And he was also furnamed Ovicula, a little Lamb, for his fornes, flowness, and gravity of his doings whileft he was a child. But, because of nature he was dull, still, and very filent, and that he was feldom feen to play at any passime among the boyes, and for that they saw he was but of flow capacity, and hard to learn and conceive, and withall that the boyes might do to him what they would, he was fo lowly to his fellows: this made men judge that looked not into him, that he would prove a very fool and idiot. Yet other were in contrary opinion of him : who confidering more deeply the man, perceived in his nature a cerrain secret constancy and the majesty of a Lyon. But Fabius self when he was called to serve the Commonweal, did quickly shew to the world, that which they took for dullness in him, was his gravity, which never altered for no cause or respect : and that which other judged searfulnels in him, was very wildom. And where he shewed himself not hasty nor suddain in any thing, it was found in him an affured and fetled constancy. Wherefore when he came to constant der the great foveraignty of the Commonweal, and the continual wars it was in, he did use his body to all hardness, and brought up himfelf therewithall, that he might be the better able to ferve in the field : and he gave himself much to eloquence also, as a necessary instrument to perswade Souldiers unto reason. His tongue likewise did agree with his conditions and manner of life. For he had no manner of affection, nor counterfeit finences in his speech, but his words were ever very grave and profound, and his fentences even grafted in him by nature, and (35 fome (ay) were much like Thucydides sayings: As appeareth in a funerall Oration he made before FABIUS.

was it beyond all reason increased in him, by the wonderfull good success he had before. For, notwithstanding the Senate called him home again, and that his fellow Consul stood against his intent; he for all that did give battel to the GAULS, in despight of them all, and wan the victory. Likewife, though all these signs and wonders in the air, did greatly trouble and amaze multitudes of people : yet did they nothing trouble Fabins, for he faw no apparent cause to be troubled withall. But he understanding the small number of his enemies, and lack of Money that was among them:

their allies and confederates, as need required, to keep their Cities still under their obedience : and in the mean feason by tract of time, to wear out Hannibals force and power, which was like straw set on fire, that ftraight giveth forth a blaze, and yet hath no fubstance to hold fire long. When Fabius had thus faid enough to periwade Flaminius, yet it would not fink into Flaminius head : for faid he, I will not tarry untill the wars come to Rome gates, neither will I be brought to fight upon the walls of the City to defend it, as Camillus did, that fought within the City himself in old time. Whereupon he commanded his Captains to fet out their bands to the field, and he himself took his Horseback; which upon the fuddain, without any cause, was so afraid, and took on so with himself, that he cast the Consul to the ground with his head forward. For all this fall he would not change his mind, but held on his journey towards Hannibal, and prefented him battel in Thuscan, by the

that were fighting, heard any such thing at all. Flaminius the Consul himself was slain at that battel after he had in his own person done many valiant acts, and many of the worthiest Gentlemen and valiant Souldiers of his Army lay dead about him : the refidue being fled, the flaughter was great, for the bodies slain were Fifteen thousand, and so many Prisoners lest alive. After this overthrow, Hannibal made all the fearch he could possibly to find the body of Flaminius, to bury him honourably, because of his valiantness; but he could never be found amongst the dead bodies, neither was it ever heard what became of it. Now as touching the first overthrow at TREBIA, neither the General that wrote it, nor the Post that brought the first news to Rome, told the troth of it as it was, but fained that the end was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the best. But of this battel, fo foon as the Prator Pomponius had received the news, he called all the people to counsell, where without difguifing or diffembling at all, he plainly faid thus unto them: My Lords, we have loft the battel, our Army is overthrown and the Conful himself is slain in the field:

wherefore, consider what you have to do, and provide for your safety. These words spoken to the people, as it had been a boysterous storm of weather that had fallen on them from the sea to put them in danger, did so terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole City for fear, that they were all in a maze, and knew not what to determine. Yet in the end they all agreed, that it flood them upon to have a chief Magistrate, called in Latine Dictator, that should be a man of courage, and fwerable to the dignity and foveraignty of the Office: and moreover, that to his gravity and wife-dom there was joyned (by reasonable age) strength of body, and valiantness with experience. This countel being confirmed by them all, Fabius was chosen Dillator, who named Lucius his Confulfnip, he triumphed over the LIGURIANS (which be people of the mountains, and times Conful. upon the coaft of GENUA) who being overthrown by him in a great battel, where they had loft many men, they were compelled to go their way, and to take the Alpes for their fuccour, and durft no more appear upon the borders of IT ALY, whereupon they did confine. else because the authority of this Magistrate in all other things was so great, that it was in manner after the state of a King : Yet all this norwithstanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dillacor should have absolute power over the people. Fabina at his first coming, because he would shew the majesty and dignity of his Office, that every man should be the more obedient and ready at his commandment : when he went abroad, he had four and twenty Sergeants before him, carrying the bundles of Rods and Axes. And when one of the Confuls came to him, he fent a Sergeant to command his bundle of Rods that were carried before him, to be put down, and all other tokens of dignity to be laid aside : and that he should come and speak with him, as a private man. And first to make a good foundation, and to begin with the service of the gods, he declared unto the people, that the loss they had received, came through the rashness and willfull negligence of their Captain, who made no reckoning of the gods nor Religion : and not through any default and cowardliness of the Souldiers. And for this cause he did perswade them not to be afraid of their enemies, but to appeale the wrath of the gods, and to ferve and honour them. Not that he made them hereby superstitious, but did confirm their valiancy with true Religion and godliness: and besides did utterly take away and asswage their fear of their enemies, by giving them certain hope and assurance of the aid of the gods. Then were the holy Books of the Sibylles Prophefies perused, which were kept very secret, and therein they found certain ancient Prophefies and Oracles , which spake of the present misfortunes of the time : But what was contained therein, it is not lawfull to be uttered to any person. Afterwards the Dillator, before the open affembly of the people made a folemn vow unto the gods, that he would facrifice all the profits and fruits that should fall the next year, of Sheep, of Sowes, of milch-Kine, of Goats in the Mountains, champion Country, Rivers or Meadows of ITALY. And he would celebrate plays of Musick, and shew other sights in the honour of the gods, and would beflow upon the fame the fum of three hundred three and thirty Seftercians, and three hundred three and thirty Seftercians and three hundred three hundred three hundred three and thirty Seftercians and three hundred three and thirty Seftercians are something three hundred dred three and thirty ROMAN Pence, and a third part over. All which firm reduced into GRECIAN Money, amounted to fourfcore and three thouland, five hundred and fourfcore and three filver Drachmas, and two Oboles. Now it were a hard thing to tell the reason why he doth mention this furn fo precifely, and why he did divide it by three, unless it were to exroll the power of the number of Three: because it is a perfect number by the nature, and it is the first of the odd numbers, which is the beginning of divers numbers, and containeth in it self the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers united and joyned together. So Fabim having brought the people to hope and sruft to have the aid and favour of the gods, made them in the end the better disposed to live well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victory, and that the gods would fend good luck and profperity unto men through their valiantness and wisdom : did straight set forwards unto Hannibal, not as minded to sight with him, but fully refolved to wear out his strength and power, by delays and tract of time; and Fabius doings ber of his people, with the great number of his Souldiers. Fabius camped always in the strong against Hannia and high places of the mountains, our of all danger of his enemies Horfemen, and coafted full atter the enemy : fo that when Hannibal stayed in any place , Fabius also stayed : if Hannibal removed, he followed him straight, and would be always near him, but never for fook the hills, neither would he come so near him, as that he should be enforced to fight against his will. Yet always he followed the enemy at his tail, and made him ever afraid of him, thinking ftill that he fought to get the vantage, to give the charge upon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this fort, he became difliked of every body : for every many both in his own Camp and abroad, fpake very ill of him openly : and as for his enemies, they took him for no better then a rank coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiving his great reach and policy, and forefering his manner of fight, law there was no remedy, but by plain force or flight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delay would overthrow the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handy strokes with him, wherein onely consisted all their hope and strength, and in the mean time his Souldiers should fall away and die, and his Money wax fcant, and himfelf should grow the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethink him, and devise all the ftratagems and policies of war he could imagine : and like a cunning wrettler, to feek out all the tricks he could to give his adverfary the fall. For fuddenly he would go and give alarm to his Camp; by and by again he would retire: Another time he would remove his Camp from one place to another, and give him fome advantage, to fee if he could plack his lingring devile out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued fifl refolute in the first determination: that delay of fight was the best way, so to overthrow him. Howbeit Minating, General of his Horsemen, did trouble him much: for he being earnestly bent to fight without dif-Horsemen, de-failed pains defire to fight: Which wrought much in them, and fo fittred up their courages, that they mocked Fabius alrogether, and called him Hannibals School-mafter : and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valiant Captain and worthy ROMAN. This made Minutius look high, and have a proud opinion of himself, mocking Fabius because he ever lodged on the hills, with saying the Dillator would make them goodly sports, to see their enemies waste and burn ITALY before their faces. Moreover he asked Fabisss friends, Whether he would in the end lodge his Camp in the skie, that he did climb fo high upon Mountains, miftrufting the earth : or elfe that he was so afraid his enemies would find him out, that he went to hide himself in the clouds. Fabius friends made report of these jests, and advised him rather to hazard battel, then to bear such reproachfull words as were spoken of him. But Fabius answered them : If I should yeeld to that you counsel me, I should shew my self a greater coward then I am taken for now : by leaving my determination, for fear of their mocks and spightfull words. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearfull and jealous of the welfare and fafety of his Countrey : but otherwife to be afraid of the wagging of every straw, or to regard every common prating, it is not the part of a worthy man of courage, but rather of a base minded person, to seek to please those whom he ought to command and govern, because they are but fools. After this Hallnibal chanced to fall into a Hannibal feel great errour; for intending to leave Fabius to bring his Army into the plains, where there was rour. plenty of victuals, and store of Pasture to feed his Horse and Cattel : he commanded his guides to bring him straight after supper, into the plain of CASINUM. They mistaking his words, and not understanding well what he faid, because his ITALIAN Tongue was but mean, took one thing for another, and so brought him and his Army to the end of the field near the City of Ca-SILINUM, through the middest of which runneth a River, the ROMANS call Vulturnus. City. Now the Countrey lying by it, was a Valley compassed in with Mountains round about, saving Valuarius st. that the River went to the Sea : where leaving its own bankes, it spreadeth abroad into the marrishes and bankes of fand very deep, and in the end fell into that part of the Sea which is most dangerous, and where was neither succour nor covert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottom of a fack; Fabius that knew the Countrey, and was very perfect in all the ways thereabouts, followed him step by step, and stopped his passage, where they should have come out of the Valley, with four thousand Footmen, which he planted there to keep the straight, and disposed the rest of his Army upon the hangings of the hills, in the most apt and fit places all about. Then with his Light horsemen he gave a charge upon the rereward of his Hannibal set enemies battel: which put all Hannibals Army by and by out of order, and so there were slain upon by Faeight hundred of his men. Whereupon Hannibal would have removed his Camp thence imme-bins. diately : and knowing then the fault his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the danger wherein they had brought him, he roundly truffed them up, and hung them by the necks, Now to force his enemies to come down from the tops of the hills, and to win them from their strength, he saw it was impossible, and out of all hope. Wherefore perceiving his Souldiers both afraid and discouraged, for that they saw themselves hemmed in on all sides, without any order to escape: Hannibal determined to deceive Fabius by a device. He caused straight two thousand Hannibals stra-Oxen to be chosen out of the herd, which they had taken before in their spoils, and tied to their tagem. horns light bundles of reeds, and fallow faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of Vines: and commanded the Drovers that had the charge of them, that when they saw any signall or token life up in the air in the night, they should then straight set fire on those bundles and bunches, and drive up the beafts to the hills, towards the ways where the enemies lay. Whileft these things were a preparing, he on the other fide ranged his Army in order of battel, and when night came, caused them to march fair and foitly. Now these beafts, whilest the fire was but little that burnt upon their horns, went but fair and foftly up the hill, from the foot of the mountains from whence they were driven : infomuch as the Herdmen that were on the top of the mountains, wondered marvelloully to fee fuch flames of fire about the horns of fo many beafts, as if it had been an Army marching in order of battel with lights and torches. But when their horns came to be burnt to the flumps, and that the force of the fire did fry their very flesh, then began the Oxen to fight together, and to thake their heads, whereby they did fet one another on fire. Then left they their foft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extream pain they felt, began to run here and there in the mountains, carrying fire still about their horns, and in their tails, and fet fire of all the boughs and Coppies they paffed by. This was a strange fight to look upon, and did much amaze the ROMANS that kept the passages of the mountains, for they thought they had been men that ran here and there with Torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a marvellous fear and trouble, supposing they had been their enemies that ran thus towards them, to environ them on all fides, fo as they durft no more keep the paffages which they were commanded; but forfaking their straights, began to flie towards their main and great Camp. Thereupon Hannibals Light horsemen immediately possessed the straights that were there : by reason whereof, all the rest of his Army marched out at their ease and leisure, without fear or danger, notwithstanding they were loden and troubled with marvellous great spoils, and of all kind of forts. Fabius then perceived very well the fame night, that it was but a fleight of Hannibal; for some of the Oxen that fled here and there fell upon his Army. Whereupon fearing to fall upon fome ambush by reason of the dark night, he kept his Men in battel ray, without stirring, or making any noile. The next morning by break of day, he began to follow his enemies by the track, and fell upon the tail of the rereward, with whom he skirmilhed within the straights of the mountains, and so did diffress somewhat Hannibals Army. Hannibal thereupon fent out of his vantguard a certain number of SPANIARDS (very lufty and nimble fellows that were used to the mountains, and acquainted with climbing up upon them) who coming down, and fetting upon the ROMANS that were heavy armed, flew a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they despiled Fabius the more, and thought worse of him then they did before, because his pretence and determination was, not to be felf fame day the Sergaents that carried the Axes before him, and fent away the train that waited upon him, and did so put himself in prease of the people in the market-place, and followed his own peculiar businels as a private person. Now the ROMANS imagined, that when Fabius should see how they had made Minutius equal in authority with him, it would grieve him to the heart for very anger : but they came short to judge of his nature, for he did not think that their folly should hurt that were offended with their mocks. Thus Fabins took every thing quietly, that the people oftered him, and did comfort himself with the Philosophers rules and examples; who did maintain, that an honest and wise man, can no way be injured nor dishonoured. For all the displeasure he received by the peoples folly, was in respect of the Commonwealth; because they had put a Sword into a mad mans hand, in giving Minutius authority to follow his rash humour and fond ambition in the wars. Wherefore, fearing left he being blinded with vain glory and prefumptuous opinion of himfelf, should rashly (and upon a head) haften to do some great hurt before he came to the Camp, he departed fuddenly out of Rome without any mans knowledge, to return again to the Camp have the authority to command the whole Army when it came to his turn. But Fabius would not confent to that, but divided the Army between them; thinking it better he should alone command the one half, then the whole Army by turns. So he chose for himself the first and third Legion; and gave unto him the second and fourth; and divided also between them the aid of their Friends.

And when Minutius made his boaft, that the Majesty of the highest Magistrates was brought lower for his fake; Fabius told him, that he might think, if he were wife, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal : and if he would needs contend against his Companion, yet he should have a special regard and confideration, that having won now the Citizens good wills, by whom he was fo much honoured, he should have no less care of their health and safety, then he had, who was now troden under foot, and ill intreated by them. Minutius took his lesson for a counterfeit mock, after old mens manners and fashion : and so taking the one half of the Army unto him, went and lodged alone by himself. Hannibal hearing of their jar and squaring together, sought straight opportunity to make their discord finely to serve his turn. Now there was a hill between both their Camps not very hard to be won, and it was an excellent place to lodge a Camp fafely in, and was very fit and commodious for all things. The Fields that were about it, did feem afar off to be very plain and even ground, because they had no covert of wood to shadow them, yet were there many ditches and little vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might eafily have taken it at his pleafure if he had lifted, did let it alone in the midest between them, for a bait to draw out his enemies

Field, as it fell out indeed. For first Minutius fent thither his light horsemen, and afterwards all his men at arms : and laftly perceiving that Hannibal himself came to releeve his men that were upon the hill, he himself marched forward also with all the rest of his Army in order of battel, and gave a hot charge upon them that defended the hill, to drive them thence. The fight continued equal a good space between them both , untill such time as Hannibal saw his enemy come directly within his danger, and shewed the rereward of his battel naked unto his men, whom before he had laid in ambush : he straight raised the signal he had given them. They upon that discovered all together, and with great cries did fet upon the rereward of the ROMANS, and flew a great number of them at the first charge: and did put the rest in such a sear and disorder, as it is unpossible to express it. Then was Minutius rash bravery and fond boasts much cooled, whenhe looked first upon one Captain, then upon another, and faw in none of them any courage to tarry by it, but rather that they were all ready to run away: which if they had done, they had been cast away every man: for the Nu-got him to a little hill before his Camp, where when he faw Minutius and all his men compaffed about on every fide, and even staggering and ready to fly, and heard besides their cries, not like men that had hearts to fight, but as men scared, and ready to fly for fear to save themselves : he clapped his hand on his thigh, and fetched a great figh, faying to those that were about them: O gods, how Minutius is gone to cast himself away, sooner then I looked for, and later then he defired : But in speaking these words, he made his ensigns march on in haste, crying out aloud: O my friends, we must disparch with speed to succour Minutius : for he is a valiant man of person, and one that brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wildom and policy to overthrow him, whereas he himself by Hamibal was first finely handled and deceived. Hamibal then to bring Fabius surther in dishking and furpition with the ROMANS, commanded his Souldiers when they came near any of Fabius Lands, that they should burn and destroy all round about them, but gave them in charge in no wifeto meddle with Fabius Lands, nor any thing of his, and did purpofely appoint a Garrifon to fee that nothing of Fabius should miscarry, nor yet take hurt. This was straight carried to Rome, which did thereby the more incense the people against him. And to help it forward, the Tribunes never ceafed crying out upon him in their Orations to the people, and all by Metellus special procurement and periwation: who of inhielf had no cause to mislike with Fabius, but onely because he was Minutius Kiniman (General of the Horsemen) and thought that the ill opinion they bear to Fabius, would turn to the praise and advancement of Minutius. The Senate also were much offended with Fabius, for the composition he made with Hannibal, touching the Prisoners taking of either fide. For it was Articled between them, that they should change Priloners, delivering Man Fabius changed have not geth Driloners for Man, or elfe two hundred and fifty filver Drachmas for a Man, if the one chanced to have more geth Driloners. getti Prinoners with Prinoners then the other. When exchange was made between them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his hands of ROMAN Prisoners, two hundred and fourty more then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commanded there should be no Money sent to redeem them, and greatly found fault with Fabins for making this accord: because it was neither honourable nor profitable for the Commonweal, to redeem men that cowardly suffered themselves to be taken Pissoners of their enemies. Fabius understanding it, did patiently bear this displeasure conceived against him by the Senate. Howbeit having no Money, and meaning to keep his word, and not to leave the poor Citizens Priloners behind him : he lent his Son to ROME, with Commission to fell his Lands, and bring him Money immediately. The young man went his way to Rome, and fold his Fathers Farms, and brought him Money forthwith to the Camp: Fabius therewith redeemed the Prifoners, and fent their ranfome unto Hannibal. Many of the Prifoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay tent their raniome unto Franceson, many of the their raniome transfer in their raniome; but he would never take any thing again, and gave them all their raniome free them. ly. Alterwards being called to Rome by the Priefts to do certain folemn Sacrifices, he left the Army in charge with Minutim to govern the fame in his absence, with condition not to set upon the enemy, nor to fight with him at all: the which not onely by his authority he did exprelly forbid him, but also as his very friend, he did warn and intreat him in no wife to attempt. Howber Minutius little regarding his commandments or requests, so soon as Fabius back was turned, began to be somewhat lufty, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongst the rest, Minutius perceiving Hannibal had fent a great part of his Army abroad to forrage and get victuals, came and fet upon them that remained behind, and drave them into their Camp, with great flaughter, and did put them in a marvellous fear that were faved, as men that looked for no lefs, but to have been befieged in their Camp. Afterwards also, when their whole Army came together again, he retired back in fpight of them all, and loft not a man. This exploit fet Minutius in a pride, and brought the Souldiers to be more rash then they were before. The news of this overthrow went with speed to ROME, and there they made it a great deal more then it was. Fabins hearing of it, faid, he was more alraid of Minutus prosperity, then of his own adversity. But the common people rejoyced Fabius accused marvellously, and made great shew of joy up and down the market-place. Whereupon Mesellus of Treason by one of the Tribunes going up into the Pulpit, made an Oration unto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlines, but with flat treason. Furthermore, he did accuse the Nobility and greatest men of ROME, faying: that from the first beginning they had laid a Plot to draw these wars out at length, onely to deftroy the peoples power and authority, having brought the whole Commonweal to the flate of a Monarchy, and into the hands of a private perion; who by his remiffeness and delayes, would give Hamibal leifure to plant himself in IT ALY, and by time give open passage to the CAR-THAGINIANS, at their pleasure to fend Hamibal a second and Army, to make a sul conqueft of all ITALY Fabius hearing these words, rose up straight and spake to the people, and tarried not about the answering of the accusations the Tribune had burthened him withall; but prayed them they would dispatch these Sacrifices and Ceremonies of the gods, that he might speedily return again to the Camp, to punish Minutius, for breaking his commandment, in fighting with the enemy. He had no fooner fpoken these words, but there arose a marvellous tumult and hurlyburly presently among the people, for the danger Minutius stood in then, because the Distator had abfolute power and authority to imprifon and put to death whom he thought good, without ordinary course of Law or arraignment. Moreover, they did judge, since Fabius had of late less his accustomed mildness and affability, that he would grow to such severity in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appeale him. Wherefore every man held his peace for fear, faving onely Metellus the Tribune: hehaving authority by vertue of his Office, to fay what he thought good, and who one ly of all other kept still his place and authority, when any Distrator was chosen. Then all the Officers that were put down, instantly belought the people not to forfake Minnius, nor to suffer the like The cruelty of to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his Son, who strook off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemies and overcome them, for breaking his commandment. And began to periwade them further, to take this tyrannical power of the Dictatorship from Fabius; and to put their affairs into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them fairly to pals. The people were tickled marvelloully with these feditious words, but yet they durft not force Fabius to refign his Dictatorship, though they bare him great grudge, and were angry with him in their hearts. Howbeit they ordained, that Minutius thenceforth should have equal power and authority with the Dictator in the wars; a thing that was never feen nor heard of before, and yet the The Dictator very fame done in that fort again, after the battel of CANNES. For Markey James being at that of the Hofe-time Distance in the Camp, they did choic another Distance in Rome, which was Fabius Butes, to men made e-Name and create new Senators in the place of those that were slain in the battel. or dishonour him at all. But as wise Diogenes answered one that said unto him, Look, they mock Diogenes thee : Tufh (faid he) they mock not me : meaning thereby, that he took them to be mocked, words, where he found Minutius so proud and stout, that he was not to be dealt with. For he would needs Minutius reides

And though with overmuch hardiness he hath ventured too far, and made a fault, thinking to have put the enemies to flight: time ferveth not now to accuse him, we will tell him of it hereafter. So he prefently brake the NUMIDES, and dispersed them, that lay waiting in the fields for the ROMANS, which they thought would have fled. Afterwards he went further, and did fet upon them that had given charge upon the rereward of Minutius battel, where he flew them that made head against him. The relidue, fearing lest they should fall into the danger they had brought the ROMANS unto: before they were invironed in of all fides, did turn uanger mey nau wought in Now Hannibal feeing this charge, and confidering how Fabius in person, rail straight to Fabius. Now Hannibal seeing this charge, and confidering how Fabius in person, with more courage then his age required, did make a lane in the middeft of those that fought against when more countries and the fide of the bill, to come to the place where Minutius was : he made the battel to ceale, and commanded to found the retreat, and fo drew back his men again into his Camp, the ROMANS being very glad also they might retire with fafety. They say Hamibal in his retiring, faid merrily The great mo- to his friends: Have not I told you (Sirs) many a time and oft, of the hanging cloud we faw on the top of the mountains, how it would break out in the end with a tempest that would fall upon us? After this battel, Fabius having stript those that were left dead in the field, retired again to his own Camp, and spake not an ill word of Minutius his companion. Minutius then being come to his Camp, affembled his Souldiers, and spake thus to them: My friends, not to err at all, enterprising great matters, it is a thing passing mans nature : but to take warning hereafter, by faults that are paft and done, it is the part of a wife and valiant man. For my felf, I acknowledge I have no less The wildom of occasion to praise Fortune, then I have also cause to complain of her. For that which long time could never teach me, I have learned by experience in one little piece of a day; and that is this; That I am not able to command, but am my felf fitter to be governed and commanded by another: and that I am but a fool to stand in mine own conceit, thinking to overcome those, of whom it is more honour to me to confeis my felf to be overcome: Therefore I tell you, that the Dillator Fabits henceforth shall be he, who alone shall command you in all things. And to let him know that we do all acknowledge the favour which we have prefently received at his hands, I will lead you to give him thanks, and will my felf be the first man to offer to obey him in all that he shall command me. These words being spoken, he commanded his Ensign-bearers to follow him, and he himself marched formost towards Fabius Camp. When he came thither, he went directly to the Distances Tent: Whereat every man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to meet him, Minutius after he had fet down his Enfigus at his feet, faid with aloud voice; O Father; and his fouldiers unto Fabius souldiers; O Masters: which name the bondmen that are infranchised, do use to them that have manumiffed them. Afterwards every man being filent, Minutius began aloud to fay untohim: My Lord Diffator, this day you have won two victories: the one of Hannibal, whom valiantly you have overcome : the fecond , of my felf your companion , whom also your wisdom and goodnels hath vanquished. By the one you have faved our lives; and by the other, you have and goodings that variquities. So have we also been overcome in two forts; the one by Hammbal to our shame, wifely taught us. So have we also been overcome in two forts; and the other by your felf, to our honour and prefervation. And therefore do I now call you my Father, finding no other Name more honourable to call you by, wherewith I might honour you: acknowledging my felf more bound unto you for the prefent grace and favour I have received of you, then unto my natural Father that begot me. For by him onely I was begotten; but by you, mine, and all these honest Citizens lives have been faved. And having spoken these words, he embraced Fabins; and fo did the Souldiers also, heartily embrace together, and kiss one another. Thus the joy was great throughout the whole Camp, and one was fo glad of another, that the tears trickled down their cheeks for joy. Now when Fabius was afterwards put out of his Office of Dictatorship, there were new Consuls chosen again: the two first followed directly Fabius former order he had begun: for they kept themselves from giving Hannibal any battel, and did alwaies fend aid to their subjects and friends, to keep them from rebellion, untill that Terentius Varro (a man of mean birth, and known to be very bold and rash) by flattering of the people, wan credit among them to be made Conful. Then they thought that he by his rashness and lack of experience, would incontinently Terential Var hazard battel, because he had cried out in all the assemblies before, that this war would be ever-77, Paulus Ja. lafting, folong as the people did chuic any of the Fabians to be their Generals: and vaunted himfelf openly, that the first day he came to see his enemies, he would overthrow them. In giving out these brave words, he affembled such a power, that the ROMANS never saw so great a number together against any enemy that they ever had: for he put into one Camp 88000 fighting men. This made Fabins and the other ROMANS, men of great wisdom and judgement, greatly afraid: because Camp under they faw no hope for Rome to rife again, if it fortuned that they should lole so great a number of the same of the sa 73,88000 men. very skilfull and expert in wars, but ill beloved of the common people, whose fury he yet feared, Fabur counted for that they had condemned him a little before to pay a great Fine to the Treasury: and after he to Paulus #had somewhat comforted him, he began to perswade and encourage him to resist the fond rashness of his companion; telling him, that he should have as much to do with Terentius Varro for the preservation and safety of his Countrey, as to fight with Hannibal for desence of the same. For they were both Martiall men, and had both a like desire to fight; the one because he knew not wherein the vantage of his strength confissed, and the other because he knew very well his weakwherein the valuage of this ittenguire of the state of th Farro : for I dare warrant you, if you keep Hannibal from battel but this year, he shall of necessity, if he tarry, confume himfelf, or else for shame be driven to flie with his Army. And the rather, hecause hitherto (though he seem to be Lord of the Field) never one yet of his enemies came to take his part; and moreover because there remains at this day in his Camp, not the third part of his Army, he brought with him out of his Countrey. Unto these perswasions, the Conful (as it is reported) answered thus : When I look into my self, my Lord Fabiu, me thinks my best way were rather to fall upon the enemies Pikes, then once again to light into the hands and voices of our Citizens. Therefore, fith the estate of the Commonwealth so requireth it, that it behoveth a man to do as you have faid, I will do my best endeavour to shew my felf a wife Captain, for your fake onely, rather then for all other that should advise me to the contrary. And so Paules departed from ROME with this mind. But Terentine his companion would in any case they should command the whole Army by turns, each his day by himself; and went to encamp hard by Hannibal, by the River Aufide, near unto the Village called CANNES. Now when it came to Aufiding fi. his day to command by turns, early in the morning he caused the signal of battel to be set out, which was a Coat-armour of Scarlet in grain, that they did lay out upon the Pavilion of the General: fo that the enemies at the first fight began to be afraid, to fee the lustiness of this new come General, and the great number of Souldiers he had also in his Hoft, in comparison of them that were not half so many. Yet Hannibal of a good courage, commanded every man to arm, and to put themselves in order of battel: and himself in the mean time taking his Horse back, followed with a few, gallopped up to the top of a little hill not very freep, from whence he might plainly discern all the ROMAN'S Camp, and saw how they did range their men in order of battel. Now one Gifcon (a man of like state and Nobility as himself) being with him at that time, told him. that the enemie feemed afar off to be a marvellous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forebead. answered him: Yea, said he, but there is another thing more to be wondred at then you think of Gifcon, Gifcon straight asked him : What ? Marry faith he, this : that of all the great number of Souldiers you see yonder, there is not a man of them called Gifcon as you are. This merry answer delivered contrary to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great weighty matter, made them all laugh. So down the hill they came laughing aloud, and told this pretty jest to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ran over all the Camp, infomuch as Hann bal himself could not hold from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN Souldiers perceiving this, began to be of a good courage, imagining that their General would not be so merrily disposed asto fall a laughing, being so near danger, if he had not perceived himself a great deal to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Further- Hannibals strdmore, he shewed two policies of a skilfull Captain in the bastel. The first was, the situation tagents at the of the place, where he put his men in order of battel, so as they had the wind on their backs; battel of which raging like a burning lightning, raised a sharp dust out of the open fandy valley, and passing Cannes. over the CARTHAGINIANS squadron, blew full in the ROMANS faces, with such a violence. that they were compelled to turn their faces, and to trouble their own rankes. The second po- Hannibals orlicy was, the form and order of his battel : for he placed on either fide of his wings, the best and der of battel valiantest Souldiers he had in all his Army; and did fill up the middest of his battel with the worst of at Cannes. his men, which he made like a point, and was farther out by a great deal, then the two wings of the front of his battel. So be commanded those of the wings, that when the ROMANS had broken his first front, and followed those that gave back, whereby the middest of his barrel should leave an hollow place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compass of his two wings, that then they should set upon them on both sides, and charge their stankes immediately, and so inclose them in behind. And this was cause of greater slaughter. For when the middle battel began to give back, and to receive the ROMAN'S within it, who pursued the other very horly, Hannibals battel changed her form : and where at the beginning it was like a point, it became now in the middeft like a cressant or half Moon. Then the Captains of the chosen Bands that lay out The staughter in both the wings, made their men to turn, some on their left hand, and some on the right, and char-of the Roman's ged the Roman's on the slankes and behind, where they were all naked; so they killed all those as the battel that could not fave themselves by flying before they were environed. They fay also, that there fell of Cannes. out another mischief by misfortune unto the Horsemen of the ROMANS, and by this occasion. The Horse of Paulus Amilias the Conful being hurt, did throw his Master on the ground: whereupon those that were next him, did light from their Horse backs to help him. The residue of the Horsemen that were a great way behind him, seeing them light, thought they had all been commanded to light: hereupon every man forfook their Horse, and fought it out on foot. Hannibal when he faw that, faid : yea marry, I had rather have them to, then delivered me bound hand and foot. But for these matters the Historiographers do dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Confuls, Varro laved himself by his Horse, with a few following him, within the City of VENUSA. Paulus being in the middeft of the throng of all the Army, his body full of Arrows that stuck fast in Paulus Amihis wounds, and his heart fore loden with grievous forrow and anguish, to fee the overthrow of his line flain at the men; was fet down by a Rock, looking for some of his enemies to come and rid him out of his battel of Can-Pain. But few could know him, his head and face was on fuch a gore bloud; infomuch as his friends and fervants also passed by thim and knew him not. And there was bur one young Gentleman of a Noble house of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, thatknew him, who did his best endeayour to fave him. For he lighted on foot prefently, and brought him his Horse, praying him to get up upon him, to prove if he could fave himself for the necessity of his Countrey, which now intreaty, and compelled him to take his Horfe back again, though the tears ran down the checks for pity: and raifing himfelf up to take him by the hand, he faid unto him: I pray you tell Fabius

Maximus from me, and witness with me, that Paulus emilius even to his laft hour hath followed his countel, and did never fwerve from the promife he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro, and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had delivered these words, he bad Lennding farewell : and running again into the fury of the flaughter, there he died amongst his slain companies. It is thought there were flain at this battel Fifty thoufand ROMANS, and Four thou-fand taken Prifoners, and other Ten thousand that were taken Prifoners in two Camps after the battel. When this noble victory was gotten, Hannibals friends gave him counfel to follow his good fortune, and to enter Roms after the scattered number that fled thither, so as within sew days following he might sup in their Capitol. A man cannot easily guess what was the cause that flayed him, that he went not, unless it was (as I think) some good fortune, or favourable God trayed thus, that he went not, unucion was (as I think) tome good rottime, of favourable God toward the ROMAN's that withflood him, and made him afraid and glad to retire. Whereupon they say, that one Barca a CARTHAGINIAN, in his anger said to Hannibal; Sir, you have the way to overcome, but you cannot use victory. Notwithstanding, this victory made a marvellous change for him, for hereupon, all ITALY in manner came in to fubmit themselves to him, where before he had no Town at commandment, nor any storehouse or Port through all ITALY : yea he did mar-vellors hardly, and with much ado victual his Army with that he could daily rob and spoil, having no certain place to retire unto, nor grounded hope to entertain these wars, but kept the field with his Army, removing from place to place, as they had been a great number of murtherers wildom. For that which before they accounted cowardlines and faint heart in Fabius, immediately after the battel, they thought it more then mans reason, and rather an heavenly wisdom and influence, that fo long forciaw the things to come, which the parties felves that afterwards felt them, gave little credit unto before. Upon this occasion, ROME reposed incontinently all their hope and trust in Fabius, and they repaired to him for counsel, as they would have ran unto some Temple or Altar for fanctuary. So as the first and chiefest cause of staying the people together from dispersing themselves abroad, as they did when Rome was taken by the Gauls, was the onely opinion and confidence they had in Fabius wildom. For where before he feemed to be a coward and timerous, when there was no danger nor misfortune happened; then when every man wept and cried out for forrow, which could not help, and that all the world was fo troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone up and down the City very modeftly, with a bold constant countenance, speaking courteously to every one, and did appeale their womanish cris and lamentations, and did forbid the common affemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corfe at their burials. Then he perswaded the Senate to assemble in countel, and did comfort up those that were Magistrates, and he alone was the onely force and power of the City: for there was not a man that bare any Office, but did caft his eye upon Fabius, to know what he should do. He it was that caused the gates of the City straight to be warded, and to keep those in for going their trancy arer

He moreover did appoint the time and place of mourning of Games. ing, and did command who oever was disposed to mourn, that he should do it privately in his own house, and to continue onely but thirty days. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, and that the City might be clean from such unclean things. So the Feast of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leave off the Sacrifices and Proceffion which they were wont to keep on Ceres day; then by their small number that were left, and forrow of those that remained, to let their enemies understand their exceeding great loss: For the gods delight to be served with glad and rejoycing hearts, and with those that are in prosperity. But all this notwithstanding, whatsoever the Priests would have done, either to pacifie the wrath of the gods, or to turn away the threatnings of these similter signs, it was forthwith done. For they did send to the Oracle of Apollo in the City of DELPHOS, one of Fabius Kinsmen surnamed Pittor. And two of the Vestal Nuns being defloured, the one was buried alive according to the Law and cuftom, and the other made her felf the correttion away. But herein the great courage and noble clemency of the Romans is marvelloully to be noted and regarded; For the Conful Terentius Varro, returning back to Rome, with the shame of his extream misfortune and overthrow, that he durft not look upon any man; the Senate notwithflanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the City to meet him, and did honourably receive him. Nay further, those that were the chief Magistrates and Senatours, among whom Fabius was one, when filence was made, they commended Varro much because he did not despair of the preservation of the Commonweal after so great calamity, but did return again to the City, to help to reduce things to order, in using the authority of the Law, and the service of the Citizens, as not being altogether under foot, but standing yet in reasonable terms of good recovery. But when they underflood that Hannibal after the battel was gone into other parts of ITALY, then they began to be of good cheer again, and fent a new Army and Generals to the field, among which the two chief Generals were Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary means in manner, wan alike glory and reputation. For Marcellus (as we have declared in his Life) was a man of speedy execution, of a quick hand, of a valiant nature, and a right martial man, as Homer calleth them that valiantly put themselves in any danger : by reason whereof, having to deal with another Captain alike venturous and valiant as himself, in all service and execution, he shewed the self boldness and courage that Hannibal did. But Fabine persisting still upon his first determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hannibal, nor ftir him at all, yet continual wars would confume him and his Army in the end, and bring them both to nought; as a common wrestler that forceth his body above his natural strength, doth in the end become a lame and bruised man : Hereupon Possidonius writeth, that the one was called the Romans Sword, Possidonius and the other their Target. And that Fabius constancy and resoluteness in wars to fight with se-words of Facurity, and to commit nothing to hazard and danger, being mingled with Marcellus heat and fury. bius and Marwas that onely which preferred the Romans Empire. For Hannibal meeting always in his way collus. the one that was furious as a strong running stream, found that his Army was continually turmovled and overhurried; and the other that was flow as a little pretty River, he found that his Army ran foftly under him without any noyle, but yet continually by little and little it did ftill confume and diminish him, untill he saw himself at the last brought to that pass, that he was weary of fighting with Marcellus, and afraid of Fabins, because he fought not. For during all the time of thele wars, he had ever these two Captains almost against him, which were made either Prætors, Confuls or Proconfuls, for either of them both had been five times before chosen Conful. Yet as for Marcellus, Hamibal had laid in ambush for him in the fift and last year of his Confulship, where he Marcellus slain fet upon him on a fudden, and flew him. But as for Fabins, he laid many baits for him, and did by an ambuth what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambushes, and other warlike policies to entrap of Hannibals. him, but he could never draw him within his danger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a little trouble, and was in good hope then to have made him fall upon his ambush he had laid for him, and this policy : He had counterfeited Letters written and fent unto him from the City of METAPONT. to pray him to come to them, and they would deliver their City into his hands; and withall, that Hannibals and fuch as were privy to the contents of the same, desired no other thing but his repair thither. These Fabius. Letters prettily quickened Fabius, infomuch as he was determined one night to have taken part of his Army, and to have gone to them : but because the figns of the Birds did promise him no good fuccels, he left off his purpole. Soon after he understood they were counterfeit Letters, made by Hannibals fine device to have drawn him our, and to have entrapped him, for whom himself lay in person in ambush near the City, looking and waiting for his coming : but the gods who would have him faved, were onely to be thanked for his happy fcape. Furthermore concerning the revolt of the Cities that were subject unto him, and the rifing of their allies and friends against them; Fabius lening thought it far better to entreat them curteoully, making them ashamed without occasion to rebell in correcting against them, rather than openly to suspect them, and to deal straightly with those that were so to of faults. be suspected. Now for this matter, it is reported that Fabius had a Souldier in his Camp that was a MARSIAN born by Nation, a valiant man of his person, and also of as Noble a House as any that were of all the allies of the ROMANS; who had practifed with other his fellows of the Band he ferved in to go ferve the enemy. Fabins hearing of this practife he went about, gave him no ill countenance for it, but calling him to him, he faid : I must confess there is no reckoning made of you, as your good fervice doth deferve; wherefore for this time (faith he) I blame the petty Note how F4-Captains onely, which in such fort do bestow their good will and favour at adventure, and not by bias reclaimed delert : But henceforth it shall be your own fault if you do not declare your mind unto me , and an evil Soulbetween you and me make me privy of your lack and necessity. When he had spoken these words dier. to him, he gave him a very good Horse for service, and did reward him with other honourable gifts, as men of good fervice and defert have commonly bestowed on them. And this did so encourage his Souldiers thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and ferviceable Souldier to the ROMANS. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders of Horses, and such like as take upon them to tame bruit beafts, should sooner make them leave their savage and churlish nature by gentle usage and manning of them, then by beating and shackling of them. And so a Governour of Men, should rather correct his Necessary Souldiers by patience, gentleness and elemency, then by rigor, violence or severity: Otherwise he should Rules for a handle them more rudely and sharply then Husbandmen do Fig-trees, Olive-trees and wild Pomegranates; who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, do alter their hard and wild nature, and cause them in the end to bring forth good Figs, Olives and Pomegranates. Another time certain Caprains of his brought him word, that there was one of their Souldiers which would ever go out of the Camp, and leave his Enfign. He asked them, what manner of man he was: They anfwered him all together, that he was a very good Souldier, and that they could hardly find out such another in all their Bands as he : and therewithall they told him of fome notable fervice they had feen him do in person. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquiry to know what the cause was that made him go fo oft out of the Camp : in the end he found he was in love with a young Woman, and that to go fee her was the cause he did so oft leave his Ensign, and did put his life in so great danger, for that the was to far off. When Fabius understood this, he fent certain Souldiers (unknowing to the Souldier) to bring the Woman away he loved, and willed them to hide her in his Tent; and then called he the Souldier to him, that was a Lucanian born, and taking him aside, said unto him thus : My friend, it hath been told me, that thou haft lyen many nights out of the Camp, against the Law of Arms and Order of the ROMANS; but therewithall I understand also that good service : but from henceforth I will give thee in custody to such a one, as shall make meaccount of thee. The Souldier was blanke when he heard these words. Fabius with that, caused the Woman he was in love with to be brought forth, and delivered her into his hands, faying unto him: This Woman hereafter shall answer me thy body to be forthcoming in the Camp amongst us : and from henceforth thy deeds shall winess for the rest, that thy love unto this Woman, may be no cloke for thy departing out of the Camp for any wicked practife or intent. Thus much we find written concerning this matter. Moreover, Fabisa after fuch a fort recovered again the City of TAREN-Tum, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMANS, which they had loft by treason. It fortune, and brought to the tuned there was a young man in his Camp, a TARENTINE born, that had a Sifter within Tatuned there was a young RENTUM, which was very faithfull to him, and loved him marvellous dearly: now there was a Captain, a BRUTIAN born, that fell in love with her, and was one of those to whom Hannibal had committed the charge of the City of TARENTUM. This gave the young Souldier the Tanau communicum in charge of the carry of the control of the carry services and the carry services are carry services and the carry services and the carry services are carry services are carry services and the carry services are carry services are carry services are carry services and the carry services are carry servines are carry services are carry services are carry services are vealed his intent to Fabius, and with his privity Hed from his Camp, and got into the City of Ta-RENTUM, giving it out in the City, that he would altogether dwell with his Sifter. Now for a few days at his first coming the Brut IAN Captain lay alone by himself, at the request of the maidhis Sifter, who thought her Brother had not known of her love; and shortly after the young fellow took his Sifter afide, and faid unto her: My good Sifter, there was a great speech in the Ro-MANS Camp, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefest Captains of the Garrison: 1 pray the if it be fo, let me know what he is; for fo he be a good fellow, and an honeft man (as they lay he is) I care not : for wars that turneth all things topfi-turvy, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of , and ftill maketh vertue of necessity, without respect of shame. And it is a special good fortune, at such time as neither right nor reason rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His Sifter hearing him speak these words, fent for the BRUTIAN Captain, to bring him acquainted with her Brother, who liked well of both their loves, and endeavoured himself to frame his Sifters love in better fort towards him, then it was before: by reason whereof, the Captain also began to trust him very much. So this young TARENTINE faw it was very easie to win and turn the mind of this amorous and mercinary man, with hope of great gifts that were promifed him, and Fabius should perform. Thus do the most part of writers set down this story. Howbeit fome writers fay, that this Woman who wan the BRUTIAN Captain, was not a TAREN-TINE, but a BRUTIAN born, whom Fabius it is said, kept afterwards for his Concubine, and that the understanding the Captain of the Brutians (who lay in garrifon within the City of TARENTUM) was also a Brutian born, and of her own native Countrey, made Fabius Tarenium won privy to her intent, and with his confent, the coming to the walls of the City, fpake with this Bru-TIAN Captain, whom the handled in fuch fort, that they wan him. But whileft this gere was a brewing, Fabius, because he would train Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote unto the Souldiers of RHEGIO, which belonged to the ROMANS, that they should enter the borders of the Bru-TIANS, and lay fiege to the City of CAULONIA, and raze it to the ground. These RHEGIAN Souldiers were about the number of Eight thouland, and the most of them Traitors and runagates from one Camp to another : and the worst fort of them and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, fo that in losing them all, the loss were nothing to the Commonwealth, and the forrow much less. So Fabins thought, that putting these sellows out for a prey to Hannibal (as a stale to draw him from those quarters) he should pluck him by this means from TARENTUM; and so it came to pass. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his Army to entrap them : and in the mean time Fabius went to lay fiege to TARENTUM, where he had not lien fix days before it, but the young man (who together with his Sifter had drawn the BRUTIAN Captain to this treason) stole our one night to Fabius, to inform him of all, having taken very good marks of that fide of the wall the BRUTIAN Captain had taken charge of, who had promifed him to keep it fecret, and to fuffer them to enter that came to affault that fide. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether upon the BRUTTANS executing this treason, but went himself in person to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: and in the mean feason, he gave a general affault to all parts of the City (as well by sea as by Land) with great shouts and cries. Then the BRUTIAN Captain seeing all the Citizens and garrifons run to that part where they perceived the noise to be greatest, made a signall unto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought a pace, whereupon himself with his company scaled the walls, and so wan the City. But it appeared here, that ambition overcame him: for first he commanded they should kill all the BRUTIANS, because it should not be known he had won the City by treason. But this bloudy policy failed him: for he miffed not onely of the glory he looked for, but most deservedly he had the reproach of cruelty and falsshood. At the taking of this (ity, a marvellous number of the TARENTINES were flain, besides there were fold Thirry thousand of the chiefest of them, and all the City was facked: and of the spoil there was carried to the common store treasure at Rome Three thousand Talents. It is reported also, that when they did spoil and carry away all other spoils lest behind, the Recorder of the City asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to do with the gods, meaning the Tables, and their Images: and to that Fabius answered him, Let us leave the TARENTINES their gods that be angry with them. This notwithflanding, he carried from thence Hercules statue, that was of a monstrous bigness, and caused it to be set up in the Capitol, and withall did set up his own Image in brass on horseback by him.

But in that act he shewed himself far harder hearted than Marcellus had done, or to say more truly, thereby he made the world know how much Marcellus courtefie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at, as we have written in his Life. News being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTUM was belieged, he marched presently with all speed possible to raise the siege: and they say he had almost come in time, for he was within forty furlongs of the City when he understood the troth of the taking of it. Then faid he out aloud, Sure the Romans have their Hannibal too: for as we wan TARENTUM, fo have we loft it. But after that, to his friends he faid plainly (and that was the first time they ever heard him speak it) that he saw long before, and now appeared plainly, that they could not possibly with this small power keep ITALY. Fabius made his Triumph and entry into Rome Fabius second the fecond time, by reason of taking this City: and his fecond Triumph was much more honourable Triumph. than the first, as of a valiant Captain that held out still with Hannibal, and easily met with all his fine policies, much like the flight tricks of a cunning wreftler, which carried not now the former roughness and strength any more, because that his Army was given to take their ease, and grown to delicacy, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly also for that it was fore wasted and diminished, through the sundry soughten battles and blows they had been at. Now there was one Mar-CIL LIVIM a ROMAN, that was Governous of TARENTUM at that time when Hannibal took it. and nevertheless kept the Castle still out of Hannibals hands, and so held it still untill the City came again into the hands of the ROMANS. This Livius spited to see such honour done to Fabius, so that one day in open Senate, being drowned with envy and ambition, he burst out and said: that it that one day in open schae, that was cause of taking of the City of TARENTUM again. Fabius smiling Fabius with was minion, not a word, man you fall thou fayeft true, for if thou hadft not loft it, I had never Answer. won it again. But the ROMANS in all other respects did greatly honour Fabius, and specially for that they chose his Son Consul. He having already taken possession of his Office, as he was dispatching certain causes touching the Wars, his Father (whether it was for debility of his age, or to prove his Son) took his horse to come to him, and rode through the press of the people that thronged about him, having business with him. But his Son seeing him coming afar off, would not fuffer it, but fent an Officer of his unto him, to command him to light off his horfe, and to come on foot if he had any thing to do with the Conful. This commandment milliked the people that heard A ftrange comon toot it he nad any rning to up what the Conful the and they all looked upon Fabius, but faid not a word: thinking with themselves, that the Conful the Son to the did great wrong to his Fathers greatness. So he lighted straight, and went a good round pace to em- Fathe brace his Son, and faid unto him; You have reason Son, and do well to shew over whom you com- The Father of mand, understanding the authority of a Consul, which place you have received : For it is the direct beyeth his Sona course, by the which we and our ancestors have encreased the Roman Empire : preferring ever the honour and state of our Countrey, above Father, Mother or Children. And truly they fay, that Fabius him. Great-Grandfather, being the greatest and most Noble person of ROME in his time, having five times been Conful, and had obtained many Triumphs, for divers Honourable and fundry Victories he had won : was contented after all thefe, to be his Sons Lieutenant, and to go to the wars with him, he being chosen Conful. And last of all, the Conful his Son returning home to ROME a Conquerour. inhistriumphing Chariot drawn with four Horses, he followed him on Horseback also, in troop with the reft; thinking it honour to him, that having authority over his Son in the right of a Father, and being also the Noblett Man of all the Citizens, so taken and reputed, nevertheless he willingly submitted himself to the Law and Magistrate, who had authority of him. Yet besides all this, he had far more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, than those already spoken of. But it fortuned that this Son of Fabius died beforehim, whose death he took patiently, like a wise man, and a good Father. Now the custom being at that time, that at the death of a Noble man, their nearest Kinfman should make a Funeral Oration in his praise at their Obsequies : he himself made the same Oration in honour of his Son, and did openly speak it in the Market-place, and moreover wrote it, and delivered it out abroad. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was sent into SPAIN, who drave out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had overthrown them in many battles, and had conquered many great Cities, and greatly advanced the honour and estimation of the state of Rome: for the which at his return, he was as much, or rather more honoured, beloved and efteemed, than any other that was in the City of ROME. Hereupon Scipio being made Conful, confidered that the peo- Scipio Conful, ple of ROME looked for some great matter at his hands, above all other. Therefore he thought, to take upon him to fight against Hannibal in ITALY, he should but sollow the old manner, and tread too much in the steps of the old man : whereupon he resolved immediately to make wars in Africk, and to burn and destroy the Countrey even unto CARTHAGE gates, and so to transfer the wars out of ITALY into LYBIA, procuring by all possible device he could, to put it into the peoples heads, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarily, perswading himself that the enterprize this young Fabius was arash youth took in hand, was utterly to overthrow the Commonweal, or to put the State of ROME rain youth took in hand, was utterly to overthrow the Commonweal, or to put the State of ROME gainft the in great danger: deviled to put ROME in the greatest fear he could possible, without sparing speech counsel and or deed he thought might serve for his purpose, to make the people change from that mind. Now he device of Scicould so cunningly work his purpose, what with speaking and doing, that he had drawn all the Senate pio African. to his opinion. But the people judged, it was the fecret envy he bare to Scipio's glory, that drew him to encounter this device, onely to blemish Scipio's Noble fortune; fearing, left if he should happen to do some honourable service (as to make an end altogether of this war, or otherwise to draw Hannibal out of ITALY) that then it would appear to the world, he had been too foft, or too negligent, to draw this war out to such a length. For my part, methinks the onely matter that moved Fabius by reason or the great danger depending to fore against him (whether it were through amwards he went further than he should, contending too fore against him (whether it were through amwards he went further than he should, contending too fore against him (whether it were through amwarus ne went nutries main in mount, command to the greatness of Scipio; confidering also he did his bition or oblinacy) feeking to hinder and supprets the greatness of Scipio; confidering also he did his outout or continue y) seeking to immee and appears are greaters at supply a commenting and its daths belt to perfusade Craffus, Scipio's companion in the Confulfhip, that he should not grant unto him the leading of the Army, but if he thought good to go into AFRICK, to make wars upon the CARTHAleading of the Army, but it ne thought good to go him of Krick, to make wats upon the CARTHA-GINIANS, that he thould rather go himfelf. And moreover, he was the let that they gave him no Money for maintenance of these wars. Scipio hereupon being turned over to his own credit, to surnish himlest as he could, he levied great sums of Money in the Cities of Thus CAN, who for the great love mutett as necrouse, ne review great over they bare him, made contribution towards his journey. And fraffin remained at home, both because they bare him, made contribution towards his journey. they pare unit, many contributions for covetous man of nature; as also, because he was the chiefest Prelate ne was a tort and no amountous not corresponding to the state of the s home, that had great defire to go this journey with him. For he cryed out with open mouth, in all nome, that has great active to be that Scipio was not contented onely to fly Hamibal, but that he would carry with him befides the whole force of ITALY that remained: alluring the youth with fweet would carry with min believe the minor to leave their Wives, their Fathers, Mothers, and their Counbaits of vain hope, and perfurading them to leave their Wives, trey, even now when their enemy knocked at ROME gates, who did ever conquer, and was never yet conquered. These words of Fabins did so damp the ROMANS, that they appointed Scipio should furnish his journey onely with the Army that was in SICILIA, saving that he might supply to them if he would, three hundred of the best Souldiers that had served him faithfully in Spain. And so it doth would, there into this prefere, that Fabius both did and faid all things according to his wonted manner,

THE COMPARISON OF PERICLES with FABIUS.

Ere have you heard what is written of these two great Persons. And for as much as they have both left behind them, many notable examples of vertue, as well in martial matters, as in civil government, let us begin to compare them together. First of all, Pericles began to govern the Commonweal, at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefest prosperity, and of greater power and wealth, than ever they had been of before or fince. The which might feem to be a cause of the continual maintenance of the same in security without danger of falling, not fo much for their worthiness, as for their common power and felicity: where contrariwise Fabius acts fell out in the most dishonourable and unfortunate time that ever happened to his countrey, in which he did not onely keep the City in good frate from declining, but raifed it up, and delivered it from calamity, and brought it to be better than he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and success, the victories and triumphs of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deeds at arms of Tolmides, gave good cause to Pericles, to entertain his City in Feafts and Plays, whileft he did govern the fame ; and he did not find it in fuch ill case and distress, that he was driven to defend it by force of arms, or to conquer that again which before was loft. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he saw before him many overthrows, great flying away, much murder, great flaughters of the Generals of the ROMAN Armies, the Lakes, the Plains, the Woods filled with scattered Men, the people overcome, the Flouds and Rivers running all agore-blood (by reason of the great flaughter) and the stream carrying down the dead bodies to the main sea: cid take in hand the government of his Countrey, and by a course far contrary to all other, he did so underprop and bear up the same, that he kept it from falling flat to the ground, amongst those ruines and overthrows other had brought it to before him. Yet a man may fay also, that it is no matter of so great difficulty to rule a City already brought low by adversity, and which compelled by necessity, is contented to be governed by a wife man: as it is to bridle and keep under the infolency of a people, puft up with pride and prefumption of long prosperity, as Pericles found it amongst the ATHENIANS. The great multitude also of so many grievous calamities as lighted on the ROMANS necks at that time, did plainly thew Fabius to be a grave and conftant man, which would never give way unto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could ever be removed from that he had at the first determined. The winning and recovering again of TARENTUM, may well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wan by force : and the Cities of CAMPANIA, unto the Ille of EUBOEA : excepting the City of CAPUA, which the Confuls Fulvius and Appius recovered again. But it seemeth that Fabius never wan battle, fave that onely for which he triumphed the first time : where Pericles set up nine Triumphs, of Battles and Victories he had won, as well by Sea as by Land. And fo also, they cannot alledge such an act done by Pericles as Fabius did, when he rescued Minutius out of the hands of Hannibal, and saved a whole Army of the ROMANS: which doubtless was a famous act, and proceeded of a noble mind, great wildom, and an honourable heart. But Pericles, again did never commit fo gross an errour as Fabins did, when he was out-reached and deceived by Hannibals fine stratagem of his Oxen: who having found his Enemy by chance to have thut himself up in the straight of a valley, did fusfer him to escape in the night by a subtilty, and in the day by plain force: for he was prevented by overmuch delay, and fought withall by him he kept inclosed. Now if it be requisite, a and high Bilhop, who by the Law of their recingion, was continuous deviling to flay the young men at Bilhop of Rome his labour loft that way, took again another course to cross Scipro, deviling to flay the young men at

These wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of such renown and fame within Rome, that there was no talk but of Scipio. Fabius notwithstanding desisted not to make a new request, being of opinions to the scipio. nion they should send him a Successor; alledging no other cause nor reason, but a common speech of every body; that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, fo great exceedcrety buy; that it was a was because it is a rare matter to see one man happy in all things. These ing prosperity and good success, because it is a rare matter to see one man happy in all things. These words did fo much mislike the people, that they thought him an envious troubletome man, or elfe they worms use to much immed him fearful; and that his courage failed with his firength, fearing Hannibal mought in age that many time treating, and though Hamibal was forced to leave IT ALY, and to remove doubtfully than he needed. For now though Hamibal was forced to leave IT ALY, and to return into Africk, yet Fabius would not grant, that the peoples joy and fecurity they thought they were in, was altogether clear, and without tear and miftruft; but gave it out, that then they were in greateft danger, and that the Commonweal was breeding more mitchief now than before. For when Hannibal (laid be) (hall return home into Africk, and come before Carthage walls, the Ro-MANS shall be less able to abide him there, then they have been before: and Scipio moreover shall meres than the ten above a some man mere, that the bloud of fo many Prætors, Diceators, and Conmeet with an Army yetwarm, and embrued with the bloud of fo many Prætors, Diceators, and Confuls of Rome, which they have overcome, and put to the Sword in ITALY. With these uncomfortable speeches, he ftill troubled and disquieted the whole City, perswading them that notwithstanding the war was transferred out of ITALY into Africx, yet that the occasion of fear was no less near unto ROME, than it was ever before. But within fhort space after, Scipio having overcome Hannibal unto Mona, main was trained and trodden under foot the glory and pride of Carthage, he brought a greater joy to Rome than they ever looked for ; And by this noble victory of his, he railed up again the declining state of the Empire of Rome, which a little before was falling downright. Howbeit Fabius lived not to the end of this War, nor ever heard while he lived the joyfull news of Hannibals happy overthrow, neither were his years prolonged to fee the happy affured prosperity of his Country, For about that time that Hannibal departed out of ITALY, a fickness took him, whereof he died. The stories declare that the THE BANS buried Epaminondas at the common charges of the people; be cause he died in fo great poverty, that when he was dead, they found nothing in the house but a little The death of iron fpit. But the ROMANS contratiwife, having fent Scipio into AFRICK to make wars with the CARTHAGINIANS, wan all that they took in hand: where their General did not overcome the enemy by fortune, but by valiantness. So that the wildom of the one is winneffed, by the ruine of his Countrey; and the error of the other teftified, by the happy event of that he would have let. Now the fault is alike in a General, to fall into danger, for lack of forecast: as for cowardliness to let slip a fit opportunity offered, to do any notable piece of fervice. For like default and lack of experience maketh the one too hardy, and the other too fearfull. And thus much touching the wars. Now for civil government : it was a foul blot to Pericles, to be the author of wars. For it is thought, that he alone was the cause of the same, for that he Fernics and Fabius for ci- Would not have them yield to the LACEDEMONIANS in any respect. And yet methinks Fabius Mawould not use the state of the CARTHAGINIANS, but flood firm and bold in all danger to maintain the Empire of his Country against them. But the goodness and clemency Fabius shewed unto Minutius, doth much commend Pericks acculations and practiles, against Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being Nobleand good men, and taking part with the Nobility, whom he expuled out of ATHENS, and banished for a time. So was Pericles power and authority in the Commonweal greater : by reason whereof he did ever foresee, that no General in all his time did rashly attempt any thing hurtfull unto the Commonweal, except Tolmides onely: who fled from him, and in despite of him went to fight with the BOSQTIANS, where he was flain. As for all other Generals, they wholly put themselves into his hands, and did obey him for the greatness of his authority. But Fabius, although for his part he never committed any fault, and that he went orderly to work in all government; yet because he was not of power to keep others from doing ill, it seemeth in this respect he was deper octained in Athens, the Rofective. For if Fabius had carried like authority in Rome, as Pericles did in Athens, the Rofective. MANS had not faln into fo great mifery as they did. And for Liberality, the one shewed it, in refufing the Money offered him: and the other in giving unto those that needed, and redeeming his poor captive Countrey men. And yet Fabius might dispend no great Revenue, for his whole Receits came onely to fix Talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to fay how rich he was, who had coming in to him, great presents by his authority, as well of the Subject, as of the Friends and Allies of the ATHENI-ANS, as also of Kings and frange Princes: yet he never took Bribe for all that of any person living. And to conclude, as for the impusous building of Temples, the stately Works and common Buildings: The Buildings put all the Ornaments together that ever were in ROME, before the times of the Cefars, they are not to be compared with thole, wherewith Perioles did beautifie and adorn the City of ATHENS. For rang comparation, neither in quality nor quantity was there any proportion or like comparation, between the exceeding sumptuousness of the one, and of the other.

LCIBIADES by his Fathers fide, was anciently descended of Eurysaces, that Alcibiades was the Son of Ajax, and by his Mothers fide of Alemaon ; for his Mother Di- flock, nomacha, was the Daughter of Megacles. His Father Clinias having armed and fet forth a Galley at his own proper cofts and charges, did win great honour in the battle by fea, that was fought along the coaft of ARTEMISIUM, and he was flain afterward in another battle fought at CORONEA, against the he was slain afterward in another battle rought as Ondones, Some Aleibiades Turors, were Pericles and Ariphron, Xan-Aleibiades Turors, were Pericles and Ariphron, Xan-Aleibiades Turors.

For it appeareth not, neither was it ever written, what were the Names of the Mothers of Nicias, of Demosthenes, of Lamachus, of Phor- The Mothers mion, of Thrasbulus, and of Theramenes; all which were notable famous men in their time. And to of famous men the contrary, we find the Nurse of Alcibiades, that she was a LACEDAMO NIAN born, and was called never known Amicla, and that his Schoolmaster was called Zophyrus : of the which, Antisthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beauty, it made no matter if we spake not of it, yet I will a Alcibiades little touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull fair, being a Child, a Boy, and a Man, and that at all beauty. times, which made him marvellous amiable, and beloved of every man. For where Euripides faith, Alcibiades lifetimes, which made him marvellous amiable, and beloved of every lital. And yet it proved true in Alcibiades, though in few other; for he was passing fair even cation of these to his latter time, and of good temperature of body. They write of him also, that his tongue was some- two Greek what fat, and it did not become him ill, but gave a certain natural pleasant grace in his talk: which A- words Kee and ristophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that did counterfeit a lisping grace with his tongue : This Alcibiades, with his fat listing tongue,

The Son of Clinias, would lift it thus somewhiles, And sure he lisped never a lie, but rightly hit his wiles. And Archippus another Poet also, mocking the Son of Alcibiades, faith thus:

Because he would be like his Father every way, In his long trailing gown he would go jetting day by day. And counterfeit his speech, his countenance and face ; As though dame nature had him given therein a perfect grace; To lift and look afide, and hold his head awry,

Even as his Father look't and lift, so would be prate and pry.

For his manners they altered and changed very oft with time, which is not to be wondred at, seeing his marvellous great prosperity, as also adversity that followed him afterwards. But of all the Alcihialce great desires he had, and that by nature he was most enclined to, was ambition, seeking to have the upper hand in all things, and to be taken for the best person: as appeareth by certain of his deeds, and notable fayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wreftling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to have given him the fall, he got his fellows arm in his mouth, and bit so hard, as he would have easen it off. The other feeling him bite so hard, let go his hold ftraight, and faid unto him: What Aleibiades, biteft thou like a Woman? No marry do Inot(quothhe) but like a Lyon. Another time being but a little boy, he played as Skails in the midft of the street with other of his companions, and when his turn came about to throw, there came a cart laden by chance that way : Alcibiades prayed the carter to flay a while, untill he had played our his game, because the skails were fet right in the high way where the cart should pass over. The carter was a stubborn knave, and would not fray for any request the Boy could make, but drave his Horse on still, in so much as other boys gave back to lethin go on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the ther boys gave back to lethin go on: but Alcibiades fell flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the carter drive over and be durft. The carter being afraid, plucked back his Horse to stay them: the Alcibiades flu-neighbours frighted to fee the danger, ran to the boy in all hafte crying our. Afterwards when he was put to school to learn, he was very obedient to all his Masters that taught him any thing, javing that he distance to learn to play on the Flute or Recorder: faying, that it was no gentlemanly quality. For, A vile thing to faidhe, to play on the Viol with a flick, doth not alter mans favour, nor difference any gentleman: but otherwife, to play on the Flute, his couprenance altereth and changeth fo off, that his familiar friends can feant know him. Moreover the Harp or Viol doth not let him that playeth on them, from speaking, or finging as he playeth; where he that playeth on the Flute, holdeth his mouth so hard to it, that it taketh not onely his words from him but his voice. Therefore faid he, let the Children of the THE-BANS play on the Flute, that cannot tell how so speak: as for the ATHENIANS, we have (as our forefathers tell us) for Protecters and Patrons of our Countrey, the goddels Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in old time (as it is faid) brake the Flute, and the other pulled his skin over his ears, that played on a Flure. Thus Alcibiades alledging these reasons, partly in sport, and partly in good earnest, did not onely himself leave to learn to play on the Flute, but he turned his companions minds also quite from it. For these words of Alcibiades, ran from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reason to despite playing on the Flure, and that he mocked all those that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the Flute, was put out of the number of honest and liberal exercises, and the Flute it felf was thought a vile inftrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the acculations Antiphon wrote against Alcibiades, it is declared : that when he was a Roy, he fied our of his tusors house, into the house of Democrates one of his lovers, and how Ariphron one of his twors thought so have made a headle cry him through the City; but Pericle, would not furter him, faying, that if he were dead, they should know it but one day sconer by crying of him: and if he were alive, that is would be furth a frame to him while he lived, that he had bin better he had never been heurd of again. The fame Antiphon accuseth him further, that he had killed a servant of his that attended on hims, in the wraftling place of Sibyrius, with a blow of a staff. But there is no re-fon to credit his writing, who confessed he speaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did bear him. Now Braight there were many great and rich men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad Secrettes love to get his good will. But Secretes Love unto him had another end and cause, which wineffed that Alcibiades had a natural inclination to vertue. Who perceiving that vertue did appear in him, and was joyned with the other beauty of his face and body, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignity and authority, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chiefest of the City, as of strangers, feeking to entice him by flattery, and by many other pleafures: he took upon him to Protect him from them all, and not to fuffer to goodly an imp to look the hope of the good fruit of his youth. For fortune doth never to intangle nor frare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let and hinder him fo, that Philosophy thould not take hold on him with her free, severe and quick reafons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, affayed with all delights, and thut up as it were in their company that feafted him with all pleasures, onely to turn him that he should not hearken to Socrates words, who fought to bring him up at his charge, and to teach him. But Alsibiades notwithflanding, having a good natural wie, knew what Socrates was, and went to him, refusing the company of all his rich friends and their flatteries, and fell in a kind of familiar friendfhip with Socrates. Whom when he had heard speak, he noted his words very well, that they were no perswasions of a man seeking his dishonefty, but one that gave him good counfel, and went about to reform his faults and imperfections, and to pluck down the pride and prefumption that was in him : then, as the common Proverb faith, Like to the craven Cock, he drooped down his wings,

And did think with himself, that all Socrates love and following of young men, was indeed a thing fent from the gods, and ordained above for them, whom they would have preferred, and put into the pathway of honor. Therefore he began to despise himself, and greatly to reverence Socrates, taking pleasure in his good using of him, and much embraced his vertue: fo as he had (he wift not how) an image of love graven in his heart, or rather (as Place faith) a mutual love, to wit, an holy and honest affection towards Socrates. Infomuch as all the world wondred at Alcibiades, to fee him commonly at Socrates hoard, to play, to wreftle, and to lodge in the wars with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other welwillers, who could not fo much as have a good look at his hands, and befides became dangerous to fome, as it is faid he was unto Anytus, the Son of Anthemion, being one of those that loved him well. Anytus, making good chear to certain strangers his friends that were come to fee him, went and prayed Alcibiades to come and make merry with them : but he refused to go. For he went to make merry with certain of his companions at his own house, and after he had well taken his cups, he went to Anyray house to counterfeit the fool amongst them; and staying at the halldoor, and seeing Anytas table and cupboard full of plate of filver and gold, he commanded his servants to take away half of it, and carry it home to his house. But when he had thus taken his pleasure, he would come no nearer into the house, but went his way home. Anytus friends and guests milliking this strange part of Alcibiades, said it was shamefully and boldly done to abuse Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, said Anytus : for he hath left us fome, where he might have taken all. All other also that made much of him, he served after that fort, faving a stranger that came to dwell in ATHENS; who being but a poor man as the voice went, fold all that he had, whereof he made about an hundred Stateres, which he brought unto Alcibiades, and prayed him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades began to be merry, and being very glad to understand his good will towards him, took his honest offer, and prayed him to come to supper to him : so he welcomed him very heartily, and made him good chear. When supper was done, he gave him his Money again, and commanded him not to fail the next morning to meet him where the Farms and beral fact. Lands of the City are wont to be let out to those that bid most, and charged him he should outbid all The poor man would fain have excused himself, saying, the Farms were too great for him to hire : But Alcibiades threatned to whip him, if he would not do it : For befides the defire he had to pleafure him, he bare a private grudge against the ordinary Farmers of the City. The next morning the stranger was ready in the market-place, where they did cry out the letting of their Farms, and he raifed one to a Talent more than all other did offer. The other Farmers were as mad with him as could be, that they all did fer upon him, crying out; Let him put in fecurity straight, supposing he could have found none. The stranger was marvellous blank thereat, and began to shrink back. Then cryed Alcibiades our aloud to the Officers that farethere to take the best offers : I will be his furety, faith he, put me in the Book, for he is a friend of mine. The Farmers hearing him fay fo, were at their wits end, and wift not what to do. For they being always accustomed to pay their yearly Rent as it went before, by the help of the reft of the years that followed after : perceiving now that they should not be able to pay the arrearages of the Rent due to the Commonweal, and seeing no other remedy, they prayed him to take a piece of Money, and to leave the bargain. Then Alcibiades would in no wife he should take less than a Talent, which they gave him willingly. So Alcibiades suffered the stranger then to depart, and made him gain by his device. Now Socrates love which he bare him, though it had many mighty and great adverfaries, yet it did fray much Alcibiades, fometime by gentle nature, fometime by his grave countell and advice : so as the reason thereof took so deep root in him, and did so pierce his heart, that many times the sears ran down his cheeks. Another time also being garried away with the enticement of flatterers, that held up his humour with all pleafure and delights, he stole away from Socrates, and made him run after him to fetch him again, as if he had been a flave Alcibiales ran that had run away from his Mafters house: for Alcibiades flood in awe of no man but Socrates onely. and indeed he did reverence him, and did despite all other. And therefore Cleanthes was wont to fay, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the ears ; but that he gave his other lovers hold, which Socrates never fought for: for to fay truly, Alcibiades was much given over to lust and pleasure. And Alcibiades giperadventure it was that Thucydides meant of him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of body, yen to pleafure and diffolute of life. Those that marred Alcibiades quite, did still prick forward his ambition and defire of honour, and did put him in the head to thrust himself into great matters betimes, making him believe that if he did but once begin to shew himself to deal in matters of state, he would not onely blemish and deface all other Governours, but far excell Pericles, in authority and power among the Grecians. For like as Iron by fire is made fost, to be wrought in any form, and by cold also is thur and hardened again : even to Alcibiades being puffed up with vanity and opinion of himself, as oft as Socrates took him in hand, was made fast and firm again by his good perswasions, in so much that when he saw his own fault and folly, and how far wide he had strayed from vertue, he became fuddenly very humble and lowly again. Now on a time when he was grown to mans state, he went into a Grammar School, and asked the School-master for one of Homers books. The School-mafter answered him, He had none of them : Alcibiades up with his fift and gave him a Alcibiales good box on the ear, and went his way. Another Grammarian told him on a time he had Homer flruck a which he had corrected. Alcibiades replyed, Why what meanest thou, to stand teaching little Children Schoolmaster their A, B, C, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach young men not boys? Another time because he had be came and knocked at Pericles gate, defirous to speak with him: answer was made him, He was not his School at leifure now, for that he was builty occupied by himself, thinking on his reckonings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, faid he, going his way, it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no account at all. Moreover, being but a young boy, he was at the journey of POTIDEA, where he lay still with Socrates, who would never let him be from him in all battles and skirmishes he Alcibiades first was in: among which there was one very hot and bloody, where they both fought valiantly, and Alci- Souldier fare biades was hurt. But Socrates stepped before him, and did defend him so valiantly before them all, that with Socrates. he faved him and his weapon out of the enemies hand. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in ved by Secrater equity and reason, was due unto Socrates: but yet the Captains would fain have judged it on Alcibiades fide, because he was of a Noble house. But Socrates, because he would encrease his desire of honour, and would prick him forward to honest and commendable things, was the very first that witnessed Alcibiades had deferred it: and therefore prayed the Captains to judge him the Crown and compleat armour. Afterwards, in the battle of DELION, the ATHENIANS having received the overthrow, Alcibiales fra Socrates retired with a few other on foot. Alcibiades being on horfeback, and overtaking him, would ved Socrates not go from him, but kept him company, and defended him against a troop of his abenies that followed him, and flew many of his company. But that was a pretty while after, and before he gave a the battle of box on the ear unto Hipponicus, Callias Father; who was one of the greatest men of power in the Delion.

Howbeit fome fay, it was not Hipponics: that gave her to him, but Calling afterwards in marriage. Howbeit fome fay, it was not Hipponics: that gave her to him, but Calling afterwards at the birth of the first Child he had by her, Son, with ten Talents of Gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of the first Child he had by her, Son, with ten Talents of Gold Wall have promifed him upon contract, if his Wife had Children, he asked ten Talents more, faying, they were promifed him upon contract, if his Wife had Children, But Calliar fearing left this was an occasion fought of him to lie in wait to kill him for his Goods: declared openly to the people, that he made him his Heir generall, if he died without Heirs special of his body. This Gentlewoman Hipparete being an honest true Wite to Aleibiades, misliking her Hufand did fo much mifule her, 2s to entertain common light ftrumpers, as well Citizens as ftrangers; the went abroad one day to her Brothers houle, and told him of it. Alcibiades passed not for it, and made well autom one day to lice alrounds money and by Wife if the would, prefere her caufe of divorce no further reckoning of the matter: but onely bad his Wife if the would, prefere her caufe of divorce Hippartical before the Judge. So she went thinker her felf, to sue the divorce between them, according to the Hipparticinem octore the jouge, so me were times a content of the hand, and carried her through the market-place to be divorced Law, but Alcibiades being there also, took her by the hand, and carried her through the market-place from Alcibia home to his house, and no man durft meddle between them, to take her from him: And so she continome to his house, and no man units means between disch, to take her from him : Alan in the continued with him all the days of her life, which was not long after; for fine died, when Aleibiades was in his journey he made to E PH ESUS. This force Aleibiades uled, was not thought altogether unlawfull, nor uncivil, because it seemeth that the Law was grounded upon this cause: that the Wise which would be divorced from her Husband, should go her self openly before the Judge to put up her comwould be divorced from the randoms, the Husband might come to speak with his Wife, and seek to plaint, to the end, that by this means, the Husband might come to speak with his Wife, and seek to plaint, to the city, that by this includes had a marvellous fair great Dog, that coft him threefcore and ten Minas, and he cut off histail that was his chief beauty: when his friends reproved him, and told him how every man blamed him for it; he fell a laughing, and told them he had that he fought. For, Alcibiales faithhe, I would have the ATHENIANS rather prate upon that, than they should fay worse of me. great Dog. Moreover, it is faid, the first time that Alcibiades spake openly in the Commonweal, and began to Michiales lar- deal in matters, was upon a gift of Money he gave unto the people, and not of any pretence or former purpose he had to do it. One day as he came through the market-place, hearing the people very nict purpore ne name to work. One way as the collection of the saked what the matter was; they told him it was about Money certain men had given to the people: Then Aleibiades went to them, and gave them Money out of his own purse. The people were so glad at that, as they sell to shouting and clapping of their hands, in token of thankfulness: and himself was so glad for company, that he forgat a Quail he had under his gown, which was so afraid of the noife, that the took her flight away. The people feeing the Quail, made a greater noife than before, and many rofe out of their places to runafter her; fo that in the end, it was taken up by man octore, and many tone out of man process him the Quail again, and for that cause Alcibiades a Master of a Ship called Antiochus, who brought him the Quail again, and for that cause Alcibiades did love him ever after. Now albeit the Nobility of his house, his goods, his worthiness, and the great number of his kinfmen and friends, made his way open to take upon him Government in the Commonweal; yet the onely way he defired to win the tayour of the common people by, was the grace of his eloquence. To prove he was eloquent, all the Comical Poets do teffifie it: and befides them, Alcibiades Demostheners, the Prince of Orators alfodoth say, in an Oration he made against Medias, that Alcibiades above all other qualities he had, was most eloquent. And if we may believe Theophrastus, the greatest fearcher of Antiquities, and best Historiographer above any other Philosopher; he hath written, that Alcibiades had as good a wit to devile and confider what he would say, as any man that was in his time. Howbeit fometimes studying what he should fay, as also to deliver good words, not having them very ready at his tongues end, he many times took breath by the way, and panfed in the midft of his tale, not speaking a word, until he had called it to mind that he would fay. His charge was great, and much spoken of also, for keeping of running Horses at Games: not onely because they was great, and more sponsor and, or the number of Coaches he had befides. For Euripides pronounced his praise, in a Song he made of him, as followeth: O Son of Clinia, I will refound thy praise : For thou art bold in martial deeds, and overcom' ft always. cydides faith: or as Euripides reporteth, the third. For in that game, he excelled all men in Honour

Howbeit the good affection divers Cities did bear him, contending which should gratisfie him best, and much encrease his same and honour. For the EPHESIANS did set up a Tent for him very sumptuously and richly furnished. Those of the City of CHIO, furnished him with provender for his Horse. and gave him Muttons besides, and other beasts to facrifice withall. They of LESBOS also fent him in Wine and other provision of victuals, to help him to defray the great charges he was at in keeping open house, and feeding such a number of mouths daily. Yet the spite they did bear him, or rather his breach of promife which he often made, with this magnificence and frate he shewed, gave the people more cause to speak of him than before. For they say there was one Diomedes at ATHENS, a friend of Michiades, and no ill man, who defired once in his life to win a game at the plays Olympical. This breaker of proman being informed that the ARGIVES had a Coach excellently furnished, belonging to the Com-mife, monweal, and knowing that Alcibiades could do very much in the City of ARGOS, in cause he had many friends in the fame : he came to intreat Alcibiades to buy this Coach for him. Alcibiades thereupon bought it, but kept it to himself, not regarding Diomedes request he had made. Diomedes seeing that, fell ftark mad for anger, and called the gods and men to witness, that Alcibiades did him open wrong; and it seemeth there fell out sute in Law upon the same. For Isocrates wrote an Oration, and drew a Plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a Child, touching a couple of Horses: yet in this Plea, his adversary was called Tisias, and not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a young man, when he came to practife and plead publickly, he put all other Orators to filence, but Alcibisdes adonely two that were ever against him; the one was Phanx the Son of Erafistratus, and the other Ni- Commoncias the Son of Niceratus. Of these two, Nicias was a man grown, and had won the Name and wealth when reputation of a good Captain. And Pheas: began also to come forward as he did, being of a good and he came to honourable House: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence especially. For, he could Pheas lacked more properly talk and discourse among his friends privately, then he had any good grace to open a eloquence. matter openly before the people. For he had, as Enpolis faith: Words enough, but no eloquence.

There is a certain Oration extant in writing against Alcibiades and Pheax: where among other acculations is brought in, how Alcibiades was ordinarily served in his house, with gold and filver plate that belonged to the Commonweal, and which were used to be born for state and magnificence, in solemn processions before them, and how he used them as boldly, as if they had been his own. Now there was one Hyperbolus in ATHENS at that time, born in the village of PERITHOIDE: of whom Thucydides maketh mention, as of anaughty wicked man, serving as a fit subject and matter to all the taunts and mocks of the comical Poets of that time: but he was so impudent a person, and cared so little what men faid of him, that he paffed not though he were defamed, neither did any thing grieve him, whatfoever they reported of him: which some do call boldness and courage, being no better indeed than plain impudency, extream madness, and desperate folly. He would never please any man: and if the common people had any grudge to any Noble man or Magistrate, whom they would any way accuse, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their instrument to utter their spite. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being affembled, were ready to proceed to the banishment, of Oftracismon by most voices. The manner of The manner and custom of this kind of banishment, was for a time to banish out of their City, such a the punishment one as seemed to have too great authority and credit in the City; and that was, rather to satisfie their by the Offraenvy, then for to remedy their fear. And because it was manifest it would fall out to one of them cifmon. three to be banished (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phaax,) Alcibiades found means to join all their three factions in one, becoming friends one to another: and having conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus felf to be banished, who was the chief instrument to prepare the way of their Hyperbolus habanishment. Howbeit other say, he spake not with Nicias about it, but with Pheax, and joyning his nished for ten part with Pheax, he caused Hyperbolus to be banished, who feared nothing less: for it was never seen years. before, that a man of mean countenance, and of small authority, fell into the hap of this banishment: as Plato the Comical Poet testifieth, speaking of Hyperbolus:

Although for this defert, this pain to him is due, Or greater punishment prepar'd, the which might make him rue: Tet since he was by birth, a person mean and base, Such punishment therefore did seem (for him) too great of grace. Since Oftracifmon was not made at first to be, Nor yet devis'd as punishment for such mean folk as he.

But of this matter, we have spoken more at large before: and now to return again to Alcibiades. Niciae had great reputation among strangers, and his enemies grieved at it no less, than at the honour the Citi-Zens selves did unto him. For his house was the common Inn for all LACEDEMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they ever lay with him: moreover he had very well entertained the LACEDÆ-MON Priloners that were taken at the Fort of Pyle. And afterwards when peace was concluded between LACEDEMON and ATHENS, and their Prisoners delivered home again by Nicias means onely and procurement, they loved him more than ever they did before. This was blown abroad through GREECE, inat Pericles had kindled the wars amongst them, and Nicias had quenched it: so some called this mace Nicium, as one would fay, Nicias work But Alcibiades stomacking this, and envying Nicias Nicias Peace. glory, determined to break the peace what soever came of it. Wherefore to compais this matter, know- Alcibiades ing arft of all that the ARGIVES had no liking to the LACEDEMONIANS, but were their mortal breaketh the eners ies, and that they did but feek matter to fall out with them: he fecretly put them in hope of peace of the and Legue with the ATHENIANS. Moreover he did perswade them to it, both by Letters and word of mouth, speaking with the Magistrates, and such as had greatest authority and credit among the people:

ALCIBIADES.

declaring unto them, that they should not fear the LACEDEMONIANS, nor yield to them at all, but to flick to the ATHENIANS, who would foon repent them of the peace they had made, and break it with them. Afterwards when the LACEDEMONIANS had made league with the BOEO-TIANS, and had delivered the City of PANACTUM to the ATHENIANS, all defaced and spoiled, contrary to the league: Alcibiades perceiving how the people were much offended thereat, made them more earnest against them, and therewithall brought Nicias in difference with the people, and charged niorecanicie against them, and this entire and the cooling at that the world ne-him with many matters of great likelihood. As at that time when he was General: that he would nevertake any of the LACEDEMONIANS, when they were flut up within the Isle of SPHACTERIA, and much less dig. els them when he might: and moreover when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had found the means to deliver them, and fend them home again, to gratifie the LACEDÆ-MONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, he did not his duty to diffwade the people from making of league offensive and defensive with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and again allo, if there were any people of GREECE that had a defire to become friends and allies with the A-THENIANS, that he did the best he could to let them, if the LACEDEMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in diffrace with the people, for the causes above aid: in the midft of this ftir, Ambassadors came by chance from LACEDEMON to ATHENS, who at their coming gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words, faying they had full power and commission to compound all controvering gave very good words. and the people the next day should affemble in counsel to give them audience: which Alcibiades searing much, he went to labour the Ambassadors, and spake with them apart in this fort. What mean you, Alcibiates be my Lords of Sparta: do ye not know that the Senate hath always accustomed to be gracious and my Lorus of Sparia: us years allow that are unto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a guidennatura. proud nature, and defirous to embrace all great matters? If therefore at the first fight, yedo give them to understand that you are come hither with full power, to treat freely with them in all manner of causes: do you not think that they will make you fretch your authority, to grant them all that they will demand? Therefore, my Lords Ambassadors, if you look for indifferency at the ATHENIANS hands, and that they shall not prefs you too far against your wills, to grant them any thing of advantage: I would with you a little to cover your full Commission, and in open manner to propound certain Articles, and reasonable capitulations of Peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will affure you of my good will in favour of the LACEDEMONIANS. When he had told them this tale, he gave them his faithful promile, and vowed as it were to perform his word. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the Ambassadors from the trust they reposed in Nicias, and wan them on his side: in so much as they gave credit to no man but to him, wondring much at his great wisdom and ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were affembled to give the Ambaffadors audience. They were fent for, and brought into the Market-place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cause of their coming. They answered; that they were come to treat of Peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then began Alcibiades to be angry with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not be any to them: calling them unfaithfull, unconftant, and fickle men, that were come neither to do, nor fay any thing worth the hearing. The Senate also were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: whereat Nicisa was so ashamed and amazed withall, that he could not tell what to say, to fee to fudden a change, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice and fubril practife with the Ambaffa dors. So the Ambassadors of LACEDEMON were dispatched without any thing done, and Alcibiades chosen General : who presently brought the ARGIVES, the ELIANS, and the MANTINE ANS in league with the ATHENIANS. Though no man did commend this practife of his, in work ing it after this fort: yet it was a marvellous thing of him to devife to put all PELOPONNESUS in arms, and to procure such a number of Souldiers against the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he did bechofen Genefore the City of MANTINEA, and to shift off the miferies of War and hazard of Battle, so far from ATHENS. Which if the LACEDEMONIANS did win, could not profit them much; and if they loft it, they could hardly fave their City of SPARTA. After this battle of MANTINEA, the thousand men whom the City by an ancient Order did keep continually in pay, as well in peace as in war, within the City of Argos, thinking now opportunity ferved them very trimly: attempt ed to take the foveraign authority from the common people, and to make themselves Lords of the City. And to bring this to pals, the LACEDEMONIANS coming in the mean time, did aid them in their purpole, and fo did put down the government of the people : notwithstanding immediately after the people took arms again, and became the stronger. Alcibiades coming thither even at that time, did warrant them the victory, and to fet up again the authority of the people. Then he perfuaded them to make their walls longer to join the City to the Sea, to the end they might more easily be aided by Sea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them also from ATHENS, many Carpenters, Masons, Stone-hewers, and other Workmen: and to conclude he shewed themby all the means and ways he could, that he did bear good will unto them, and thereby wan himfelf no lefs favour particularly among them, than generally he did good unto his Countrey. He did Periwade also his Citizens of PATRAS to join their town to the Sea, by making long walls, which they built out even to the cliffs of the Sea. And when one faid unto them, Alas, poor people of PATRAS! what do you mean? the ATHENIANS will eat you out: Alcibiades answered him, it may well be, but it shall be by little and little, beginning first at the feet, but the LACEDEMONIANS will devour you all at once, and begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the City of

brought to the Sea by the Argives.

ALCIBIADES.

ATHENS ftrong by fea, yet be did not leave to perswade the ATHENIANS also to make themfelves strong by land. For he did put the young men oftentimes in mind of the Oath they were made to fwear in AGRAULOS, and did advise them to accomplish it indeed. Which was that they should take all Corn-fields, Vines, and Olive-Trees, to be borders and confines of ATTICA, whereby they were taught to reckon all Land theirs that was manured and did bring forth fruit. Yet with all thefe goodly deeds and fair words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quickness of understanding. he had many great faults and imperfections. For he was too dainty in his fare, wantonly given to light women, riotous in banquets, vain and womanish in apparel. He ware ever a long purple gown Alcibiates riot that iwept the Market-place as he walked up and down, it had fuch a train, and was too rich and coftly for him to wear. And following these vain pleasures and delights, when he was in his galley, he caused the plancks of the poop thereof to be cut and broken up, that he might lie the softer; for his bed was not laid upon the overlop, but laid upon girthes strained over the hole, cut out and fastened to the fides, and he carried to the wars with him a guilded Scuchion wherein he had no cognizance nor ordinary device of the ATHENIANS, but onely had the Image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The Noble men and best Citizens of ATHENS perceiving this, they hated his falhions and conditions, and were much offended at him, and were afraid withall of his rafhnels and infolency; he did so contemn the Laws and customs of their Countrey, being manifest tokens of a man that alpired to be King, and would subvert and turn all overhand. And as for the good will of the common people towards him, the Poet Aristophanes doth plainly express it in these words:

The people most desire what most they hate to have, And what their mind abhors, even that they feem to crave. And in another place he faid also, aggravating the suspition they had of him: For State or Commonweal, much better should it be To keep within the Countrey, none fuch Lions looks as he ; But if they needs will keep a Lion to their cost. Then must they needs obey his will, for he will rule the roast.

For to fay truly, his courtefies, his liberalities, and noble expences to fnew the people fo great plea-fure and partime as nothing could be more: the glorious memory of his anceftors, the grace of his Eloquence, the beauty of his person, the strength and valiantness of his body joyned together with his wildom and experience in martial affairs; were the very causes that made them to bear with him in all things, and that the ATHENIANS did patiently endure all his light parts, and did cover his faults with the best words and terms they could, calling them youthfull and gentlemens sports. As when he kept Agartharcus the Painter prisoner in his house by force, until he had painted all his walls within : and when he had done, let him go, and rewarded him very honestly for his pains. Again, when he gave Alcibiades difa box on the ear to Taureas, who did pay the whole charges of a company of common Players, in wantonness. fpight of him, to carry away the honour of the Games. Also when he took away a young woman of MELIA by his authority that was taken among certain prifoners in the Wars, and kept her for his Concubine: By whom he had a Child, which he caufed to be brought up: which they called a work of charity, albeit afterwards they burthened him, that he was the onely cause of murdering of the poor MBLIANS, faving the little Children, because he had favoured and perswaded that unnatural and wicked Decree, which another had propounded. Likewise where one Aristophon a Painter had painted a Curtizan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her arms, and fitting in her lap, which all the people ran to fee, and took great pleafure to behold it : the grave and ancient men were angry at these foolish parts, accounting them impudent things, and done against all civil modesty and temperancy. Wherefore it feemed Archestratus words were spoken to good purpose, when he said : that GREECE could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he came from the Council and affembly of the City, faying. where he had made an excellent Oracion, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by means thereof had obtained the thing he defired, and was accompanied with a great train that followed him to his honour; Timon furnamed Mifantropos (as who would fay, Loup-garon, or the manhater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not pass by him, nor give him way (as he was wont to do all other men) but went Araight to him, and took him by the hand, and faid : O, thou doft well my Son, I can thee thank, that thou goeft on, and climbeft up ftill : for if ever thou be in authority, wo be unto those that follow thee, for they are utterly undone. When they heard these words, those that stood by fell a laughing: other reviled Timon, other again marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after; fuch fundry opinions they had of him for the unconstancy of his life, and waywardness of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of Sigile, the Athe-NIANS did marvelloully covet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not meddle withall, untill after his death: and then they did it at the first under colour of friendship, as aiding those Cities which were oppressed and spoiled by the Syracustans. This was in manner a plain bridge made, to pais afterwards a greater power and Army thither. Howbeit the onely procurer of the ATHENIANS, and perswader of them, to send small Companies thither no more, but to enter Alcibiales the with a great Army, at once to conquer all the Countrey together, was Alcibiades, who had so allured the people with his pleasant tongue, that upon his perswasion, they built Castles in the air, and thought to do greater wonders by winning onely of SICILIA. For where other did fet their minds upon the conquest of Sicile, being that they onely hoped after: it was to Alcibiades,

but a beginning of further enterprizes. And where Nicias commonly in all his perswafions, did our a reguming of interest conceptable. too great a matter for them to take the City of Syracusa : Alcibiades again had a further reach in his head, to go conquer Lybia, and Carthage, and that being conquered, to pass from thence into ITALY, and to to PELOPONNESUS: fo that SICILIA should ferve but to furfrom thence into 11 ALI, and to 12 ALI Souldiers for their conquefts which he had imagined. Thus the nith them with victuals, and to pay the Souldiers for their conquefts which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently carried away with a marvellous hope and opinion of this journey, and young men were morning sales that told them wonders of the Countries: infomuch as there was no have good car to one main man and the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to fit round to The divination gether, draw plats of SICILE, and describe the scituation of Lybia and Carthage. And yet The divination they say, that neither Socrates the Philosopher, nor Meton the Aftronomer did ever hope to see any good fuccels of this journey. For the one by the revealing of his familiar spirit, who told him all things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: and Meton, whether it was for fear of the fucces of the journey he had by reason, or that he knew by divination of his Art what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, and holding a burning Torch in his hand, made as though he would have fet his house on fire. Other say, that he did not counterfeit, but like a mad man indeed did fet his house on fire one night, and that the next morning betimes he went into the marketplace to pray the people, that in confideration of his great lofs and his grievous calamity place to pray the people, that in commerciation of the great too and the greatest chaining for late happened him, it would pleafe them to discharge his Son from going this voyage. So by this mad device, he obtained his request of the people for his Son, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen Captain, to take charge of Men in these Wars: who milliked this fourney, as well for his companion and affociate in the charge of these Wars, as for other misfortunes he forefaw therein. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the War would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades rashness and hardiness, but did join with him the wiftney are not commit it whoshy to Automates rainness and naturess, but and join with min the wildom of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third Captain, whom they fent thither, though the were waxen now somewhat old, as one that had shewed himself no less venterous and hardy in some battles, then Akibiades himself. Now when they came to resolve of the number of Souldiers, the furniture and order of these Wars, Niciar sought crookedly to thwart this journey, and break it off altogether: but Alcibiades withstood him, and got the better hand of him. There was an Orator called Demostratus, who moved the people also that the Captains whom they had chosen for these Wars, might have full power and authority to levy men at their discretion, and to make fuch preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condefcended, and did authorize them. But when they were even ready to go their way, many figns of ill success lighted in the neck one of another: and amongst the rest this was one; That they were commanded to take Ship on the day of the celebration of the Feaft of Adonia, on the which the cuftom is, that Women do fet up in divers places of the City, in themidft of the ftreets, Images like to dead coarfes which they carry to burial, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with blubbering and beating themselves, in token of the forrow the goddels Venus made, for the death onnovering and octaining inclinered, in lower of the foreign and were wont of her friend Adonis. Moreover, the Hermes (which are the Images of Mercury, and were wont of the fit up in every lane and fireet) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled, fpecially in their faces: which put divers in great fear and trouble, yea even those that made no ac-Images hewn count of fact toys. Whereupon it was alledged, that it might be the CORINTHIANS that did it, or procured that leud act to be done, favouring the Syracustans, who were their near Kinfmen, and had been the first founders of them; imagining upon this ill roken, it might be a cause to break off the enterprize, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this War in hand. Nevertheless the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their words that faid, they should not reckon of any such signs or tokens, and that they were but some light brained youths, that being tipled, had played this shamefull part in their bravery, or for sport. But for all these reasons, they took these signs very grievously, and were indeed not a little asraid, as thinking undoubtedly that no man durst have been so bold to have done such an abominable sact, but that there was some conspiracy in the matter. Hereupon they looked upon every suspition and conjecture that might be (how little or unlikely soever it were) and that very severely: and both Senate and People, also met in Council upon it, very oft in few days. Now whilest they were builty fearching out the matter, Androeles a common Counfeller, and Orator in the Commonwealth, brought before the Council certain flaves and frangers that dwelt in ATHENS: Altibiades ac- who depoted, that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangculcidor pro- led other Images after that fort, and in a mockery had counterfeited also in a banker that he made, the Ceremonies of the holy Mysteries; declaring these matters particularly: How one Theodoral holy Mysteries counterfeited the Herauld, that was wont to make the Proclamations : Polytion the Torch-beart, and Alcibiades the Prieft, who sheweth the holy signs and Mysteries: and that his other companions were the Affiltants, as those that make suit to be received into their Religion and Order, and into the brotherhood of their boly Mysteries, whom for this cause they call Mystes. Their very words are written in the Acculation Theffalas (Cimons Son) made against Aleibiada, charging him that he had wickedly mocked the two goddeeffes, Ceres and Proferpina. Whereat the people being marvellously moved and offended; and the Orator Androcles his mortal enemy, aggravating and stirring them up the more against him: Alcibiades a little at the first began tok amazed at it. But afterwards, hearing that the Mariners which were prepared for the voyage of

ALCIBIADES.

SICILIA, and the Souldiers also that were gathered, did bear him great good will, and specially how the aid, that came from ARGOS, and MANTINEA (being a thouland Footmen well armed and appointed) did fay openly, how it was for Alcibiades fake they did take upon them fo long a voyage beyond Sea, and that if they went about to do him any hurt or wrong, they would prefently return home again from whence they came : he began to be of a good courage again, and determined with this good favourable opportunity of time, to come before the Council, to answer to all such Articles and Accusations as should be laid against him. Thereupon his Enemies were a little cooled fearing left the People in this judgement would have shewed him more favour, because they ftood in need of him. Wherefore to prevent this danger, they had fed other Orators, who fet a The craft of good face on the matter, as they had been Alcibiades friends, and yet they wished him no less evil Alcibiades Ethen the rankest Enemies he had. These fine fellows rose up in open Affembly, and said : It was no reason, that he that was now chosen one of the Generals of so mighty and puissant an Army (being ready to hoise fail, and the aid also of their Allies and friends) should be driven to stay now, and to lose time and occasion of well doing, whilest they should go about to choose Judges, and appoint him his hours and time of answer. Therefore they faid, it was fit he should take his journey betimes, and when Wars were done, that he should present himself to require justice, and to purge himself of such matters as should be objected against him. But Alcibiades smelling straight their fetch, and perceiving the practife of his stay, stept up, and declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a Generall of fo great an Army, his mind being troubled with continuall fear of fo grievous curses, as he should leave upon him: and that he deserved death. if he could not purge and justifie himself of all the unjust and surmized accusations against him. And if he had once cleared himself of all things, and had published his innocency, he should then have nothing in his head to trouble him, nor to think upon, but to go on lustily to fight with his Enemies, and to cast behind him the danger of all his slanderous detractors. But all this could not perfwade them. And so he was presently commanded in the behalf of the People, to imbark and thip away his men. Thus he was compelled to take the Seas with his other companions, having in Alcibiales their Navy about an hundred and forty Galleys, all having three Oars to a barque: and five thou. journey into fand one hundred Footmen, very well armed and appointed, and throwers with flings, Archers, and Sielle. other light armed men to the number of thirteen hundred, sufficiently surnished of all warlike and necessary munition. Now after they were arrived on the Coast of ITALY, they landed in the City of RHEGIO: where, holding council in what fort they should direct these Wars, it was resolved in the end that they should straight go unto SICILIA. This opinion was followed, although Nicias did contrary it, when Lamachus gave his consent thereunto, and at his first coming, he was the occasion of winning the City of CATHANA. But he never after did any exploit, for he was called home immediately by the ATHENIANS, to come and answer certain Accusations laid to his charge. For as we told you before, there was at the beginning certain light suspitions and accusations put up against him, by some Slaves and strangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his Enemiesenforced them, and burthened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken the Images of Mercury: and had committed Sacriledge, in counterfeiting in jeft and mockery the holy Ceremonies of the Myfteries: and blew into the ears of the People, that both the one and the other proceeded of one fet conspiracy, to change and alter the Government of the state and the City, Upon these informations, the People took it in so ill part, that they committed all to prison, that were in any fort accused or suspected thereof, and would never let them come to their answer; and moreover did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, upon fo great complaints and informations as were exhibited against him, while his offence was in question before them, and the fury and hatred of the People was fuch towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their danger, they were the worse handled for his sake. Thucydides did not name his Accusers, but some other do name Dioclides and Teucer: amongst whom Phrynicus Phrynicus the the Comicall Poet is one, who discovereth it in his Verses, by bringing in one that speaketh to the Comical Poet, Image of Mercury:

> My good friend Mercury , I pray thee take good heed, That thou fall not and break thy neck : for so thou mights me breed Both danger and distrust, and though I guiltless be, Some Diocles falfly might accuse and trouble me. Mercury answereth:

Take thou no thought for me, my felf I shall well fave: And will foresee full well therewith, that Teucer (that false knave) Shall not the money get, which he by Law hath won, For his promoters bribing part and accusation,

And yet for all this, these tokens do shew no certainty of any thing. For one of them being asked how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced these Images? he answered, that he knew them well enough by the brightness of the Moon. And hereby it appeareth plainly that he was perjured, because that the same night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a conjunction of the Moon. This did a little trouble and stay men of judgement : howbeit the common fort of People this notwithstanding, did not leave to be as sharp fet, to receive all Accufations and Informations that were brought in against him, as ever they were before. Now there was among the Prifoners whose cause was hanging before them, the

Orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the Historiographer discribeth to descend of the race of Ulyses) whom they took to be a man that hated the Government of the common People, and bent altogether to favour the small number of the Nobility. But one of the chiefest occasions why he was suspected to be one of them that had broken the Images, was : for that hard by his house there was a fair great Image fetup in old time by the Family or Tribe of the Egides, and that alone amongst all the reft of 10 many famous Images, was left whole and unbroken: whereupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is so called generally of every body, albeit the Inscription shewuay, the meretry of Anabelues, and is to cancel generally of every body, after the interpretable being in prison, chanced to fall in acquaintance with one Timam, with whom he was more familiar then with all the reft, who was also prisoner with him for the self cause, This Timaus was a man not fo well known as he, but befides, a wife man, and very hardy. He perfwaded him, and put into his head, that he should accuse himself, and certain other with him : for taking the matter upon him, and confessing it, he should receive grace and pardon, according to the casing the matter upon min, and containing a state of the stand upon the courtefie of the courte and promife of the Law: where contrarily, if he should stand upon the courtesse of the Judges sentence, he might easily endanger himself: because Judgements in such cases are uncertain to all People, and most to be doubted and feared toward the rich. And therefore he told him, it were his best way, if he looked into the matter wifely, by lying to fave his life, rather then to suffer death with thame, and to be condemned upon this falle acculation. Also he said, if he would have regard to the Commonwealth, that it should in like case be wisely done of him, to put in danger a few of thole (which flood doubtfull whether in troth they were any of them or no) to fave from the fury of the People, and terror of death, many honest men, who indeed were innocent of this lewd Fact. Timaus words and perswasions wrought such effect with Andocides, that they made him yeeld unto them, and brought him to accuse himself, and certain other with him by means whereof Andoeides according to the Law had his pardon: but all such as he named and accused, where every man put to death, faving such as saved themselves by running away. Furthermore, to Made every man por to train, and series of troth, Andocides among those that were accused, did accuse also certain of his own Servants. Now though the People had no more occasion to occupy their busic heads about the breakers of these Images, yet was not their malice thus appeafed against Alcibiades, untill they fent the Galley called Salaminiana, commanding those they fent by a special Commission to seek him out, in no case to attempt to take him by sorce, nor to lay hold on him by violence : but to use him with all the good words and courteous manner that they possibly could, and to will him onely to appear in person before the People, to answer to certain Acculations put up against him. If otherwise they should have used force, they seared much left the Army would have mutined on his behalf within the Countrey of their Enemies , and that there would have grown some sedition amongst their Souldiers. This might Alcibiades have eafily done, if he had been disposed: for the Souldiers were very forry to see him depart: perceiving that the Wars should be drawn out now in length, and be much prolonged under Nicias, seeing Altibiates fent Alcibiades was taken from them, who was the onely spur that pricked Nicias forward to do any Service : and that Lamachus also, though he were a valiant man of his hands, yet he lacked Honour and Authority in the Army, because he was but a mean man born, and poor besides. Now Alcibiades for a farewell, disappointed the ATHENIANS of winning the City of MESSINA: for they having intelligence by certain private persons within the City, that it would yeeld up into their hands, Alcibiades knowing them very well by their names, bewrayed them unto those that were the Syracustans friends: whereupon all this practife was broken utterly. Afterwards when he came to the City of Thuries, fo foon as he had landed, he went and hid himfelf incontinently in such fort, that such as sought for him could not find him. Yet there was one that knew him where he was , and faid : Why, how now Alcibiades , dareft thou not trust the justice of thy Countrey? Yes very well (quoth he) and it were in another matter: but my life standing upon it, I would not truft mine own mother, fearing left negligently she should put in the black bean, where the should cast in the white : for by the first, condemnation of death was fignified : and by the other, pardon of life. But afterwards, hearing that the ATHENIANS for malice had condemned him to death: Well, quoth he, they shall know 1 am yet alive. Now the manner of his Alcibiader ca- Accordation and Indictment framed against him, was found written in this fort: The same the Son of Cimon, of the Village of LACIADES, hath accused, and doth accuse Alcibiades, the Son of Clinias, of the Village of SCAMBONIDES, to have offended against the goddesses, Ceres and Proferpina, counterfeiting in mockery their holy Mysteries, and shewing them to his familiar friends in his house, himself apparelled and arrayed in a long Vestment or Cope, like unto the Vestment the Priest weareth when he sheweth these holy Sacred Mysteries: and naming himself the Priest, Polyrion the Torch-bearer, and Theodorus of the Village of PAYGEA the Verger, and the other lookers on Brethren, and iellow-fcorners with them, and all done in manifest contempt and derision of holy Ceremonies and Mysteries of the Eumolpides, the religious Priests and Ministers of the facred Temple of the City of ELEUSIN. So Alcibiades for his contempt and not appearing, was condemned, and his Goods confifcate. Befides this condemnation, they decred also, that all the religious Priests and women should ban and accurse him. But hereunto answered one of the Nuns called Theano, the Daughter of Menon, of the Village of AGRAULA, faying that she was professed religious, to pray and to bless, not to curse and ban. After this most grievous sentence and condemnation paffed against him, Alcibiades departed out of the City of Thurses, and went into the Country of Peloponnesus, where he continued a good feafon in the City of

DAMONIANS, that he might come and dwell in their Countrey, promifing them he would do to them more good being now their friend, then ever he did them hurt, while he was their Enemy. The LACEDEMONIANS granted his request, and received him very willingly into their City: where. Alcibiades flyeven at his first coming, he did three things. The first was : that the LACEDEMONIANS by his cit to Sparial perswasion and procurement, did determine speedily to fend aid to the Syracusians whom they had long before delayed: and fo they fent Gylippus their Captain to overthrow the ATHE-NIANS Army, which they had fent thither. The second thing he did for them, was : that he made them of GREECE to begin War upon the ATHENIANS. The third, and greatest matter of importance, was : that he did counsell them to fortifie the City of Decelea, which was within the Territories of ATTICA felf: which confumed, and brought the Power of the ATHENIANS lower then any other thing whatfoever he could have done. And if he were welcome, and well eftermed in Sparta, for the service he did to the Commonwealth: much more he wan the love and good wills of private men, for that he lived after the LACONIAN manner. So as they that faw his skin scraped to the flesh, and saw him wash himself in cold water, and how he did eat brown bread, and sup of their black broth : would have doubted (or to fay better, never have believed) that fuch a man had ever kept Cook in his house, nor that he ever had feen so much as a perfuming pan, or had touched cloth of Tiffue made in MILETUM. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they fay was one whereby he most robbed mens hearts: that he could frame altogether with their manners and fashions of life, transforming himself more easily to all manner of shapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot Alcibiades take white colour : but Alcibiades could put upon him any manners, cuftoms or fashions, of what more change Nation foever, and could follow, exercife, and counterfeit them when he would, as well the good Camelion. as the bad. For in Sparta, he was very painfull, and in continual exercise: he lived sparingly with little, and led a straight life. In IONIA, to the contrary, there he lived daintily and superfluoully, and gave himself to all mirth and pleasure. In Thrasta, he drank ever, or was alwaise on horseback. If he came to Tifaphernes, Lieutenant of the mighty King of Persia, he far exceeded the magnificence of Persia in pomp and sumptuousness. And these things notwithstanding, never altered his natural condition from one fashion to another, neither did his manners (to fay truly) receive all forts of changes. But because peradventure, if he had shewed his naturall disposition, he might in divers places where he came, have offended those whose company he kept, he did with such a vizard and cloak disguise himself, to fit their manners whom he conpanied with, by transforming himself into their naturall countenance, as he that had seen him when he was at SPARTA, to have looked upon the outward man, would have faid as the common Proverb faith: It is not the fon of Achilles, but Achilles felf. Even so, it is even he whom Lycurgus brought up. But he that had inwardly feen his natural

For he entertained Queen Timan , King Agis wite of Sparta, fo well in his absence, he being Alcibiades got abroad in the Wars, that he got her with child, and she her self denied it not. For she being Timas hing brought to bed of a fon, who was named Leorychides; openly to the world called him by that name: child. but when the was amongst her familiars and very friends, the called him fostly Alcibiades, the was fo far in love with him. And Alcibiades, jefting out the matter, faid he had done it for no burt, nor for any luft of flesh to satisfie his desire : but onely to leave of his race, to reign amongst the LACEDEMONIANS. This matter was brought by divers unto King Agis ears, who at the length believed it : but specially when he began to make a reckoning of the time how long it was fince he lay with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible Earthquake, he ran out of his chamber for fear the house would fall on his head : so that it was ten moneths after ere he lay again with her. Whereupon her Son Leorychides being born at the end of ten Leotychides Almoneths, he faid it was none of his: and this was the cause that Leotychides did not succeed after-cibiales ballwards in the Kingdom, because he was not of the bloud-royall. After the utter overthrow of the ard, ATHENIANS in SICILIA, those of the Ides of CHIO and LESBOS, with the CYZICENI-ANS, did fend altogether their Ambassadours to SPARTA, to let the LACEDAMONIANS underftand, they had good will to leave the ATHENIANS, fo they would fend them aid to defend them. The BOEOTIANS favoured those of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the King of PERSIANS Lieutenant, favoured the CYZICENIANS. This notwithftanding the LACEDAMONIANS were better affected to help those of CHIO first, by the perswasion of Alcibiades, who took their matter in hand : and he took Sea himself and went into Asia, where he almost turned the Countrey of IONIA against the ATHENIANS : and keeping alwaies with the Generals of the LACEDÆ-MONIANS, he did much hurt the ATHENIANS. Yet notwithstanding, King Agis did bear him ill will, partly for the injury he did him in dishonouring and defiling his wife, and partly also, for that he envied his glory : because the rumour ran all about , that the most part of the goodly exploits of those Wars did happen well by Alcibiades means. Other also of the greatest Authority among the SPARTANS, that were most ambitious among them, began in their minds

to be angry with Alcibiades, for the envy they bare him: who were of fo great power, that they procured their Governours to write Letters to their Captains in the Field to kill him. Alcibiades hearing of this, did no whit defift to do all that he could for the benefit of the LACEDEMONI-ANS: yet he had an eye behind him, flying all occasions to fall into their hands. So in the end, for more furety of his person, he went unto Tifaphernes one of the King of Persia's Lieutenants, Alcibiates ior more turery or my person, to the many of the angles reasons Secure annies.

Alcibiates fly- with whom he wan incontinently such credit, that he was the first and chiefest person he had about Attitudes ny-with whom newest autonomatory and fimple person, but rather malicious, and subtil of nature, ing the Lice-him. For this barbarous man being no simple person, but rather malicious, and subtil of nature, demands, 90° and that loved fine and crafty men: did wonder how he could fo eafily turn from one manner of living to another, and also at his quick wit and understanding. Moreover, his company and minner to pass the time away, was commonly marvellous full of mirth and pleasure, and he had such pleato pais the time and, that no man was of fo fullen a nature, but he would make him merry, fant comely devices with him, that no man was of fo fullen a nature, but he would make him merry, nor so churlish, but he would make him gentle. So that both those that feared him, and also they that envied him, were yet glad to fee him, and it did them good to be in his company, and ufe talk with him. Infomuch as this Tisaphernes (that otherwise was a churlish man, and naturally hated Milibinder cal- the Grecians) did give himself so much unto Alcibiades flatteries, and they pleased him so Mutotates called a pleasant well, that he himself did study to flatter Alcibiades again, and made much of him. For he called Alcibiades his fair house of pleasure, and goodly prospect : notwithstanding he had many goodly Gardens, fweet Springs, green Arbours, and pleasant Meadows, and those in all royall and magnificent manner. Alcibiades despairing utterly to find any safety or friendship among the SPARTANS, and fearing on the other fide King Agu also: he began to speak ill of them, and to difgrace all that they did, to Tifaphernes. By this practife he ftayed Tifaphernes from aiding them to friendly as he might; and that he did not utterly destroy the ATHENIANS: for he perfwaded him that he should furnish the LACEDEMONIANS but with little money, to let them diminish and consume by little and little, to the end that after one had troubled and weakened the other, they both at the length should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did eithey both at the length should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did either they both at the length should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did either they be the should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did either they be the should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did either they be the should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did either they be the should be the easter for the King to overcome. This barbarous man did either they be the should be the easter for the King to overcome. much: infomuch as he was fought to, and regarded of all hands of the GRECIANS. Then were the ATHENIANS forry, and repented them when they had received fo great lofs and hurt, for that they had decreed fo leverely against Alcibiades, whom in like manner was very forrowfull, to fee them brought to so hard terms, fearing, if the City of ATHENS came to destruction, that he himself should fall in the end into the hands of the LACEDEMONIANS, who maliced him to the death. Now about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS was almost in the Isle of Sa-NOS, from whence with their Army by Sea, they fought to suppress the Rebels that were up against them, and to keep all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily strong to resist the Enemies, at the least by Sea : but they flood in fear of the power of Tesaphernes, and of the hundred and fifty Galleys which were reported to be coming out of their Countrey of PHOENICIA to the aid of their Enemies, which if they had come, the City of ATHENS had been utterly spoiled, and for ever without hope of recovery. The which Alcibiades understanding, fent secretly unto the chiefest men that were in the Army of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, to give them hope he would make Tisaphernes their friend : howben not of any desire he had to gratifie the People, nor that he trufted to the Commonalty of ATHENS, but onely to the honourable and honest Citizens, and that conditionally, so as they had the heart and courage, to bridle a little the over-licentiousness and infolency of the common People, and that they would take upon them the Authority to govern, and to redress their State, and to preferve the City of Athens from finall and utter destruction. Upon this advertisement, all the heads and chief men did give very good ear unto it : faving onely Phrynicus, one of the Captains, and of the Town of DIRADES: who mistrusting (that was true indeed) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward, nor who had the chief government of ATHENS, the Nobility or the Commonalty, and did but feek all the devices and ways he could, to return again if it might be possible, in any manner of fort, and that he did but curry favour with the Nobility, blaming and accusing the People : he stood altogether against the motion, whereupon Alcibiades device was not followed. And having now shewed himself open Enemy to Alcibiades, he did fecretly advertise Astrochus, then Admirall to the LACEDEMONIANS, of Alcibiades practife, and warned him to take heed of him, and to lay him up fafe, as a double-dealer, and one that had intelligence with both fides : but he understood not how it was, one Traytor to speak to another. For this Aftiochus was a follower of Tija phermes for his private commodity: and perceiving Alcibiades in fuch credit with him , he did discover to Alcibiades all that Phrynic m had advertised him. Alcibiades straight sentmen of purpose to Samos, unto the Captains there, to accuse Phrymeus of the treason he had revealed against them. Those of the Council there, receiving this intelligence, were highly oftended with Phrynicus. So, he feeing no better way to fave himfelf for making of this fault, went about to make amends with committing a worle fault. Thereupon he fent again to Affiochus, complaining much he had disclosed him : and yet nevertheless he promised him , if he would keep his counsel, that he would deliver the whole Fleet and Army of the ATHENIANS into his hands. Howbeit this treason of Phrynicus did the ATHENIANS no hurt at all, by reason of Africebus counter-treason: for he did let Alcibiades again understand what offer Phrynicus had made him. Phrynieus looking to be charged with this again the fecond time before the Council, by means of Alcibiades, did first advertise the chief of the Army of the ATHENIANS : that their Enemies would come and fet upon them, and where, and how, and gave them warning to keep near their Ships, to make a firong watch, and to fortifie themselves with all speed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other Letters from Alcibiades, by the which hedid warn them again to take heed of Phrynicus, because he had practised again with their Enemies, to deliver the whole Army of ATHEMS into their hands. But they gave no credit to his second Letters : for they thought that he knowing the preparation and mines of the enemies, would ferve his own turn with the false that the knowing the propagation of the propagation of the propagation of Phrymicis. Notwithstanding this, there was some fallhood in fellowship : for one Hermon. openly in the Market-place stabbed Phrynicus in with a dagger, and killed him. The fact being of Phrynicus pleaded in Law, and throughly confidered of, the dead body by the fentence of the People was con- and his condemned for a Traytor : and Hermon the murderer and his fellows, were crowned in recompence of demnation their fact they had done to kill a Traytor to the Commonwealth. Wherefore those that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the stronger and greater men in the Council in the Army of Sa-MOS: they fent one Pisander to Athens, to attempt to after the Government, and to encourage the Noblemen to take upon them the Authority, and to pluck it from the people; affuring them that Tilaphernes would give them aid to do it, by means of Alcibiades, who would make him their friend. This was the colour and cloke wherewith they ferved their turns, that did change the Government of ATHERS, and that brought it into the hands of a small number of Nobility : for they were in all but four hundred, and yet they called themselves five thousand. But so soon as they felt themfelves ftrong, and that they had the whole authority of Government, without contradiction in their hands, they made then no more reckoning of Alcibiades, and so they made Wars more coldly and flackly then before. Partly because they mistrusted their Citizens, who found the change of Government very strange : and partly also because they were of opinion that the LACED EMONIANS (who at all times did most favour the Government of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them. Now the common People that remained still in the City, stirred not, but were quiet against their wills, for fear of danger, because there were many of them slain, that boldly took upon them in open presence to refist these four hundred. But those that were in the Camp in the Isle of Samos, hearing these news, were so grievously offended, that they resolved to return incontinently again, unto the haven of PIREA. First of all, they fent for Alcibiades; whom incommently again, then they commanded him straightly to lead them against these Tyrants, led home from who had usurped the liberty of the People of Athens. But nevertheless he did not herein, 38 exile, another would have done in this case, seeing himself so suddenly crept again in favour with the common People : for he did not think he should incontinently please and gratifie them in all things, though they had made him now their General over all their Ships, and so great an Army, being before but a banished man, a vagabond, and a fugitive. But to the contrary, as it became a General worthy of such a charge, he considered with himself, that it was his part wilely to stay those, who would in a rage and fury carelefly caft themselves away, and not suffer them to do it. And truly Alcibiades was the cause of the preserving of the City of ATHENS at that time from utter destruction. For if they had fudenly (according to their determination) departed from Samos to go to A-THENS: the Enemies finding no man to lett them, might eafily have won all the Countrey of IONIA, of HELLESPONT, and of all the other Isles without stroke striking, whilest the ATHE-NIANS werebusie fighting one against another in civil Wars: and within the compass of their own walls. This Alcibiades alone, and no other, did prevent, not onely by perswading the whole Army, and declaring the inconvenience thereof, which would fall our upon their fudden departure : but also by intreating some particularly apart, and keeping a number back by very force. To bring this Thrashbulus 2 about, one Thrashulm of the Town of STIRA, did help him much : who went through the Ar- man of the my, and cried out upon them that were bent to enterprise this journey : for he had the biggest and biggest voice loudest voice, as they say, of any man that was in all the City of ATHENS. This was a notable of all the Aact, and a great piece of service done by Alcibiades: that he promised the five hundred fail of the thenians. PHOENICIANS (which the LACEDEMONIANS affuredly looked for, in their aid from the King of PERSIA) should not come at all, or else if they came, it should be in the favour of the ATHENIANS. For he departed immediately, and went with great speed to Tisaphernes: whom he handled in such fort, that he brought not the Ships that lay at rode before the City of ASPENDA. and to he brake promile with the LACEDEMONIANS. Therefore Alcibiades was marvellously blamed and accused, both of the one and the other side, to have altered Tisaphernes mind, but chiefly return without some well-deserving, and before he had done some greater exploit, as onely upon the The Chizens Peoples favour and good will: to the end that his return might be glorious and triumphant; he de for Ataliades parted first from Samos with a small number of Gallies, and went failing up and down the Isles of to return the LACED.EMONIANS: who faid, that he had perswaded this barbarous Captain, he should neither aid the one nor the other, but rather to fuffer themselves to devour and destroy each other. For it had been out of doubt, if this great Fleet and Navy of the Kings had come, to joyn their force with either part: that they had taken from the one of them, the feigniory and dominion of the fea. Shortly after, the 400 Noblemen that had usurped the authority and government of ATHENS, were utterly driven away and overthrown, by reason of the friendly aid and affistance that Alcibiades friends gave those that took the Peoples part. So the Citizens were very well pleased with Alcibiades, insomuch as they fent for him to return when he thought good. But he effecting it no honour unto him to

COs and of GNIDOS. There he was advertised, that Mindarus, the Admiral of the LACEDE-

MONIANS, was gone with all his Fleet unto the straight of HELLESPONT, and that the Cap-

Battel by fea before the Cictory of the by Sea,

with speed, to and the ATRENIANS: and by very good fortune came with eighteen Gallies, even at the very instant when they were both in the midst of their fight, with all their Ships before the City of Abydos. The battel was cruelly foughten between them from morning till night, both the one and the other having the better in one part of the battel, and the worst in another place. Now Athenian and at the first discovery of Alcibiades coming, both parts had indeed contrary imaginations of him. Lucedamonians For the enemies took heart unto them: and the ATHENIANS began to be afraid. But Alcibiades fetting up a Flag in the top of his Admiral Galley, to shew what he was, he presently set upon the PRIOPONNESSANS that had the better, and had certain Gallies of the ATHENIANS in chase : whereupon the Paloponnasians gave over their chase, and fied. But Alcibiades followed them so luftily, that he ran divers of them aground, and brake their Ships, and flew a great number of men that leapt into the Sea, in hope to fave themselves by swimming aland: notwithflanding that Pharnabarms was come thither to aid the LACEDEMONIANS, and did his best endeavour to fave their Gallies by the Sea shore : yet the ATHENIANS in the end wan 30 Gallies of their Enemies, and faved all their own, and so did set up certain Flags of triumph and victory. Aleibiades having now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs go shew himself intriumph unto Tisaphernes. So having prepared to present him with goodly rich presents, and appointed also a convenient Train and number of Sail meet for a General, he took his course directly to him, But he found not that entertainment he hoped for : for Tifaphernes standing in great hazard of difpleasure, and fear of punishment at the Kings hands, having long time before been defamed by the Alcibiade ta- LACEDEMONIANS, who had complained of him, that he did not fulfill the Kings command-Alcibides ta-Ren primer at ment, inought that International was active in a very mappy from a white tupon he kept min primer sardis, flyth in the City of SARDIS, supposing the wrong he had done, would by this means easily discharge from Tijapher and purge him to the King. Yet at the end of thirty daies, Alicibiades by fortune got a horse, and the frealing from his keepers, fled unto the City of CLAZOMENES, and this did more increase the survey of the company of the fpition they had of Tisaphernes, because they thought that underhand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades took then Sea again, and went to feek out the Army of the Arrantans. Which when he had found, and heard news that Mindarus and Pharnabazus were together in the City of CIZYCUM, he made an Oration to his Souldiers, and declared unto them how it was very requifite they should fight with their Enemies, both by Sea and by Land, and moreover that they should asfault them within their Forts and Caftles, because otherwise they could have no money to defray their charges. His Oration ended, he made them immediately hoife fail, and so to go lie at anker in the Ille of Proconnesus; where he took order that they should keep all the Pinaces and Brigantines among the Ships of war, that the Enemy might have no manner of intelligence of his coming. The great thoures of rain also, with thunder and dark weather that fell out suddenly upon it, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterprize: infomuch as not onely his Enemies, but the AT HE-NIANS that were there before, knew nothing of his coming. So fome made their reckoning, that they could do little or nothing all that day ; yet he made them fuddenly imbark, and hoife fail. They were no fooner in the main Sea, but they discryed afar off the Galleys of their Enemies, which lay at rode before the haven of CIZYCUM. And fearing left the great number of his Fleet would make them flye, and take Land beforehe could come to them: he commanded certain Captains to flay behind, and to row foftly after him, and himself with forry Galleys with him, went towards the Enemies to provoke them to fight. The Enemies supposing there had been no more Ships then those that were in fight, did fet out prefently to fight with them. They were no fooner joyned together, but Alcibiades Ships that came behind, were also discryed. The Enemies were so affraid thereat, Alcibiades vi that they caft about and fled ftraight. Alcibiades leaving his Fleet, followed the chafe with twenty ftory at CPU of the best Galleys he had, and draw them aland. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued them to couragiously at their heels, that he slew a great number of them on the main Land, who thought by flying to have faved themselves. Moreover, Mindarus and Pharnabazus, being come out of the City to refcue their People, were overthrown both. He flew Mindarus in the Field, fighting valiantly : as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS spoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deal of armour and riches, and took befides all their Enemies Ships. After they took the City of CIZYCUM, Pharnahazus having left it. Then the PSIOPONNESIANS being flain, they had not onely the possession of the whole Countrey of Hallsport, which they kept: but they drave their Enemies by force out of all parts of the Sea. There were at that time certain Letters intercepted, whereby a Secretary gave advertisement unto the Fphori at Sparta, of the overthrow in this fort : All is loft, Mindarm is flain, our People dye for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the Souldiers of ATHENS that had been at this journey and overthrow, grew to fuch pride and reputation of themselves, that they would not, and disclaimed also to serve with other Souldiers that had been beaten many times, and went away with the worse : where they to the contrary had never been overcome as a little before happened, that the Captain Thrasyllus had been overthrown by the City of EPHESUS : and for this overthrow, the Educations had fet up a triumph and token of brass, to the utter shame and ignominy of the ATBENIANS. For the which Alcibiades Souldiers did very much rebuke Thrafyllus men, and did exceedingly excell their Captain and themselves, and would neither encamp with them, neither have to do with them, nor yet keep them company : untill such time as Pharnabarus came with a great Army against them, as well of Footmen as Horsemen, when they ran a foraging upon the ADDDERIANS : and then Alcibiades went to the refeue of them, and gave Pharnabaxus battel, and overthrew him once again, and did together with Thrafyllus, chase him even untill dark night, Then both Alcibiades and Thrafyllus Souldiers did company together, one rejoycing with another: and so returned all with great joy into one Camp. The next morning Alcibiades set up a Triumph for the victory he had the day before, and then went to spoil and destroy Pharnabazus Countrey where he was Governour, and no man durst once come out to meet him. In this rode there were taken Prisoners, certain Priests and Nuns of the Countrey; but Alcibiades freely delivered them afterwards without ransome. And preparing to make Wars against the CHALCEDONIANS, who were revolted from the ATHENIANS, and had received a Garison and Governour of the LACE-DEMONIANS into their City, he was advertised that they had brought all their Goods and Cattels out of their Fields, and had delivered them to the fafe custody of the BYTHINIANS, who were their neighbours and friends. Hereupon he led his Army into their Borders, and fent a Herauld to funumon the Bythinians, to make amends for the wrong they had done the Athenians. The BYTHINIANS fearing lest Alcibiades would fet upon them, did straight deliver him their goods they had before in their custody, and moreover made a league with the ATHENIANS befides. That done, he went and laid fiege to the City of CHALCEDON, the which he environed all about from the one fide of the Sea to the other. Pharnabazus came thither, thinking to have raifed the fiege. And Hippocrates a Captain of the LACEDEMONIANS, that was Governour of the City, affembled all the force he was able to make within the fame, and made a falley out also upon the ATHENIANS at the very fame time. Whereupon Alcibiades putting his men in order of battel, fo as they might give charge upon them both at one inftant, fought fo valiantly, that he for- Alcibiates viced Pharnabaxus to run his way with shame enough, and slew Hippocrates in the Field, with a great story at Chalnumber of his men. Then took he the Seas again, to go towards the Countrey of Helle cedonia. number of his men. Then took he the Seas again, to go towards the Countrey of Helle Milibiades SPONT, to get fome Money, where on the fudden he did take the City of Selvere : because took the City he valiantly put himself in hazard before the time appointed him. For certain of his friends with- of Selptra. in , with whom he had fecret practife , had given him a token , that when time ferved , they would shew a burning torch in the air at midnight : but they were compelled to shew this fire in the air before they were ready, for fear left one of their confederacy would betray the matter, who fuddenly repented him. Now this torch burning in the air, was fet before Alcibiades was ready with his company. But he perceiving the fign fet, took about thirty men with him in his company, and ran with them to the walls of the City, having commanded the rest of his Army to follow him with all speed possible. The gate was opened to him, and to his thirty men : besides them there followed twenty other light armed men. Howbeir they were no fooner entred the City, but they heard the Citizens armed come against them : so that there was no hope to scape, if they did tarry their coming. Nevertheless, considering that untill that present time, he was never overcome in The present battel where he had taken charge; it grieved him very much to fly : wherefore it straight came in wit of Alibiahis head to make filence by found of Trumpet, and after filence made, he caused one of them that des. were about him to make Proclamation with a loud voice, that the SELY BRIANIANS Should not take Arms against the ATHENIANS. This cooled them a little that would fain have been doing, because they supposed that all the Army of the ATHENIANS had been already in the City: the other on the contrary fide, were very glad to talk of peace, without any further danger. And as they began to parle upon composition, the rest of Aicibiades Army was come on. Now he thinking indeed (which was true) that the SELYBRIANIANS fought nothing but peace, and fearing left the THRACIANS (which were many in number , and came with good will to ferve him in that journey) would fack and spoil the City, he made them all to go out again : and so concluding peace with the chief of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt upon their humble dubmission, but made them pay him a sum of money, and so leaving a Garison of the Athenians within the City, he departed thence. Whilst Alcibiades was in treaty with the Selv-BRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN Captains that lay at the fiege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he should give them a sum of money, and give up the Town into the ATHENIANS hands, to enjoy it as they did before. And with express condition The Chalcedoalfo, that the ATHENIANS should make no rodes into Pharnabaz su Dominions, to hurt or spoil nians receive any of his : and he likewise should be bound to give good safe conduct unto the Ambassadours of the the Athenians. ATHENIANS, to go and come fafe from time to time, to the King of Persia. The other Captains being sworn to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned also that Alsibiades at his return should likewise be sworn to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades said he would not be fworn at all, unless Pharnabazau were first fworn for his part. Thus when Oaths were taken on either side, Alcibiades went also against those of BYZANTIUM, who in like case had rebelled against the ATHENIANS. At his first coming thither, he invironed the City round about with a wall. Afterwards he practifed with two fecret friends of his, Anaxilaus and Lycurgus, and certain other within the City, who promifed him to deliver it into his hands, so they might be affured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practife, he gave it out that he must needs leave the siege, Alcibiades straand depart with speed, for certain news that were come out of IONIA: and thereupon he im- tagem at Bybarked prefently, and went out of the haven at noon day with all his Ships, howbeit he returned gamium. again the same night. And going aland with the choisest and best armed men he had, he approached the walls of the City, without any manner of noise, and having left order with them that remained in the Ships, that in the mean season they should row with all force into the haven, with as great cries and shours as might be, to fear and trouble the Enemies : partly to fear the BYZANTINES

the more with their judden coming among them, and partly that his confederates within the City, might with better opportunity receive him and his company, into the Town with the more affured fafety, whilst every man ran to the haven, to refift them that were upon the Galleys. Neverthelefs they went not away unfought with. For those that lay in garrifon within the City, some of them PELOPONNESIANS, other BOEOTIANS, and other MEGARIANS, did fo valiantly repulse them that came out of their Galleys, that they drave them to retire abound again. Afterwards hearing how the ATHENIAN'S were entred the City on the other fide, they put themselves in battel ray, and went to meet them. The battel was terrible of both parts: but Alcibiades in the end obtained victory, leading the right wing of this battel, and Theramenes the left. The victory being gotten, he took three hundred of his Enemies prisoners, who had escaped the fury of the battel. But after the battel, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither banished, nor his goods confidenced: because it was capitulated by Alcibiade: with his confederates, that neither he nor his, should hurt any of the BYZANTINES, either in person or goods, nor any way should rifle them. And Anaxilam being afterwards accused of Treason in LACIDAMON for this practise, he anfwered and juftified himself in such fort, that they could not find he had committed the fault laid unto his charge. For he faid that he was no LACEDEMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: and that he faw not LAC DEMON in danger, but BY ZANTIUM, which the Enemies had encompassed about with a wall they had built, that it was impossible to bring any thing into the City. Moreover he alledged, that they having small store of corn within the City (as was true indeed) the Palo-PONNESIANS and BOBOTIANS that lay there in garrison, did eat it up, while the poor By-ZANTINES themselves, their wives and children, died for very hunger. Therefore it could not be faid of him, that he had betrayed his Countrey, but rather that he had delivered it from the miferies and calamities the Wars brought upon it : wherein he had followed the example of the honestoff men of LACEDENON, who did acknowledge nothing honeft and just, but that which was necesfary and profitable for their Countrey. The LACEDBAONIANS hearing his reasons alledged for his purgation, were ashamed to condemn him, and therefore they let him go. Now Alcibiades destrous in the end to see his native Countrey again (to speak more truly, that his Countrey-men should see him) after he had so many times overthrown their Enemies in battel: he hoised sail and directed his course towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the Galleys of the ATHENIANS Altibiates ho- richly furnished, and decked all about with Scutchions and Targets, and other Armour and Weapon gotten amongst the spoils of his Enemies. Moreover, he brought with him many other Ships which he had won and broken in the Wars, besides many Ensigns and other Ornaments : all which being counted together one with the other, made up the number of two hundred Ships. Furthermore, where Davis Samian writeth (who challenged that he came of his houle) that at thermore, where Davis Samian writeth (who challenged that he came of his houle) that at thermore, where Davis an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, an excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, and excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, and excellent player on the Flute (that had won certain of the Pythinis return one Chrysogonus, and the Chrys an games) did play fuch a note, that at the found thereof the Galley-flaves would keep stroke with their Oars; and that Callippides another excellent player of Tragedies, playing the part of a Comedy, did ftir them to row, being in fuch Players garments as every Mafter of fuch Science useth commonly to wear, prefenting himself in a Theatre or Stage beforethe People to shew his art; and that the Admirall-Galley wherein himself was, entred the Haven with a Purple Sail, as if some Masque had come into a mans house after some great Banquet made : neither Ephorm, nor Theopom-Piss, nor Xenophon, make anymention of this at all. Furthermore, methiaks it should not be true, that he (returning from exile after to long a banishment, and having) passed over such forrows and calamities as he had sustained) would so proudly and presumptroously thew hanself unto the ATRA NIANS. But meerly contrary, it is most certain, that he returned in great fear and doubt. For when he was arrived in the Haven of PIREA, he would not fer foot aland, before he first saw his Nephew Euryptolemus, and divers other of his friends, from the harches of his Ship, flanding upon the fand in the Havens mouth ; who were come thither to receive and welcome him , and told him that he might be hold to land, without fear of any thing. He was no fooner landed, but all the People ran out of every corner to fee him, with fo great love and affection, that they took no heed of the other Captains that came withhim, but clustered all to him onely, and cried out for joy to fee him : Those that could come near him, did welcome and embrace him ; but all the People wholly followed him. And somethat came to him, put Garlands of Flowers upon his head : and those that could not come near him, faw him afar off, and the old folkes did point him out to the younger fort. But this common joy was mingled norwithflanding with tears and forrow, when they came to think upon their former misfortune and calamities, and to compare them with their prefent prosperity: weighing with themselves also how they had not lost Sicilia, nor their hope in all things else had failed them, if they had delivered themselves and the charge of their Army into Alcibiades hands, when they fent for him to appear in person before them. Confidering also how he found the City of ATHENS in manner put from the feigniory and; commandment of the Sea; and on the other fide how their force by Land was brought into such extremity, that ATHENS frantly could defend her Suburbs, the City felf being so divided and turmoyled with civil diffention : yet he gathered together thole few, and small force that remained, and had not onely reftered ATHENS to her former power and foveraignty on the Sea, but had made her also conqueror by Land. Now the Decree for his repair home again, past before by the People, at the instant request of Cultius, the Son of Challesenna, who did prefer it : 25he himfelt did teftifie in his Elegies, putting Altibiades in remembrance of the good turn he had done him, faying:

I was the first that moved in open conference The Peoples voyce to call thee home, when thou wert banisht hence. So was I eke the fir ft which thereto gave confent. And therefore may I boldly say, by truth of such intent : I was the onely mean, to call thee bome again, By fuch request so rightly made, to move the Peoples vain And this may ferve for pledge, what friendship I thee bear : Fast sealed with a faithfull tongue, as plainly shall appear.

But notwithstanding, the People being affembled in Council, Alcibiades came before them, and made an Cration : wherein he first lamented all the mishaps, and found himself grieved a little with the wrongs they had offered him, yet he imputed all in the end to his curfed fortune, and fome spightfull god that envied his glory and prosperity. Then he dilated at large the great hope Alcibiades otheir Enemies had to have advantage of them : and therewithall perswaded the People to be of ration to the good courage, and afeard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the People crowned people. him with Crowns of Gold, and chose him General again of Athens, with soveraign power Alcibideschoand Authority both by Land and by Sea. And at that very inftant it was decreed by the People, fengoneral that he should be restored again to his Goods, and that the Priests Eumolpides should absolve with soveraign him of all their Curses, and that the Heraulds should with open Proclamation revoke the Execrati- authority. ons and curfings they had thundred out against him before, by commandment of the People. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, faving Theodorus the Bilhop, who faid : I did neither excommunicate him, nor curse him, if he hath done no hurt to the Commonwealth. Now Alcibiades flourished in his chiefest prosperity, yet were there some notwithstanding that misliked very much the time of his landing : faying, it was very unlucky and unfortunate. For the very day of his the time of instanding : raying, it was very amount, and the state of the washing day, which they celebrate in the honour of Minerva : on the which day, the Pricts that they call Praxiergides, do make certain secret and hidden Sacrifices and Ceremonies, being the five and twentieth day of the Moneth of September, and do take from the Image of this goddess all her Rayment and Jewels, and keep the Image close covered over. Hereupon the ATHENIANS do ascribe that day for a most unfortunate day, and are very circumspect to do any matter of importance on it. Moreover, it was commonly scanned abroad of every body, that it seemed the goddels was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades return : and that the did hide her felf, because the would not fee him, nor have him come near her. Notwithstanding all these toyes and Ceremonies, when Alcibiades found every thing fell out well at his return, and as he would have withed it; he armed a hundred Galleys prefently, to return again to the Wars. Howbeit he wifely regarded the time and folemnity of celebration of these mysteries, and considerately stayed untill they had finished all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDEMONIANS had taken and fortified the City of DECRIBA, within the Territory of ATTICA, and that the Enemies being the strong ger in the Field, did keep the way going from ATHENS to ELEUSIN, fo as by no possible means they could make their folemn procession by Land, with such honour and devotion as they were before accustomed to do: and thereby all the Sacrifices, Daunces, and many other holy devour Ceremonies they were wont to do by the way, in finging the holy Song of Inching, came of very necessity to be left off and clean laid aside. Then Alcibiades though he should do a meritorious Alcibiades redeed to the gods, and an acceptable to men, to bring the old Ceremonies up again upon the faid flored the old Feast : and thereupon purposed to accompany the Procession, and defend it by power against all Ceremonies. invalion and disturbance by the Enemies: as one that foresaw one of these two things would come to pals : Either that Agis King of the LACEDEMONIANS would not flir at all, and that he by this means should so much imbase and diminish his reputation and glory : or if he did come out into the Field, that he would make the Battel very gratefull to the gods, confidering it should be in defence of their most holy Feast and Worship, and in the fight of his Countrey, where the People should see and witness both his valiantness, and also his courage. Alcibiades being fully refolved upon this procession, went and made the Priests Eumolpides, their Vergers, and other their Ministers and Officers of these mysteries, privy to his determination. Then he fent out Scouts to watch on the fide of the hills thereabouts, and to view the way of their perambulation. The next morning very early he fent out light Horsemen also to scour the Countrey. Then he made the Priests, the professed, and all the Ministers of Religion, go in Procession, together with those that followed the fame : and he himself compassed them about with his Army on every side, marching in Battel ray, and very good order, and with great filence. This was an honourable and devout leading of an Army, and such as if his greatest Enemies would confess a truth, they could not but say, Alcibiades had as much shewed the Office of a high Bishop, or of a noble Souldier and good Captain. So he entred this Procession, returning to ATHENS in all safe order again, and not an Enemy that durst once look out into the Field to set upon them. Now this did more encrease the greatness of his mind, and therewith the Peoples good opinion of his fufficiency, and wife conduction of an Army: infomuch as they thought him unvincible, having the Soveraign Power and Authority of a General. Furthermore, he spake so fair to the poor People, and meaner fort, that they chiefly wished and defired he would take upon him like a King o yea, and many went to him to perswade him in it, as though he should thereby

withftand all envy, and drive away the Laws and Customs of trying of matters by the voyces of the People, and all fuch fond devices as did destroy the state of the Commonweal. And furthermore, they faid it was very needfull that he alone should take upon him the whole Rule and Government of the City, that he might dispose all things according to his will, and not stand in sear of slanderous and wicked tongues. Now, whether Alcibiades ever had any mind to uturp the Kingdom, the matter is fomewhat doubtfull. But this is certain, the greatest men of the City fearing left indeed he meant fome such thing, did haften his departure as soon as they could positible, doing all other things according to his mind : and did assign him such Affociates in his charge of General, as he himfelf beft liked. So in the end he departed with a cond journey. Fleet of an hundred Galleys, and first of all he fell with the Isle of Andros, where he overcame by fight the Inhabitants of the faid Isle, and certain LACEDEMONIANS that were amonght them : but he took not the City, which was one of the first matters his Enemies did accule him for. For if ever man was overthrown and envied for the estimation they had of his valour and sufficiency, truly Alcibiades was the man. For his notable and sundry services he had done, won him such estimation of wisdom and valiantness, that where he slacked in any service whatfoevever, he was prefently suspected, judging the ill success not in that he could not, but for that he would not : and that where he undertook any Enterprife, nothing could withfrand or lie in his way. Hereupon the People performing themselves, that immediately after his departies in his way. Hereupon the People performing themselves, that immediately after his departies, they should hear that the Ille of Chio was taken, with all the Country of 10 NIA, Lack of money cite, viewy more and the lack of findently from him as they looked for. Moreover, the occasion of they were angry they could have no news fo fuddently from him as they looked for. Moreover, the occasion of they were angly they could have no news to had and specially making War with such Enemies, the overthrow they did not consider the lack of money he had, and specially making War with such Enemies, of the Albenia as were ever relieved with the great King of Persia's aid, and that for necessities sake he was fundry times driven to leave his Camp, to feek money where he could get it, to pay his Souldiers, and to maintain his Army. Now for testimony hereof, the last Accusation that was against him, was onely for this matter. Lyfander being sent by the LACEDEMONIANS for Admiral and General of their Army by Sea, used such policy with Cyrus the King of Per-51A's brother, that he got into his hands a great fum of money: by means whereof he gave unto his Mariners four Oboles a day for their Wages, where before they were wont to have but three, and yet Alcibiades had much ado to furnish his with three onely a day. For this caule, to get money, Alcibiades failed unto CARIA. But in the mean time Antiochus, whom Alcibiades had left his Lieutenant behind him, and had given him charge of all the Ships in his ablence, being a very skilfull Sea-man, but otherwise a hafty harebraind fool, and of small capacity: he being expresly commanded by Alcibiades not to fight in any case, though the Enemies offered him Battel, was to foolish rash, and made to little reckoning of his straight commandment, that he armed his own Galley, whereof himself was Captain, and other be-Antiochusrath- fides, and went to the City of EPHESUS, passing all along his Enemies Galleys, reviling and offering villany to those that stood upon the Hatches of their Galleys, Lyfander being marvelloully provoked by these words; went and encountred him at the first with a few Ships. The other Captains of the Galleys of the ATHENIANS, feeing Antiochus in danger, went to aid him, one after another. Then Lyfander of his part also set out all his whole Fleet against and the over-Lyfander being and men were taken Priloners: wherefore Lyfander fet up shews of triumph in token of victory.

Alcibiades hearing this illegarded news are started and applications. him, and in the end overcame them: Antiochus felf was killed in the conflict, and many Gallies general of the Alcibiades hearing this illfavoured news, returned prefently with all possible speed to Samos: Lucisonmann and when he came thither, he went with all the reft of his Fleet to offer Lysander battel. But Lyfander quietly contenting himself with his first Victory, went not out against him. Now this Victory was no fooner won, but one Thrafybulus the Son of Thrason, Alcibiades Enemy, went incontinently from the Camp, and got him to ATHENS, to accuse Aleibiades to the Michigales acpeople: whom he informed how all went to wrack, and that he had loft many Ships, for that cufed again by People : whom he informed now all went to wrack, and that he he gave too great credit to, Thriffipular, he regarded not his charge, carelelly putting men in truft; whom he gave too great credit to, and were full of Mariners becaule they were good fellows, and would drink drunk with him, and were full of Mariners mocks and knavish jests, such as they use commonly amongst themselves. And that he in the mean time took his pleasure abroad, here and there, scraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good chear, and feafting of the ABYDENIAN and IONIAN Curtizans, when the Enemies Army was so near theirs as it was. Moreover, they laid to his charge, that he did fortifie a Castle in the Countrey of THRACIA, near unto the City BISANTHE, for a place to retire himself unto, either because he could not, or rather that he would not live any longer in his own Countrey. Upon those accusations, the ATHENIANS giving credit to the report, did immediately choose new Captains, and thereby declared their milliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing left they would do him some worse harm, did leave straight the Altibides put ATHENIANS Camp, and gathering a certain number of strangers together, went of himself nor State: where he got a marvellous mals of money together, by means whereof he did affure the Grecians inhabiting those marches, from all invation of foraign Enemies. Now Tydem, and Menander, and Adimanthus, the ATHENIANS Captains, being afterwards in a place commonly called the Goats River, with all the Galleys the City of ATHENS had at that time upon the Coast: used every morning to go into the Sea, to offer Battel to Lyfander, who rode at Anker before the City of Lampfachus, with all the LACEDEMONIANS Army by Sea, and commonly returned again to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either Lyfander rode watch or ward, as men that were careless of their Enemies. Alcibiades being on the Land not for Lambiafar off, and finding their great fault and negligence, took his Horse, and went to them, and cut, told them that they lay on an ill shoar, where there was no good rode, nor Town, and where they were driven to seek their Victuals, as far as to the City of SESTOS, and that they suffered their Mariners to leave their Ships, and go aland when they lay at anker, stragling up and down the Countrey as they would themselves, without regard that there lay a great Army of their Enemies before them, ready to be 'fet out at the Generals commandment : and therefore he advised them to remove thence, and go to cast anker before the City of Sastos. Howbeit The Arbenians the Captains would not be advised by him : and that which was worst of all, Tydaus, one of regarded not the Captains, flourly commanded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to do with the matter, and that other had charge of the Army. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpole some Treason against him, did depart presently from them. And as he went his way, he faid to some of his friends which accompanyed him out of the Camp at his return : that if the Captains of the ATHENIANS had not been so round with him, he would have forced the LACEDEMONIANS to have come to battel in despight of their beards, or else he would have driven them to forfake their Ships. Some took this for a glorious brag : other thought he was like enough to have done it, because he could have brought from Land a great number of THRACIANS, both Archers and Horsemen, with whom he might have given a charge upon the LACEDEMONIANS, and done great mischief unto their Camp. But now, how wifely Alcibiades did foresee the faults he told the ATHENIANS Captains of, their great missfortune and loss that followed incontinently, did too plainly witness it to the World. For Lyfander The Athenians came so fiercely upon them on a sudden, that of all the Ships that they had in their whole overcome by Fleet, onely eight Gallys were faved, with whom Conon fled : and the other being not much Lyfander. less then two hundred in number, were every one of them taken and carried away, with three thousand Prisoners, whom Lysander put to death. Shortly after, he took the City self of Athens taken ATHENS, and razed their long Walls even to the ground. After this great and notable Victo- by Lyfander. ry, Alcibiades fearing fore the LACEDEMONIANS, who then without lett or interruption of any, were onely Lords and Princes by Sea and by Land: he went into the Countrey of BYTHI- Alcibiades fly-NIA, and caused great Goods to be brought after him, and took a marvellous sum of mo- eth into the nev with him, besides great Riches he lest also in the Castles of Thracia, where he did re- Countrey of main before. Howbeit he loft much of his Goods in BYTHINIA, which certain THRACI- Bythtnia. ANS dwelling in that Countrey, had robbed him of, and taken from him. So he determined to repair forthwith unto King Artaxerxes , hoping that when the King had once proved him, he should find him a man of no less service, then he had found Themistocles before him; besides that the occasion of his going thither, should be much juster then his was : for he did not go thither, to make War against the City of ATHENS and his Countrey, as Themistocles did : but of a contrary intent, to make intercession to the King, that it would please him to aid them, Now Alcibiades thinking he could use no better mean then Pharnabazus help onely, to see him fafely conducted to the Kings Court : he took his journey to him into the Countrey of PHRY-GIA, where he abode a certain time to attend upon him, and was very honourably entertained and received of Pharnabazus. All this while the ATHENIANS found themselves desolate, Lylander apand in miserable state to see their Empire lost: but then much more, when Lysander had taken pointed thirty away their Liberties, and fet thirty Governours over their City. Now too late, after all was tyrants over loft (where they might have recovered again, if they had been wife) they began together to the Citizens bewail and lament their miseries and wretched state, looking back upon all their wilfull faults of Athens. and follies committed : among which, they did reckon their fecond time of falling out with Al- Too late recibiades, was their greatest fault : for they banished him onely of malice and displeasure, not for the Athenians. any offence himself in person had committed against them, taying that his Lieutenant in his abfence had fhamefully loft a few of their Ships : and they themselves more shamefully had driven out of their City, the nobleft Souldier, and most skilfull Captain that they had. And yet they had some little poor hope left, that they were not altogether cast away, so long as Alcibiades lived, and had his health. For before, when he was a forfaken man, and led a banished life, yet he could not live idlely, and do nothing; wherefore now much more, faid they to themfelves, if there be any help at all, he will not fuffer out of doubt the infolency and pride of the LACEDAMONIANS, nor yet abide the cruelties and outrages of these thirty Tyrants. And furely the common People had fome reason to have these thoughts in their heads, considering that the thirty Governours themselves did what they could possibly to spy out Alcibi. des doings, and what he went about. Infomuch as Critius at the last, declared to Lyfander, that so long the LACEDEMONIANS might reckon themselves Lords over all GREECE, as they kept from the common People the Rule and Authority of the City of ATHENS. And further he added, that notwithstanding the People of ATHEN'S could well away to live like Subjects under the Government of a few: yet Alcibiades whilest he lived, would never suffer them so to be reigned over, but would attempt by all device he could, to bring a change and innovation among them. Yet Lysander would not credit these perswasions, before speciall commandment was sent to him from his Au- to make War upon certain free People of the THRACIANS, who were subject to no Prince thoult of Ge-from the Senate of LACEDEMON, upon his Allegiance, that he should devise to kill Alcibiades by all means he could procure: either because in troth they seared the subtility of his wit, and the greatnels of his courage, to enterprife matters of great weight and danger, or elle that they fought to granels of his courage, ners or the courage, recently the manuary or great weight and manger, or the that they rought to gratific King Agis by it. Lyfander being thus straightly commanded, did fend and practife incontinent. ly with Pharmabazsu to execute the Fact : who gave his Brother Magasus, and his Uncle Susamithres Commission to attempt the matter. Now was Alcibiades in a certain Village of PHRYGIA, with a Concubine of his called Timandra. So he thought he dreamed one night that he had put on his Concu-Pergis before bines Apparell, and how the dandling him in her arms, had drefted his head, frizeled his hair, and painted his face, as he had been a woman. Other fay, that he thought Magent strake off his head, paniere instace, as ite had been a woman. Other ray, that he thought 272 age 250 neares of his head, and made his body to be burnt: and the voice goeth, this Vision was but a little before his death. Those that were sent to kill him, durst not enter the house where he was, but set it on fire round about. Alcibiades (pying the fire, got fuch Apparell and Hangings as he had, and threw it on the fire, thinking to have put it out : and fo catting his Cloak about his left arm, took his naked Sword in his other hand, and ran out of the house, himself not once touched with fire, faying his clothes were a little finged. These murtherers, so soon as they spied him, drew back, and stood afunder, and durst not one of them come near him, to stand and fight with him: but afar off, they bestowed so many Arrows and Darts on him, that they killed him there. Now when they had left him, Timandra went and took Curtizan buried Middleth his body, which the wrapped up in the best Linen she had, and buried him as honourably as she could polible, with fuch things as the had, and could get together. Some hold opinion that Lau, the onely Last a Cuttipointoie, whili their tamps as life man, and count get together, a other form opinion that Last, the only famous Curtizan, which they fay was of CORINTH, though indeed the was born in a little Town of Sicilia, called Hiccara, where the was taken, was his daughter. THE LIFE OF CAIUS MARTIUS CORIOLANUS.

ALCIBIADES.

The Lacedamonians will Lyfander to kill Alcibiades.

Ann. Mund.

Ant. Christ.

HE House of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patri-The Family, out of the which have sprung many noble personages, whereof An-on Martine was one, King Numa's Daughters Son, who was King of the Mar-ROME after Tullus Hostilius. Of the same House were Publius and Quin- Publius and two, who brought to ROME their best water they had by Conduits. Cen- Quintus Marforinus also came of that Family, that was so surnamed, because the Peo- tius, brought ple had chosen him Cenfor twice. Through whose perswasion they made conduits to a Law, that no man from thenceforth might require, or enjoy the Cen-Rome. forship twice. Caius Martius, whose Life we intend now to write, be- Cenforinuslaw. ing left an Orphan by his Father, was brought up under his Mother a Widow, who taught us by experience, that Orphanage bringeth many discommodities to a Child, but doth not hinder him to become an honest man, and to excell in vertue above the common fort; as they that are meanly born, wrongfully do complain, that it is the occasion of their casting away, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to fee them well brought up, and taught that were meet. This man also is a good proof to confirm some mens opinions: That a rare and excellent wit untaught, doth bring forth many good and evill things together: as a fat foyl that lyeth unmanured bringeth forth both herbs and weeds. For this Martins naturall wit and great heart did marvellously stir up his courage to do and attempt notable acts. But on the other fide for lack of education, he was so cholerick and impatient, that he would yeeld to no living creature: which made him churlish, uncivill, and altogether unfit for any mans conversation. Yet men marvelling much at his conftancy, that he was never overcome with pleasure, nor money, and how he would endure eafily all manner of pains and travels: thereupon they well liked and commended his stoutness and temperancy. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one Citizen useth to be with another in the City: his behaviour was so unpleasant to them by reafon of a certain infolent and stern manner he had, which because he was too Lordly, was disliked. And to fay truly, the greatest benefit that Learning bringeth unto men, is this : that it teacheth The benefit of men that be rude and rough of nature, by compass and rule of reason, to be civill and courteous, Learning. and to like better the mean flate, then the higher. Now in those days, valiantness was honoured what this in ROME, above all other vertues: which they called virtue, by the name of vertue it self, as inclusioned word First ding in that generall name, all other speciali vertues besides. So that virtus in the Latine, was as significant. much as valiantness. But Martin being more inclined to the Wars, then any other Gentleman of his time, began from his childhood to give himself to handle Weapons, and daily did exercise himself therein; and he esteemed outward Armour to no purpose, unless one were naturally armed within. Moreover, he did so exercise his body to hardness and all kind of activity, that he was very swift in running, strong in wrestling, and mighty in griping, so that no man could ever cast him. Infomuch as those that would try masteries with him for strength and nimbleness, would fay when they were overcome : that all was by reason of his natural strength, and hardness Coriolanus first of ward, that never yeelded to any pain or toyl he took upon him. The first time he went to going to Wars, the Wars, being but a ftripling, was when Tarquine furnamed the proud (that had been King of ROME, and was driven out for his pride, after many attempts made by fundry Battels to come in again, wherein he was ever overcome) did come to ROME with all the aid of the LATINES, and again, wherein he was ever overcome / and controlled the whole reft upon a Battell by them, who many other People of IT ALY: even as it were to fet up his whole reft upon a Battell by them, who with a great and mighty Army had undertaken to put him into his Kingdom again, not fo much to pleasure him, as to overthrow the power of the ROMANS, whose greatness they both seared and envied. In this Battell, wherein were many hot and sharp encounters of either party, Martins valiantly fought in the fight of the Diffator: and a ROMAN Souldier being thrown to the ground even hard by him, Martius straight bestrid him, and slew the Enemy with his own hands that had before overthrown the ROMAN. Hercupon, after the Battell was won, the Diffator did not forget fo noble an act, and therefore first of all he crowned Martin with a Garland of oaken boughs. For whosever saveth the life of a ROMAN, it is a manner among them, to honour him with such crowned with a Garland. This was, either because the Law did this honour to the Oak, in favour of the Arca-DIANS, who by the Oracle of Apollo were in old time called eaters of akorns: or else because the Souldiers might easily in every place come by oaken boughs: or lastly, because they thought it very necessary, to give him that had faved a Cirizens life, a Crown of this Tree to honour him, being properly dedicated unso Jupiter, the Patron and Protector of Cities, and thought amongst other wild Trees to bring forth a profitable Fruit, and of Plants to be the strongest. Moreover, men at the first beginning did use akorns for their bread, and honey for their drink: and further, the Oak did feed their Beafts, and give them Birds, by taking glew from the Oaks, with the which they made bird-lime to catch filly Birds. They fay that Castor and Pollan, appeared in this Battell, and that incontinently after the Battell , men faw them in the Market-place at ROME , all their Horses being on a white foam: and they were the first that brought news of the Victory, even in the same place, where remaineth at this prefent a Temple built in the honour of them, near unto the Fountain. And this is the caule, why the day of this victory (which was the fifteenth of July) is confecrated yet to this day unto Caffor and Pollux. Moreover it is daily feen, that honour and reputation lighting on young men before their time, and before they have any great courage by nature, the defire to win more dieth straight in them, which easily happeneth, the same having no deep root in them before. Where contrariwise, the first honour that valiant minds do come unto, doth quicken up their appetite, hastning them forward as with force of wind, to enterprife things of high deferving praise. For they efteen not to receive reward for service done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them do better in time to come : and be ashamed also to cast their honour at their heels, not feeking to increase it still by like desert of worthy valiant deeds. This desire Coriolanus no- being bred in Martine, he ftrained ftill to pass himself in manlines : and being desirous to shew a Corrolation daily increase of his valiantness, his noble service did still advance his same, bringing in spoyls upon spoyls from the Enemies. Whereupon, the Captains that came afterwards (for envy of them well deferring that went before) did contend who should most honous him, and who should bear most honourable testimony of his valiantness. Infomuch as the ROMANS having many Wars and Battels in those days, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a Battell fought, from whence he returned not with some reward of honour. And as for other, the onely respect that made them valiant, was that they hoped to have honour : but touching Martius, the onely thing that made him to love honour, was the joy he saw his Mother did take of him. For he thought nothing made him so happy and honourable, as that his Mother might hear every body praise and commend him, that she might always fee him return with a Crown upon his head, and that the might ftill embrace him with tears Coriolanus and running down her cheeks for joy: Which defire they fay Epaminendas did avow and confess to Epaminondar have been in him, as to think himself a most happy and blessed man, that his Father and Modid both place ther in their life time had feen the victory he wan in the plain of Leuctres. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good hap, to have his Father and Mother living, to be partakers of his nonour auke.

The obedience joy and prosperity: but Martim thinking all due to his Mother, that had been also due to his Faof Coriolassus ther if he had lived, did not onely content himself to rejoyce and honour her, but at her desire took to his Mother. a Wife also, by whom he had two Children, and yet never left his Mothers houle therefore. Now he being grown to great credit and authority in ROME for his valiantness, it fortuned there grew fedition in the (ity, because the Senate did favour the rich against the People, who did complain of the fore oppression of Usurers, of whom they borrowed money. For those that had little, were yet fpoiled of that little they had by their Creditors, for lack of ability to pay the Ulury: who offered their Goods to be fold to them that would give most. And such as had nothing left, their bodies were laid hold on, and they were made their Bondmen, notwithstanding all the wounds and cuts they shewed, which they had received in many Battels, fighting for defence of their Countrey and Common wealth: of the which, the last War they made was against the SABYNS, wherein they fought upon the promife the rich men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreat them more promifes make gently, and also upon the word of Marcin Valering chief of the Senate, who by Authority of men valint, in the Council, and in the behalf of the rich the Council, and in the behalf of the rich, faid they should perform that they had promited But after that they had faithfully ferved in this laft Battell of all, where they overcame their Enemies, CORIOLANUS.

Whereupon the Senate immediately made open Proclamation by found of Trumpet, That all those that were of lawfull age to carry Weapon, should come and enter their names into the Muster-masters Book, to go to the Wars; but no man obeyed their commandment. Whereupon their chief Magistrates, and many of the Senate, began to be of divers opinions among themselves. For somethought it was reason, they should somewhat yeeld to the poor Peoples request, and that they should a little qualifie the severity of the Law. Other held hard against that opinion, and that was Martin for one. For he alledged, Martins Corinof the Law. Other neutrative against that opposite that the Creditours lofing their Money they had lent, was not the worft thing that was herein; but the people. that the lenity that was favoured, was a beginning of disobedience, and that the proud attempt of the Commonalty, was to abolish Law, and to bring all to confusion. Therefore he said, if the Senate were wife, they should betimes prevent and quench this ill favoured and worse meant beginning. The Se- The People nate met many days in consultation about it; but in the end they concluded nothing. The poor leave the City common People feeing no redrefs, gathered themselves one day together, and one encouraging another, they all for look the City, and encamped themselves upon a hill, called at that day the holy bill along the River of Tiber, offering no creature any hurt or violence, or making any shew of actuall rebellion, faving that they cried as they went up and down, that the rich men had driven them out of the City, and that throughout all ITALY they might find air, water, and ground to bury them in. Moreover they faid, to dwell at ROME was nothing elfe but to be flain, or hurt with continual Wars, and fighting for defence of the rich mens Goods. The Senate being afraid of their departure, did fend unto them certain of the pleasantest old men, and the most acceptable to the People among them. Of those Minenius Agrippa was he, who was sent for chief man of the Message from the Senate. He after many good perswasions and gentle requests made to the People, on the behalf of the Senate, knit up his Oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner: That on An excellent a time all the Members of mans body did rebell against the belly, complaining of it, that it onely tale told by remained in the midft of the body, without doing any thing, neither did bear any labour to the grippa to pacimaintenance of the reft: whereas all other parts and Members did labour painfully, and were very he the People. carefull to fatisfie the appetites and defires of the body. And fo the belly, all this notwithftanding laughed at their folly, and faid : It is true, I first receive all meats that nourish mans body; but afterwards I fend it again to the nourishment of other parts of the same. Even so (quoth he)O you, my Masters, and Citizens of ROME, the reason is alike between the Senate and you. For matters being well digested, and their counsels throughly examined, touching the benefit of the Common-wealth, the Senators are cause of the common commodity that cometh unto every one of you. These persuasions pacified the People, conditionally, that the Senate would grant there should be yearly chosen five Magistrates, which they now cast Tribani plebis, whose Office should be to defend gianting of the poor People from violence and oppression. So Junius Brutus, and Sicinius Velutus, were the Tribusi pickits. first Tribunes of the People that were chosen, who had onely been the causers and procurers of this Faniss Brans, sedition. Hereupon the City being grown again to good quiet and unity, the People immediately Sicinius Velawent to the Wars, shewing that they had a good will to do better then ever they did, and to be first Tribunes. very willing to obey the Magistrates in that they would command, concerning the Wars. Martins also, though it liked him nothing to fee the greatness of the People thus increased, confidering it was to the prejudice and imbasing of the Nobility, and also saw that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as himself: he did perswade the Patricians, to shew themselves no less forward and willing to fight for their Countrey, then the common People were: and to let them know by their deeds and acts, that they did not so much pass the People in power and riches, as they did exceed them in true Nobility and valiantnels. In the Countrey of the VOLSCES, against whom the ROMANS made War at that time, there was a principall City of most fame, that was called CORIOLES, before the which the Confull Cominius did lay fiege. Wherefore all the other VOLSCES fearing left The City of that City should be taken by affault, they came from all parts of the Countrey to fave it, intending Corioles befier to give the ROMANS battell before the City, and to give an onset on them in two severall places. Gonfull Comi-The Conful Commiss understanding this, divided his Army also into two parts, and taking the one nius. part with himself, he marched towards them that were drawing to the City out of the Countrey: and the other part of his Army he left in the Camp with Titus Latius (one of the valiantest men Titius Latius, a the ROMANS had at that time) to refift those that would make any falley out of the City upon valizat Roman. them. So the CORIOLANS making small account of them that lay in Camp before the City, made a Salley out upon them, in thewhich at the first the Coriol Ans had the better, and drave the ROMANS back again into the Trenches of their Camp. But Martins being there at that time, running out of the Camp with a few men with him, he flew the first Enemies he met withall, and made the rest of them stay upon the sudden, crying out to the ROMANS that had turned their backs, and The property calling them again to fight with a loud voice. For he was even such another, as Cato would have a of a Souldier. Souldier and a Captain to be, not onely terrible and fierce to lay about him, but to make the Enemy afraid with the found of his voyce, and grimness of his countenance. Then there flocked about him immediately, a great number of ROMANS: whereat the Enemies were so afraid, that they gave

And there perfecting that the Amarica and Arrows which flew about their ears from the Walls of the City, and that there was no cone and Arrows which new about the first to follow the flying Enemies into their City, for that it man amongst them that durst venture himself to follow the flying Enemies into their City, for that it man antonger ment that durit venture minion to follow the mying and and any jor that it was full of men of War, very well armed and appointed, he did encourage his fellows with words and deeds, crying out to them, that fortune had opened the Gares of the City, more for the followers then the flyers. But all this notwithflanding, few had the hearts to follow him. Howbeit Martim being in the throng amongst the Enemies, thrust himself into the Gates of the City, and entred the fame among them that fled, without that any one of them durft at the first turn their face upon the name among them that need, without that any one or than a feeing he was entred the City with very him, or offer to flay him. But he looking about him, and feeing he was entred the City with very mm, or oner to tray mm. Due the tooking about mm, and then give was entired the city with very few men to help him, and perceiving he was environed by his Enemies that gathered round about to fet upon him, did things as it is written, wonderfull and incredible, aswell for the force of his hand, as allo for the agility of his body, and with a wonderfull courage and valiantness he made a lane through the midft of them, and overthrew also those he layed at: that some he made run to rane introugume mun or mem, and overtunew and more he hard at the fourthest part of the City, and other for fear he made yeeld themselves, and to let fall their weather for fear he made yeeld themselves. pons before him. By this means, Martin that was gotten out, had fome leifure to bring the Ro-NAN'S with more fatery into the City. The City being taken in this fort, the most part of the Souldiers began incontinently to fpoil, to carry away, and to look up the booty they had won. But Martin was marvellous angry with them, and cried out on them, that it was no time now to look after spoil, and to run stragging here and there to enrich themselves, whilest the other Consul and ancer 1901, and 10 1011 in againg race and increase, mind and how that leaving the fpoil, their fellow Citizens peradventure were fighting with their Enemies: and how that leaving the fpoil, they should feek to wind themselves out of danger and perill. Howbeit, cry and say to them what he could, very few of them would hearken to him. Wherefore taking those that willingly offered themselves to follow him, he went out of the City, and took his way towards that part, where he understood the rest of the Army was, exhorting and intreating them by the way that followed him, not to be faint-hearted; and oft holding up his hands to Heaven, be befought the gods to be gracious and favourable unto him, that he might come in time to the Battell, and in a good hour to ha zard his life in defence of his Countrey-men. Now the ROMANS when they were put in battell ray, and ready to take their Targets on their arms, and to gird them upon their arming Coats, had a custom to make their Wills at that very instant, without any manner of writing, naming him Souldiers Te- onely whom they would make their Heir in the prefence of three or four Winelies. Martin cane just to that reckoning, whilft the Souldiers were doing after that fort, and that the Enemis were approached so near, as one stood in view of the other. When they saw him at his first coning all bloody, and in a fweat, and but with a few men following him: fome thereupon began to be afeard. But soon after, when they saw him run with a lively cheer to the Confull, and so takehim by the hand, declaring how he had taken the City of CORIOLES, and that they faw the Confull Cominion also kils and embrace him: then there was not a man but took heart again to him, and began to be of good courage, fome hearing him report from point to point, the happy furcels of this Exploit, and other also conjecturing it by seeing their gettures afar off. Then they all began to call upon the Confull to march forward, and to delay no longer, but to give charge upon the Enemy. Martins asked him how the order of their Enemies Battel was, and on which fide they had placed their best fighting men. The Consult made him answer, that he thought the Bands which were in the vaward of their Battell, were those of the ANTIATES, whom they estremed to be the warlikeft men, and which for valiant courage would give no place, to any of the Hoft of By Coriolanus their Enemies. Then prayed Martim, to be fet directly against them. The Confull granted him, greatly praifing his courage. Then Martim, when both Armies came almost to joyn, advanced himfelf a good space before his Company, and went so siercely to give charge on the vaward that came right againft him, that they could ftand no longer in his hands : he made fuch a lane through them, and opened a passage into the Battell of the Enemies. But the two Wings of either side turmeans the Volfci were ned one to the other, to compass him in between them: which the Consull Committee perceiving, overcome in he fent thither ftraight of the best Souldiers he had about him. So the Battell was marvellous bloudy about Maring, and in a very thort space many were slain in the place. But in the end the ROMANS were fo ftrong, that they diffrested the Enemies, and brake their array; and fartering them, made them fiy. Then they prayed Martin that he would retire to the Camp, be cause they saw he was able to do no more, he was already so wearied with the great pain he had taken, and so faint with the great wounds he had upon him. But Martin answered them, that it was not for Conquerours to yeeld, nor to be faint-hearted: and thereupon began afresh to chale those that fled, untill such time as the Army of the Enemies was utterly overthrown, and numbers of them flain and taken Prisoners. The next morning betimes, Martins went to the Conful, and the other ROMANS with him. There the Confull Cominius going up to his Chair of State, in the presence of the whole Army, gave thanks to the gods for fo great, glorious, and prosperous a Victory: then he spake to Martim, whose valiantness he commended beyond the Moon, both for that he himself faw him do with his eyes, as also for that Martin had reported unto him. So in the end he willed Martins, that he should choose our of all the Horses they had taken of this ferrice; their Enemies, and of all their Goods they had won, (whereof there was great flore page) of every fort which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Beids this great honourable offer he had made him, he gave him in testimony that he had won that day the price of prowels above all other, a goodly Horse with a Capparison, and all Furniture to him; which the whole Army beholding, did marvelloufly praife and commend. But Martins ftep- Valiancy reping forth, told the Conful, he most thankfully accepted the gift of his Horse, and was a glad man warded with ping forth, told the Commit, he most thanhand acceptance and as for his other offer, which befides, that his fervice had deferved his Generals commendation: and as for his other offer, which Field. was rather a mercenary reward, then an honourable recompence, he would have none of it, but Martius noble was contented to have his equall part with the other Souldiers. Onely this grace (faid he) I crave answer and and beleech you to grant me : Among the VOLSCES there is an old friend and Host of mine, an refusal, honest wealthy man, and now a Prisoner, who living before in great wealth in his own Countrey liveth now a poor prisoner, in the hands of his Enemies: and yet notwithstanding all this his misery and misfortune, it would do me great pleasure if I could fave him from this one danger, to keep him from being fold as a Slave. The Souldiers hearing Martins words, made a marvellous great shout among them, and there were more that wondred at his great contentation and abstinence, when they faw so little covetousness in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valiantness. For even they themselves that did formewhat malice and envy his glory, to fee him thus honoured and paffingly praifed, did think him so much the more worthy of an honourable recompence for his valiant service, as the more carelesly he refused the great offer made unto him for his profit : and they esteemed more the vertue that was in him, that made him refuse such rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as unto a worthy person. For it is far more commendable, to use Riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to defire them then to use them well. After this shout and noise of the Assembly was somewhat appealed, the Consul Cominius began to speak in this fort. We cannot compell Martin to take these Gifts we offer him if he will not receive them, but we will give him fuch a reward for the noble fervice he hath done, as he cannot refuse, them, but we will give him fuch a reward for the noble service he had done, as he cannot return.

Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, unless his valiant acts med Coriolanus. have won him that name before our nomination. And so ever since, he still bare the third name of by the Con-Coriolanus. And thereby it appeareth, that the first name the Romans have, as Caim, was as su our Christian name now. The second, as Martin, was the name of the House and Family they came How the Roof. The third, was some addition given, either for some act or notable service, or for some mark mans came to of. Ine third, was some addition given a share for some fact of nonable territe; of for some many have three on their face, or of some shape of their body, or else for some speciall vertue they had. Even so did names. the Grecians in old time give additions to Princes, by reason of some notable act worthy me- Why the Gremory. As when they have called some, Soter and Callinicos, as much to say as Saviour and Conque-cians gave ror. Or else of some notable apparent mark on ones sace, or on his body, they have called him Kings sur-Phiscon and Grypos: as ye would say, gorebelly, and hook-nosed; or else for some vertue, as Eu-names. ergeter, and Philadelphes, to wit, a Benefactour, and lover of his brethren. Or otherwise for ones great felicity, as Endamon: as much to fay, as fortunate. For fo was the fecond of the * Battes *Thefe were furnamed. And fome Kings have had furnames of jeft and mockery. As one of the Antigones that the Princes was called Dofon, to fay, the Giver: who was ever promifing, and never giving. And one of the that built the Prolomers was called Lamyros : to fay , conceitive. The ROMANS use more then any other Nati- City of Cyon, to give names of mockery in this fort. As there was one Metellus furnamed Diadematus, the Names of banded, because he carried a band about his head of long time, by reason of a sore he had in his mockery aforehead. One other of his own family was called Celer, the quick Flie, because a few days after mong the the death of his Father, he shewed the People the cruell fight of sencers at unrebated Swords, which Romans. they found wonderfull for the shortness of time. Other had their Surnames derived of some accident at their birth. As to this day they call him Proculeiss, that is born, his Father being in some far voyage: and him Posthumius, that is born after the death of his Father. And when of two Brethren twins, the one doth die, and the other furviveth: they call the furviver Vopifcus. Sometimes also they give surnames derived of some mark or missortune of the body : as Sylla, to say, crooked nofed : Niger , black : Rufus , red : Cacus , blind , Claudus , lame. They did wifely in this thing to accustome men to think, that neither the loss of their fight, nor other such misfortunes as may chance to men, are any shame or disgrace unto them, but the manner was to answer boldly to such names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit these matters would be better amplified in other stories then this. Now when this war was ended, the flatterers of the People began to flir up sedition again, without any new occasion, or just matter offered of complaint. For they Sedition at did ground this fecond infurrection against the Nobility and Patricians, upon the Peoples milery and Rome by reamisfortune, that could not but fall out, by reason of the former discord and sedition between them son of samines and the Nobility. Because the most part of the arable Land within the Territory of Rome, was become heathy and barren for lack of ploughing, for that they had no time nor mean to cause Corn to be brought them out of other Countreys to fow, by reason of their Wars which made the extream dearth they had among them. Now those busie pratiers that sought the Peoples good will by sigh flattering words, perceiving great scarcity of Corn to be within the City, and though there had been plenty enough, yet the common People had no money to buy it : they spread abroad false tales and rumours against the Nobility, that they in revenge of the People, had practifed and procured the extream dearth among them. Furthermore, in the midst of this stir, there came Ambassadours to ROM E from the City of VELITRES, that offered up their City to the ROMANS, and prayed them they would fend new Inhabitants to replenish the same: because the plague had been so extream among them, and had killed such a number of them, as there was not lest alive the tenth person of the people that had been there before. So the wife men of ROME began to think, that the necessity of the VELITRIANS fell out in a most happy hour, & how by this occasion it was very meet in so great a scarcity of victuals, Hereupon the Confuls prickt out all those by a Bill, whom they intended to fend to VELITRES, to go dwell there as in form of a Colony: and they levied out all the rest that remained in the City of ROME, a great in form of a Colony; and they review on an incomment of foreign War, to pacific their number to go against the Volsces, hoping by the mean of foreign War, to pacific their fedition at home. Moreover they imagined, when the poor with the rich, and the mean fort with the Nobility, should by this device be abroad in the Wars, and in one Camp, and in one Service, and in one like danger: that then they would be more quiet and loving together. But Sicinius and Brut m, two seditious Tribunes, spake against either of these devices, and cried out upon the Noblebunes of the People, against men, that under the gentle name of a Colony, they would cloak and cover the most cruell and un-People, against then, that a might be: because they sent their poor Citizens into a fore insected City and pesti-both those de-naturall fact as might be: because they sent their poor Citizens into a fore insected City and pestinaturan fact as inigin be: because they sent their pool children and a fore infected chy and petition and in the fact of the sent though the sent the sent the sent though the sent the headlong caft down the People into a most bottomles pir. And are not yet contented to have famished some of the poor Citizens heretofore to death, and to put other of them even to the mercy of the plague: but airesh they have procured a voluntary War, to the end they would leave beof the progress of all the progress and the poor filly People should not be plagued, and onely hind no kind of milery and ill, wherewith the poor filly People should not be plagued, and onely because they are weary to serve the rich. The common People being set on a broile and bravery with these words, would not appear when the Consuls called their names by a Bill, to press them for the Wars, neither would they be fent out to this new Colony: infomuch as the Senate knew not well wars, nemer women they be transfer to make the matter. Martim then, who was now grown to great credit, and a from what to fay or to do in the matter. Martim then, who was now grown to great credit, and a from man befides, and of great reputation with the nobleft men of ROME, role up, and openly fpake against these flattering Tribunes. And for the replenishing of the City of Velitres, he did compell those that were chosen to go thither, and to depart the City, upon great penalties to him that should disobey: but to the Wars, the People by no means would be brought or conftrained. So Martin taking his friends and followers with him, and fuch as he could by fair words intreat to go with him, did run certain forreys into the Dominion of the ANTIATES, where he met with great plenty of Corn, and had a marvellous great fpoil, as well of Cattell as of men he had taken Prifoners, whom he brought away with him, and referved nothing for himself. Afterwards, having brought back again all his men that went out with him, fafe and found to ROME, and every man rich and loaden with spoil : then the home-tarriers and house-doves that kept ROME still, began to repent them that it was not their hap to go with him, and so envied both them that had sped to well in this journey, and also of malice to Martine, they spited to see his credit and estimation increase still more and more, because they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the People. after this, Martine flood for the Confulfhip: and the common People favoured his fute, thinking it would be a shame to them to deny and retule the chiefest Nobleman of bloud, and most worthy person of ROME, and specially him that had done so great service and good to the Common-wealth. For the cultom of ROME was at that time, that such as did sue for any Office, should for certain days before be in the Market-place, onely with a poor gown on their backs, and without any Coat underneath, to pray the Citizens to remember them at the day of election: which was thus devifed, either to move the People the more, by requesting them in such mean Apparell, or else because they might shew them their wounds they had gotten in the Wars in the service of the Common-wealth, as manifest marks and testimonies of their valiantness. Now it is not to be thought, that the futers went thus loofe in a fimple Gown in the Market-place, without any Coat under it, for fear, and suspition of the common People: for Offices of dignity in the City were not then gi then by defert, yen by favour or corruption. It was but of late time, and long after this, that buying and felling without favor, veri by rayour of consupriors. A way but of the Electors were bought for money. But alter corruption had once gotten way into the election of Offices, it hath run from man to man, even to the very fentence of Judges, and also among Captains in the Wars: so as in the end, that onely turned Common-wealths into Kingdoms, by making Armes subject to Money. Therefore methinks he had reason that said: He that first made Banquets, and gave Money to the common People, was the first that took away Authority, and destroyed Common-wealths. But this Pestilence crept in onely delitory by little and little, and did fecretly win ground fill, continuing a long time in ROME, beforeit was openly known and discovered. For no man can tell who was the first man that bought the Peoples voices for Money, nor that corrupted the fentence of the Judges. Howbeit at ATHENS fome the son of Anthemion, was the first that fed the Judges with Money, the son of Anthemion, was the first that fed the Judges with Money, that with mo- about the end of the Wars of PELOPONNESUS, being accused of Treason for yeelding up the ney corrupted Fort of PYLE at that time, when the golden and unfoiled age remained yet whole in judgement at the fentence of ROME. Now Marting following this cultom, shewed many wounds and cuts upon his body, which the Index and the junge, and he had received in seventeen years service at the Wars, and in many sundry Battels, being ever voices of the the foremost man that did set out feet to fight. So that there was not a man among the People, but was ashamed of himself, to refuse so valiant a man; and one of them said to another, we must needs choose him Consul, there is no remedy. But when the day of election was come, and that Marinu came to the Market-place with great pomp, accompanied with all the Senate and the whole Nobility of the City about him, who fought to make him Conful, with the greatest instance and intreary they could, or ever attempted for any man or matter; then the love and good will of the common Feople.

turned straight to an hate and envie toward him, fearing to put this Office of Soveraign Authority into his hands, being a man fomewhat partiall towards the Nobility, and of great credit and Autho-See the fichie rity amongst the Parricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the liberty minds of comfrom the People. Whereupon for these considerations, they refused Martin in the end, and made mon People. two other that were Suters, Confuls. The Senate being marvelloully offended with the People, did account the shame of this refusall, rather to redound to themselves then to Marting: but Marting took it in far worse part then the Senate, and was out of all patience. For he was a man too full of passion and choler, and too much given over to self-will and opinion, as one of a high mind and great courage, that lacked the gravity and affability that is gotten with judgement of Learning and reason, which onely is to be looked for in a Governour of State and that remembred not how wilfulness is the thing of the World, which a Governour of a Common-wealth for pleasing should thun, being that which Plato called folitariness. As in the end, all men that are wilfully given to The fruits of a felt-opinion and obstinate mind, and who will never yeeld to others reason; but to their own, re- self-will and main without company, and forfaken of all men. For a man that will live in the world, must needs oblinacy, have patience, which lufty blouds make but a mock at. So Martin being a ftout man of nature, that never yeelded in any respect, as one thinking that to overcome always, and to have the upperhand in all matters, was a token of a magnanimity, and of no baseand faint courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weak and passionate part of the heart, much like the matter of an imposthume : went home to his house, full fraighted with spite and malice against the People, being accompanied with all the luftiest young Gentlemen , whose minds were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, and commonly used for to follow and honour him. But then specially they flockt about him, and kept him company to his much harm, for they did but kindle and inflame his choler more and more, being forry with him for the injury the People offered him, because he was their Captain and Leader to the Wars, that taught them all Martiall Discipline, and stirred up in them a noble emulation of honour and valiantness, and yet without envy, praising them that deserved best. In the mean season, there came great plenty of Corn to ROME, that had been bought, part in IT ALY, and part was Great flore of fent out of SICILE, as given by Gelon the Tyrant of SYRACUSA: fo that many stood in great Corn brought hope, that the dearth of Victuals being holpen, the civil differtion would also cease. The Senate to Rome. fate in Council upon it immediately, the common People stood also about the Palace where the Council was kept, gaping what refolution would fall out: perfwading themselves that the Corn they had bought should be fold good cheap, and that which was given should be divided by the poll, withnau bought intoute to tone good circle), and that we have a constitute of the Senators amongst them did so wish and out paying any penny, and the rather, because certain of the Senators amongst them did so wish and persuade the same. "But Martin standing upon his seet, did somewhat sharply take up those who ration against ration against "went about to gratifie the People therein: and called them People-pleafers, and Traytors to the the Infolency "Nobility. Moreover he faid, they nourished against themselves, the naughty seed and cockle of of the People. "infolency and fedition, which had been fowed and feattered abroad amongst the People, which they "fhould have cut off, if they had been wife, in their growth: and not (to their own destruction) "have fuffered the People, to establish a Magistrate for themselves, of so great Power and Autho-"rity, as that man had, to whom they had granted it. Who was also to be seared, because he ob-"tained what he would, and did nothing but what he lifted, neither paffed for any obedience to the " Confuls, but lived in all liberty, acknowledging no superiour to command him, faving the onely " heads and authors of their faction, whom he called his Magistrates. Therefore faid he, they that " gave counfell, and perswaded that the Corn should be given out to the common People grans, as "they used to do in the Cities of GREECE, where the People had more absolute Power, did but onely 44 nourish their disobedience, which would break out in the end, to the utter ruine and overthrow of "the whole State. For they will not think it is done in recompence of their fervice paft, fithence they "know well enough they have so oft refused to go to the Wars, when they were commanded : nei-"ther for their mutinies when they went with us, whereby they have rebelled and forfaken their "Countrey: neither for their accufations which their flatterers have preferred unto them, and they "have received, and made good against the Senate . but they will rather judge, we give and grant "them this, as abasing our felves, and standing in sear of them, and glad to flatter them every way. " By this means their disobedience will still grow worse and worse : and they will never leave to " practise new sedition and uproars. Therefore it were a great folly for us, methinks, to do it : yea, "fhall I say more? we should if we were wise, take from them their Tribuneship, which most ma-"nifeftly is the embaling of the Confulship, and the cause of the division of the City. The state "whereof as it standeth, is not now as it was wont to be, but becometh dismembred in two factions, "which maintains always civil diffention and discord between us, and will never suffer us again to "be united into one body. Martin dilating the matter with many such like reasons, won all the young men, and almost all the rich men to his opinion: insomuch as they rang it out, that he was the onely man, and alone in the City, who ftood out against the People, and never flattered them. There were onely a few old men that ipake against him, fearing lest some mischief might fall out upon it, as indeed there followed no great good afterward. For the Tribunes of the People being present at this confultation of the Senate, when they faw that the opinion of Martins was confirmed with the more voices, they left the Senate, and went down to the People, crying out for help, and that they would affemble to fave their Tribunes. Hereupon the People ran on head in tunnult Sedition at together, before whom the words that Martius spake in the Senate were openly reported : which Rome for Co-

the People fo stomacked, that even in that fury they were ready to slie upon the whole Senate. riolanus.

But the Tribunes laid all the fault and burthen wholly upon Martius, and fent their Serjeants forthwith to arreft him, prefently to appear in person before the People, to answer the words he had spontage the series of the seri with to arrest time, precently to appear in period basic and a copie, it admits the words it that the the Tri-ken in the Senate. Marrism shouly with shood these Officers that came to arrest him. Then the Tribunes in their own persons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to setch him by force, and so laid violent hands upon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering together about him, made the timular speafed. The next morning berimes, the Confuls feeing the People in an uproar, running tumuit appeared. The next morning octaines, the Comus occurs the reopic in an uprost, running to the Market-place out of all parts of the City, they were afraid left all the City would together by the ears: wherefore affembling the Senate in all hafte, they declared how it frood them upon, to appeale the fury of the People, with some gentle words, or gratefull Decrees in their favour: and moreover, like wife men they should consider, it was now no time to stand at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight for honour against the Commonalty, they being fallen to fo great an extremity, and offering fuch imminent danger. Wherefore they were to confider temperately of things, and to deliver some present and gentle pacification. The most part of the Senators that were present arthis Council, thought this opinion beft, and gave their confents unto it. Whereupon the Confuls rifing out of Council, went to fpeak unto the People as gently as they could, and they did pacifie their fury and anger, purging the Senate of all the unjust acculations laid upon them; and used great modefty in perfusading them, and also in reproving the faults they had committed. And as for the reft, that touched the fale of Corn, they promifed there should be no dishking offered them in the price. So the most part of the People being pacified, and appearing so plainly by the great silence that was among them, as yeelding to the Confuls, and liking well of their words: the Tribunes then of the People rose out of their season, and said: Forasmuch as the Senate yeelded unto reason, the People People rose out of their season, and said: Forasmuch as the Senate yeelded unto reason, the People also for their part, as became them, did likewife give place unto them: but notwithstanding, they would that Marine should come in person to answer to the articles they had devised. First, when ther he had not folicited and procured the Senate to change the prefent flate of the Common-weal, uner ne nau not concueu and produced the Senate to change the precise thate of the Commissionweat, and to take the Soveraign Authority out of the Peoples hands. Next, when he was fent for by Authority of their Officers, why he did contemptuously resist and disobey. Lastly, feeing he had driven and beaten the Ædiles into the Market-place before all the World if in doing this, he had gainft Coriolautiven and useated the reduces into the market-place before an the world; it in using this, ne had not done as much as in him lay, to raife Civil Wars, and to fet one Citizen against another. All not one force to any of the form and without the state of th not done as much as in him lay, to raise livil events, and to let one latten against angener. All this was spoken to one of these two ends, either that Marisia against his nature should be constrained to humble himself, and to abase his haughty and fierce mind: or else if he continued still in his stoutness, he should incur the Peoples displeasure and ill will so far, that he should never possibutions, he should never possible the state of the bly win them again. Which they hoped would rather fall out fo, then otherwife: as indeed they gueffed unhappily, confidering Martine nature and disposition. So Martine came and presented himself to answer their Accusations against him, and the People held their peace, and gave attentive car, to hearwhat he would fay. But where they thought to have heard very humble and lowly words come from him, he began not onely to use his wonted boldness of speaking (which of it self was very rough and unplealant, and did more aggravate his accutation, then purge his innocency) but allogave himself in his words to thunder, and look therewithall fo grimly, as though he made Coriolanus no reckoning of the matter. This firred coals among the People, who were in wonderfull fury at stoutness in it, and their hate and malice grew fo toward him, that they could hold no longer, bear, nor induce it, and their hate and malice beload. Whose not to the malice and found to the Tutture his bravery and careles boldness. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruellest and stoutest of the Tribunes, himfelf. after he had whiferered a little with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the People, Martine as condemned by the Tribunes to die. Then prefently he commanded the Ædiles to appre-Tribute, prohendhim, and carry him ftraight to the Rock Tarpeian, and to caft him headlong down the fame. require, pro- menumin, and carry min altagent to the roots and periods, and to take min managers, advert me same to lay hands upon Martin to do that they were commanded, divers of the roots of death when the Adites came to tay nanosupon Maritum to no matthey were communicate, unversional rente of death people themselves thought it too cruell and violent a deed. The Noblemen being much troubled to upon Maritar, upon Mariius fee fo much force and rigour used, began to crie aloud; Help Mariius: so those that laid hands on him being repulfed, they compafied him in round among themselves, and some of them holding up their hands to the People, belought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words nor crying out could ought prevail, the rumult and hurly burly was fo great, untill such time as the Tribunes own friends and kinfmen weighing with themselves the impossibility to convey Marism to execution, without great flaughter and murder of the Nobility: did perswade and advile not to proceed in fo violent and extraordinary a fort, as to put fuch a man to death, without lawfull process in Law, but that they should refer the sentence of the Bends. The voyce of the People. Then Sieinim bethinking himself a little, did ask the Patricians for what cause they took Martin out of the Officers hands that went to do execution? The Patricians as ked him again, why they would of themselves so cruelly and wickedly put to death, so noble and valiant a ROMAN as Martim was, and that without Law and Juffice ? Well then, faid Sichim, if that be the matter, let there be no quarrell or diffention against the People: for they do grant your demand, that his Cause should be heard according to the Law. Therefore, said he to your demand, that his caute mould be nearly according to the Law, Therefore, rath he will add of our next.

there fell out Warsagainst the ANTIATES, which gave some hope to the Nobility, that this adjournment would come to little effect, thinking that this War would hold them so long, as that the tury of the People against him would be well swaged, or unterly forgetten, by reason of the trouble of the Wars. But contrary to expectation, the peace was concluded prefently with the ANTIA-TES, and the People returned again to ROME. Then the Patricians affembled oftentimes together, to confult how they might stand to Martine, and keep the Tribunes from occasion to cause the People to mutiny again, and rife against the Nobility. And there Appin Claudin (one that was raken ever as an heavy enemy to the People) did avow and proteft, that they would utterly abase the Authority of the Senate, and destroy the Common-weal, if they would fuffer the common People to have Authority by voyces to give judgement against the Nobility. On the other fide again, the most ancient Senators, and such as were given to savour the common People, said: That when the People should see they had Authority of life and death in their hands, they would not be so cruell and fierce, but gentle and civil. More also, that it was not for contempt of Nobility or the Senate. that they fought to have the Authority of Juffice in their hands, as a preheminence and prerogative of honour: but because they feared, that themselves should be contermed and hated of the Nobility: So as they were perswaded, that so soon as they gave them Authority to judge by voices, they would leave all envy and malice to condemn any. Martin leeing the Senate in great doubt how to resolve, partly for the love and good will the Nobility did bear him, and partly for the fear they stood in of the People: asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden them with? The Tribunes answered him, that they would shew how he did aspire to be King, and would prove Coriolanus acthat all his actions tended to usurp tyrannicall power over ROME. Martine with that, rifing upon his feet, faid: That thereupon he did willingly offer himfelf to the People, to be tried upon King, that Acculation: and that if it were proved by him, he had so much as once thought of any such matter, that he would then refuse no kind of punishment they would offer him: Conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with nothing else beside, and that ye do not also abuse the Senate. They promifed they would not. Under these Conditions the Judgement was agreed upon, and the People affembled. And first of all the Tribunes would in any case (whatsoever became of it) that the People should proceed to give their voyces by Tribes, and not by hundreds : for by this meanes the multitude of the poor needy People (and all fuch rabble as had nothing to lofe , and had lefs regard of honesty before their eyes) came to be of greater force (because their voyces were numbred by the pole) then the noble honest Citizens, whose Persons and Purse did dutifully serve the Common-wealth in their Wars. And then when the Tribunes faw they could not prove he went about to make himfelf King, they began to broach afreth the former words that Martim had spoken in the Senate, in hindering the distribution of the Corn at mean price unto the common People, and perswading also to take the Office of Tribuneship from them. And for the third. they charged him anew, that he had not made the common distribution of the Spoil he had gotten in the invading the Territories of the ANTIATES : but had of his own Authority divided it among them, who were with him in that journey. But this matter was most strange of all to Marting, looking least to have been burdened with that, as with any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the fudden, and having no ready excuse to make even at that instant : he began to fall a praising of the Souldiers that had served with him in that Journey. But those that were not with him, being the greater number, cried out so loud, and made such a noise that he could not be heard. To conclude, when they came to tell the voyces of the Tribes, there were three voyces odd, which condemned him to be banished for ever. After declara- Cariolanus bation of the Sentence, the People made such joy, as they never rejoyced more for any Battell nished for ethey had won upon their Enemies, they were so brave and lively, and went home so jocondly from the Affembly, for triumph of this sentence. The Senate again in contrary manner were as fad and heavy, repenting themselves beyond measure, that they had not rather determined to have done and suffered any thing whatsoever, before the common People should so arrogantly and outragiously have abused their Authority. There needed no difference of Garments I warrant you, nor outward thews to know a Plebeian from a Patrician, for they were eafily discerned by their looks. For he that was on the Peoples side , looked chearfully on the matter: but he that was fad, and hung down his head, he was fure of the Noblemens fide. Sa- Coriolanusconving Martin alone, who neither in his countenance nor in his gate, did ever shew himself aba-adversity, shed, or once let fall his great courage: but he onely of all other Gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly shew no manner of passion, nor care at all of himself. Not that he did patiently bear and temper his evil hap, in respect of any reason he had, or by his quiet condition: but because he was so carried away with the vehemency of anger, and desire of revenge, that he had no fenfe nor feeling of the hard ftate he was in , which the common People judge not to be The force of forrow, although indeed it be the very fame. For when forrow (as you would fay) is fet on anger. fire, then it is converted into spite and malice, and driveth away for that time all faintness of heart and naturall fear. And this is the cause why the cholerick man is so altered and mad in his actions. as a man fet on fire with a burning ague : for when a mans heart is troubled within , his pulse will beat marvellous strongly. Now that Martin was even in that taking, it appeared true foon after by his doings. For when he was come home to his house again, and had taken his leave of his Mother and Wife, finding them weeping and shriking out for forrow, and had also comforted and perswaded them to be content with his chance: he went immediately to the Gate of the City, accompanied with a great number of Patricians, that brought him thither, from whence he went accompanies with a great number of a strends onely, taking nothing withhim, nor requesting any on his way with three or four of his friends onely, taking nothing withhim, on us way with time of roll of the country at his houses, turmoyled with fundry thing of any man. So he remained a few days in the Country at his houses, turmoyled with fundry forts and kinds of thoughts, fuch as the fire of his choler did ftir up. In the end feeing he could refolve no way, to take a profitable or honourable course, but onely was pricked forward still to be revenged of the ROMANS: he thought to raife up fome great Wars against them, by their necrest venged of the ROMANS: he discussed the police great versal against them, oy mer necret neighbours. Whereupon he thought it his best way, first to stir up the VOLSCES against them, neighbours have been only in strength and siches to encounter them, notwithstanding their knowing they were yet able enough in strength and siches to encounter them, notwithstanding their former loffes they had received not long before, and that their power was not fo much impaired, as their malice and defire was increased to be revenged of the ROMANS. Now in the City of An-Tallar Aufalus and the was one called Tulim Aufalim, who for his riches, as also for his nobility and valiagren person Tium, there was one called Tulim Aufalim, who for his riches, as also for his nobility and valiagren person antiels was honoured among the VOISCES as a King. Martin knew very well that Tullu did more malice and envy him then he did all the ROMANS besides: because that many times in Battels where they met, they were ever at the encounter one against another, like lufty couragious youths, triving in all emulation of Honour, and had encountred many times together. Infomuch as befides the common quarrell between them, there was bred a marvellous private hate one against notes the common quarren between them; there was been a marvenous private nate one against another. Yet notwithstanding; considering that Tullus Assidius was a man of a great mind, and that he above all other of the VOLSCES most desired revenge of the ROMANS, for the injuries they had done unto them: he did an act that confirmed the words of an ancient Poet to be true,

It is a thing full hard, mans anger to withfland If it be fliffly bent to take an enterprise in hand, For then moft men will have the thing that they defire,

Although it soft their lives therefore, such force hath wicked ire. And so did he. For he disguised himself in such array and attire, as he thought no man could ever have known him for the perion he was, feeing him in that apparell he had upon his back : and as Homer faid of Uly fes:

who faid :

Goriolanus dif- It was even twi-light when he entred the City of ANTIUM, and many Peoplemet him in the streets, but no man knew him. So he went directly to Tulius Aufidius house, and when he came thither, he our no man knew min. So he went unertry to 1 min 2 min mone, and pake not a word to any man, his got him up ftraight to the chimney hearth, and fate him down, and fpake not a word to any man, his face all muffled over. They of the house fpying him, wondred what he should be, and yet they durft nate an infinite over. They of the house 193mg min, womand what he infom be, and yet they durit not bid him rife. For illiavouredly muffled and diffguiled as he was, yet there appeared a certain Manager than the control of the cont jefty in his countenance, and in his filence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at supper, to tell him of the frange difguifing of this man. Talliu role prefently from the board, and coming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martins unmuffled himself, and after he had pawfed a while, making no answer, he faid unto himself, If thou knowest me not yet, Tullus, and feeing me, does not perhaps believe me to be the man I am indeed, I must of necessity bewray my felito be that I am. "I am Cains Marsins, who hath done to thy felf particularly, and to all the Corbolanus O- W VOLSCES generally, great hurt and milchief, which I cannot deny for my furname of Corbolanus

Tain to Tal. " that I bear. For I never had other benefit nor recompence of the true and painfull fervice I have "done, and the extream dangers 1 have been in, but this onely furname: a good memory and wit-"nels of the malice and diffleafure thou flouldest bear me. Indeed the name onely remaineth with "me: for the reft, the envy and cruelty of the People of ROME have taken from me, by the fuf-"ferance of the daftardly Nobility and Magistrates, who have for faken me, and let me be banished "by the People. This extremity hath now driven me to come as a poor futer, to take thy chimney "hearth, not of any hope I have to fave my life thereby. For if I had feared death, I would not "have come hither to have put my self in hazard: but prickt forward with defire to be revenged of "them that thus have banished me, which now I do begin, in putting my person into the hands of "their Enemies. Wherefore if thou haft any heart to be wrecked of the injuries thy Enemies have "done thee, speed thee now, and let my misery serve thy turn, and so use it, as my service may be "a benefit to the VOLSCES: promifing thee, that I will fight with better good will for all you, "then I did when I was against you, knowing that they fight more valiantly, who know the force "of the Enemy, then fuch as have never proved it. And if it be so that thou dare not, and that thou "art weary to prove fortune any more, then am I also weary to live any longer. And it were no "wildom in thee, to fave the life of him, who hath been heretofore thy mortall Enemy, and whole "fervice now can nothing help nor pleasure thee. Tullus hearing what he said, was a marvellous glad man, and taking him by the hand, he faid unto him: Stand up, O Martin, and be of good chear, for in proffering thy felf unto us, thou doeft us great honour: and by this means thou maift hope also of greater things at all the VOLSCES hands. So he feafted him for that time, and entertained him in the honourablest manner he could, talking with him of no other matter at that present but within few days after, they fell to confultation together in what fort they should begin their Wars. Now on the other fide, the City of ROME was in marvellous uproar and difcord, the Nobility against the Commonalty, and chiefly for Martin condemnation and banishment. Moreover the Priefts, the Soothfayers, and private men also, came and declared to the Senate certain about Natitus fights and wonders in the air, which they had feen, and were to be confidered of: amongst the which such a Visson happened: There was a Citizen of Rome called Titus Latinus, a man of

CORIOLANUS. mean quality and condition, but otherwise an honest sober man, given to a quiet life, without superthinn, and much less to vanity or lying. This man had a vition in his dream, in the which he thought that Jupiter appeared unto him, and commanded him to fignifie to the Senate, that they had caused a very vile lewd dancer to go before the Procession : and faid, the first time this Vision had appeared unto him, he made no reckoning of it: and coming again another time in his mind. he made not much more account of the matter then before. In the end, he faw one of his Sons die, who had the best nature and condition of all his brethren : and suddenly he himself was so taken in all his limbs, that he became lame and impotent. Hereupon he told the whole circumstance of this Vision before the Senate, fitting upon his little Couch or bed, whereon he was carried on mens arms: and he had no sooner reported this Vision to the Senate, but he presently felt his body and limbs restored again to their tormer strength and use. So raising up himself upon his Couch, he got upon his feet at that inftant, and walked home to hishoufe, without help of any man. The Senate being amazed at this matter, made diligent enquiry to understand the truth; and in the end they found there was such a thing: There was one that had delivered a Bondman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other Slaves and Bondmen, and had commanded thent to whip him up and downthe Market-place, and afterwards to kill him: and as they had him in execution, whipping him cruelly, they did so martyr the poor wretch, that for the cruell smart and pain he felt, he turned and writhed his body in strange and pitifull fort. The Procession by chance came by even at the same time, and many that followed it, were heartily moved and offended with the fight, saying: that it was no good fight to behold, nor meet to be met in Procession time. But for all this. there was nothing done: faving they blamed and rebuked him that punished his Slave so cruelly. For the ROMANS at that time, did use their Bondmen very gently, because they themselves did labour with their own hands, and lived with them and among them; and therefore they did use them the more gently and familiarly. For the greatest punishment they gave a slave that had offended, was this. They made him carry a limmer on his shoulders that is fastened to the Axeltree of a Coach, The Romans this. They made mind early a mind on that fort amongst all their Neighbours. He that had once manner of p and compelled him to go up and down in that fort amongst all their Neighbours. He that had once mishing their abidden this punishment, and was seen in that manner, was proclaimed and cried in every Market, slaves Town: fo that no man would ever trust him after, and they called him Furcifer, because the LA- Whereof Fur-TINES call the Wood that runneth into the Axeltree of the Coach', Farca, as much to fay, as a cifer came. Fork. Now when Latinus had made report to the Senate of the Vision that had happened to him, they were deviling whom this unpleasant dancer should be, that went before the Procession. Thereupon certain that stood by, remembred the poor Slave that was fo cruelly whipped through the Market-place, whom they afterwards put to death: and the thing that made him remember it, was the strange and rare manner of his punishment. The Priests hereupon were repaired unto for their advice: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the Slave. So they caused the Slaves Master to be punished, and began again a new Procession, and all other Shews and Sights in honour of Jupiter. But hereby appeareth plainly, how King Nume did wifely ordain all other Ceremonies concerning devotion to the gods, and specially his custom which he established, to bring the People to Religion. For when the Magistrates, Bishops, Priests, or other religious A Ceremony Ministers go about any Divine Service, or matter of Religion, an Herauld ever goeth before them, instituted by crying out aloud, Hoc age: as to fay, do this, or mind this. But the ROMANS did ever use to begin again their Sacrifices, Processions, Playes, and such like Shews, done in honour of the gods, not onely upon such an occasion, but upon lighter causes then that. As when they went on Procession through the City, and did carry the Images of their gods, and fuch other like holy Reliques upon open hollowed Couches or Chariors, called in Latine Then The fuperflitise: one of the Coach-horses that drew them stood still, and would draw no more: and because also on of the Rothe Coach-man took the rains of the bridle with the left hand, they ordained that the Proces man: Then[a. fion should be begun again anew. Of late time also, they did renew and begin a Sacrifice thirty times one after another, because they thought still there fell out one fault or other in the same : so holy and devout were they to the gods. Now Tullus and Martins had secret conference with the greatest personages of the City of Antium, declaring unto them that now they had good time offered them to make War with the ROMANS, while they were in diffention one with another. They answered them, they were ashamed to break the League, considering The Remains that they were sworn to keep peace for two years. Howbeit , shortly after , the ROMANS gavethe feller gave them great occasion to make War with them. For on a holy day common Playes being occasion of gave them great octation to make vota what them. And the Proclamation by found of Trumper, Wars. that all the VOLSCES should avoid out of ROME before Sun set. Some think this was a crait Martine Gorio-that all the VOLSCES should avoid out of ROME before Sun set. Some think this was a crait Martine Gorio-that all the VOLSCES should avoid out of ROME before Sun set. Some think this was a crait for the control of the control and deceit of Martins, who fent one to Rome to the Confuls, to accuse the Volsces fallely, custain of the advertifing them how they had made a conspiracy to set upon them while they were busy in seeing Volses. their Games, and also to fet their City on fire. This open Proclamation made all the VOLSCES more offended with the ROMANS, then ever they were before: and Tullus aggravating the matter, did so inflame the Volsces against them, that in the end they sent their Ambassadors to ROME, to summon them to deliver their Lands and Towns again, which they had taken from them in times past, or to look for present Wars. The ROMANS hearing this, were marvellously nettled; and made no other answer but thus: If the VOISCES be the first that begin War, the Romans.

A fine device to make the Commonalty fuspect the Nobility. Great heartburning bebility and the People.

the ROMANS will be the last that will end it. Incontinently upon the return of the VOISCES Ambassadours, and delivery of the ROMANS answer, Tullus caused an Affembly generall to be made of the VOISCES, and concluded to make War upon the ROMANS. This done, Tullus did counfell them to take Martine into their service, and not to mistrust him for the remembrance of any thing paft, but boldly to truft him in any matter to come : for he would do them more fervice in any thing part, but bottly to true that man many matter to tonic that move the model of them. So Martius was calfighting for them, then ever he did them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no less eloquent in tongue, then warlike in shew: and declared himself both expert in Wars, and wife with valigainst the Ro- annels. Thus he was joyned in Commission with Tullus as Generall of the VOLSCES; having abfolute Authority between them to follow and purfue the Wars. But Martin fearing left tract of time to bring this Army together with all the Munition and Furniture of the VOLSCES, would rob him of the mean he had to execute his purpose and intent, lest order with the Rulers and chief of the City, to affemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessary provision for the Camp. Then he with the lighteft Souldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, ftole away upon the fudden , and marched with all speed , and entred the Territories of Rome, before the Ro-MANS heard any news of his coming. Informuch as the Volsces found fuch spoil in the fields, as they had more then they could fpend in their Camp, and were weary to drive and carry away that Territories of they had. Howbeit the gain of the spoil, and the hurr they did to the ROMANS in this invasion, was the least part of his intent: for his chiefest purpose was, to increase still the malice and diffention between the Nobility and the Commonalty: and to draw that on , he was very careful to keep the Noblemens Lands and Goods fafe from harm and burning, but spoiled all the whole Countrey besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurt any thing of the Noblemens. This Countrey bettees, and would unter no man to take or that any thing of the exponents. This made greater fit and broyl between the Nobility and the People, then was before. For any Noblemen fellour with the People, because they had so unjustly banished a man of so great valour Noblemen fellour with the People, because they had so unjustly banished a man of so great valour and power. The People on the other fide, accused the Nobility, how they had procured Marine to make these Wars to be revenged of them: because it pleased them to see their Goods burnt and fpoiled before their eyes, whilft themselves were well at case, and did behold the Peoples losses and misfortunes, knowing their own Goods fare and out of danger: and how the War was not made against the Noblemen, that had the Enemy abroad, to keep that they had in fafety. Now Martiso having done his first exploit, (which made the Volsces bolder, and lefs fearfull of the Ro-MANS) brought home all the Army again, without lofs of any man. After their whole Army (which was marvellous great, and very forward to fervice) was affembled in one Camp, they agreed to leave part of it for Garifon in the Countrey about, and the other part should go on, and make the War upon the Romans. So Martins bad Tullus choose, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him answer, he knew by experience that Martins was no less valiant then himfelf, and how heever had better fortune and good hap in all Battels, then himfelf had Therefore he thought it best for him to have the leading of those that would make the Wars abroad, and himfelf would keep home, to provide for the fafety of the Cities of his Countrey, and to furnish the Camp also of all necessary provision abroad. So Marism being stronger then before, went first of all unto the City of Cercees, inhabited by the Romans, who willingly yeelded themfelves, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entred the Countrey of the LATINS, imagining the ROMANS would fight with him there to defend the LATINS, who were their confe gaming the ROMANS for their aid. But on the one fide, the derates, and had many times fent unto the ROMANS for their aid. But on the one fide, the People of ROME were very ill willing to go: and on the other fide, the Confuls being upon going out of their Office, would not hazard themselves for fo fmall a time: fo that the Ambassadors of the LATINS returned home again, and did no good. Then Martine did befiege their Cities, and liaving taken by force the Town of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PEDANIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made refiftance, he facked all their Goods, and took them prisoners. Such as did yeeld themselves willingly unto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurt: and because they should receive no damage by his will, he removed his Camp as far from their Confines as he could. Afterwards, he rook the City of Boles by affault, being about an hundred furlong from ROME, where he had a marvellous great spoil, and put every man to the fword that was able to carry Weapon. The other Volsces that were appointed to remain in Garilon for defence of their Countrey, hearing this good news, would tarry no longer at home, but armed themselves, and ran to Martin Camp, saying they did acknowledge no other Cap tain but him. Hereupon his fame ran through all ITALY, and every one praifed him for a him Capitain, for that by change of one man for another, such and so strange evens fell out in the State. In this while, all went still to wrack at ROME. For to come into the field to fight with the Enemy, they could not abide to hear of it, they were one fo much against another, and full of se ditious words, the Nobility against the People, and the People against the Nobility. Until they had intelligence at the length, that the Enemies had laid fiege to the City of Lavinium, in the which were all the Temples and Images of their gods their Protectors, and from whence came first Levinium bulk their ancient Originall, for that Leva at his first arrival into ITALY did build that City. The fell there out a marvellous fudden change of mind among the People, and far more strange and contrary in the Nobility. For the People thought it good to repeal the condemnation and esile of Martine. The Senate affembled upon it, would in no case yeeld to that: who either the it of a felf-will to be contrary to the Peoples desire : or because Martin should not reum through the grace and favour of the People. Or elfe, because they were throughly angry and offerided with him, that he would fet upon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doings would shew himself an open Enemy besides unto his Countrey : notwithstanding the most part of them took the wrong they had done him, in marvellous ill part, and as if the injury had been done unto themselves. Report being made of the Senates resolution, the People found themselves in a straight : for they could authorize and confirm nothing by their voices, unless it had been first propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martim hearing this stir about him, was in a greater rage with them than before : infomuch as he raifed his Siege incontinently before the City of LAVINIUM. and going towards Rome, lodged his Camp within forty Furlongs of the City, at the Ditches called Cluilia. His incamping to near ROME; did put all the whole City in a wonderfull fear : howbeit for the present time it appealed the sedition and diffention betwixt the Nobility and the People. For there was no Conful, Senator, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrary the opinion of the People, for the calling home again of Martins. When they faw the Women in a marvellous fear. running up and down the City: the Temples of the gods full of old People, weeping bitterly in their Prayers to the gods: and finally, not a man either wife or hardy to provide for their fafety; then they were all of opinion, that the People had reason to call home Martins again, to reconcile themselves to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in marvellous great fault, to be angry and in choler with him, when it frood them upon, rather to have gone out and intreated him, So they all agreed together to fend Ambaffadors unto him, to let him understand how his Countreymen did call him home again, and reftored him to all his Goods, and befought him to deliver them fend ambatiafrom this War. The Ambassadors that were sent, were Martin familiar friends and acquain-dors to Goriotance, who looked at the least for a courteons welcome of him, as of their familiar Friend and Kins- lanus to treat man. Howbeit they found nothing less: for at their coming they were brought through the Camp, of Peace. to the place where he was fet in his Chair of State, with a marvellous and unipeakable Maiefty, having the chiefest men of the VOLSCES about him: so he commanded them to declare openly the cause of their coming. Which they delivered in the most humble and lowly words they possibly could devife, and with all modest countenance and behaviour agreeable to the same. When they had done their Message: for the injury they had done him, he answered them very hotly, and in great choler: but as General of the Volsces, he willed them to reftore unto the Volsces, all their Lands and Cities they had taken from them in former Wars: and moreover, that they should give them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before given to the LA-TINS. For otherwise they had no other means to end this War, if they did not grant these honest and just Conditions of Peace. Thereupon he gave them thirty days respite to make him anfwer. So the Ambassadors returned straight to Rome, and Martine forthwith departed with his Army out of the Territories of the ROMANS. This was the first matter wherewith the Vols- The first occa-CES (that most envyed Martin Glory and Authority) did charge Martins with. Among those, sion of the Tullus was chief: who though he had received no private injury or displeasure of Martin, yet Volsces envy to the common fault and imperfection of mans Nature wrought in him, and it grieved him to fee his Coriolanus. own Reputation blemished through Martius great Fame and Honour, and so himself to be less esteemed of the Volsces than he was before. This fell out the more, because every man honoured Martins, and thought he onely could do all, and that all other Governours and Captains must be content with such Credit and Authority as he would please to countenance them with, From hence they derived all their first Accusations and secret murmurings against Martius. For private Captains conspiring against him, were very angry with him: and gave it out, that the removing of the Camp was a manifest Treason, not of the Towns, nor Forts, nor of Arms, but of Time and Occasion, which was a loss of great importance, because it was that which in reason might both loofe and bind all; and preferve the whole. Now Martius having given the Ro-MANS thirty days respite for their Answer, and specially because the Wars have not accustomed to make any great changes in less space of time then that, he thought it good yet, not to lie asleep and idle all the while, but went and destroyed the Lands of the Enemies Allies, and took seven great Cities of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMANS durft not once put themselves into the Field, to come to their aid and help, they were so faint-hearted, so mistrustfull, and loth besides to make Wars. Insomuch as they properly resembled the bodies paralytick and loosed of their limbs and members, as those which through the Palsey have lost all their sense and feeling. Wherefore, the time of Peace expired, Martins being returned into the Dominions of the Ro-MANS again with all his Army, they fent another Ambassade unto him, to pray Peace, and Another Amthe remove of the Volsces out of their Countrey : that afterwards they might with better buffade fent to leifure fall to fuch Agreements together, as should be thought most meet and necessary. For Coriolanus, the ROMANS were no men that would ever yield for fear. But if he thought the Vols-CES had any ground to demand reasonable Articles and Conditions, all that they would reasonably ask should be granted unto by the ROMANS, who of themselves would willingly yield to reason, conditionally, that they did lay down Arms. Martius to that answered: that as General of the Volsces he would reply nothing unto it : but yet as a ROMAN Citizen, he would counsell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should return again within three days, delivering up the Articles agreed upon, which he had first delivered them. Otherwise, that he would no more give them affurance or fafe conduct to return again into his Camp; with fuch vain and frivolous Meffages.

When the Ambassadors were returned to ROME, and had reported Martius Answer to the Senate: their City being in extream danger, and as it were in a terrible from or tempest, they threw out (as the common Proverb faith) their holy Anchor. For then they appointed all the Bishops, Priests, Mithe common Provero faint), their many Annual. For their appointed an the Daniops, Prients, Ministers of the gods, and keepers of holy things, and all the Augures or Sooth-Layers, which foreshew things to come by observation of the flying of Birds (which is an old ancient kind of prophecying and things to come by observation of the flying of Birds (which is an old ancient kind of prophecying and tungs to come by ourcevation of the sign of the Martins, apparelled as when they do their Sacrifices; and divination amongst the ROMANS) to go to Martins, apparelled as when they do their Sacrifices; and first to entreat him to leave off War, and then that he would speak to his Countrey-men, and conclude Peace with the VOLSCES. Martius suffered them to come into his Camp, but yet he granted them nothing the more, neither did he entertain them or speak more courteoully to them, than he did the first time that they came unto him, saving onely that he willed them to take the one of the two: either nne une use the first Conditions offered, or else to receive war. When all this goodly rabble of to accept Peaceunder the first Conditions offered, or else to receive war. sure reactions of the Gates fuperfittious Priests were returned, it was determined in Council, that none should go out of the Gates superfictions rate to water the state of the City, and that they should watch and ward upon the Walls to repulse their Enemies if they came to affault them: referring themselves and all their hope, to time and Fortunes uncertain favour, not knowing otherwise how to remedy the danger. Now all the City was full of tumult, fear, and marvellous doubt, what would happen, until at the length there fell out fuch a like matter, as Homer oft times faid they would leaft have thought of. For in great matters, that happen feldom, Homer faith, and crieth out in this fort :

The goddes Pallas she, with her fair glistering eyes, Did put into his mind such thoughts, and made him so devise.

But sure some god hash sane out of the Peoples mind, And in another place:

Both wit and under standing eke, and have therewith asign'd. Some other simple shirit, instead thereof to bide, That so they might their doings all, for lack of wit misguide.

And in another place:

The People of themselves did either it consider, Or elfe some god instructed them, and so they joyn'd together.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters unpoffible, and fables of no likelihood or truth, unto many reckon not of 120mer, as keretening manters unportate, and taken and inclinious of trust, and mans Reason, Free-will, or Judgement, which indeed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of our own Free-will and Reason. For he oft speaketh these words: I have thought it in my noble heart.

And in another place:

Achilles angry was, and forry for to hear Him so to say, his heavy breast was fraught with pensive fear.

Bellerophon (she) could not move with her fair tongue, And in another place: So honest and fo vertuous, he was the rest among.

But in wondrous and extraordinary things, which are done by fecret informations and motions, he doth not fay that God taketh away from man his choice and freedome of will, but that he doth more it: neither that he doth work delire in us, but objecteth to our minds certain imaginations whereby we are led to defire, and thereby doth not make this our action forced, but openeth the way to our Will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of fuccels. For either we must say, that the gods meddle not with the Caufes and beginnings of our actions : or else what other means have they to help and further men? It is apparent that they handle not our bodies, nor move not our feet and hands, when there is occasion to use them: but that part of our mind from which these motions proceed, is induced thereto, or carried away by such Objects and Reasons, as God offereth unto it. Now the ROMAN Ladies and Gentlewomen did wifit all the Temples and gods of the same, to make their Prayers unto them: but the greatest Ladies (and more part of them) were continually about the Allar of Jupiter Capitolin, among which Troop by name, was Valeria, Publicola's own Sifter. The felf-fame Publicola, who did fuch notable service to the ROMANS, both in Peace and Wars, Valeria, Publi- and was dead also certain years before, as we have declared in his Life. His Sifter Valeria was greatly honoured and reverenced among all the ROMANS: and did fo modeftly and wifely behave her felf, that the did not shame nor dishonour the House she came of. So she suddenly fell into sud a fancy, as we have rehearfed before, and had (by fome god as I think) taken hold of a noble device. Whereupon she rose, and the other Ladies with her, and they all together went straight to the House of Volumnia, Martius Mother: and coming in to her, found her, and Martius Wife her Daugher in Law, set together, and having her Husband Martius young Children in her lap. Now all the Train of these Ladies, sitting in a ring round about her, Valeria first began to speak in this sor unto her: "We Ladies, are come to visit you Ladies (my Lady Volumnia and Virgilia) by no dire "Ation from the Senate, nor commandment of other Magistrate, but through the inspiration (as] "take it) of forne god above: who having taken compassion and pity of our Prayers, hath more "us to come unto you, to intreat you in a matter, as well beneficiall for us, as also for the whole Cities "zens in general, but to your felves in speciall (if it please you to credit me) and shall redound to "your more fame and glory, than the Daughters of the SABYNS obtained in former age, when they "procured loving Peace, instead of hatefull War, between their Fathers and their Husbands Volumnia, Martius Mother. The words of Valeria unto Volumnia and Virgilia.

"Come on good Ladies, and let us go all rogether unto Martin, to intreat him to take pity upon "us, and alio to report the truth unto him, how much you are bound unto the Citizens : who not-"withfranding they have fustained great hurr and losses by him, yet they have not hitherto fought re-"venge upon your persons by any discourteous usage, neither ever conceived any such thought or in-" tent against you, but to deliver you fafe into his hands, though thereby they look for no better grace "or clemency from him. When Valeria had spoken this unto them, all the other Ladies, together with one voice confirmed that the had faid. Then Volumnia in this fort did answer her: " My good with one voice confirmed that the natural and recommon milery and calamity of our Country, and yet The answer of Ladies, we are partakers with you of the common milery and calamity of our Country, and yet Followski to "our grief exceedeth yours the more, by reason of our particular missortune, to feel the loss of the Roman "my Son Martine former valiancy and glory, and to fee his person environed now with our Ene- Ladies. Notwithstanding, if ye think " we can do good, we will willingly do what you will have us; bring us to him we pray you. For "if we cannot prevail, we may yet die at his feet, as humble Suiters for the fafety of our Countrey. Her Answer ended, she took her Daughter in Law, and Martin: Children with her, and being accompanied with all the other ROMAN Ladies, they went in troop together unto the VOLSCES Camp: whom when they faw, they of themselves did both pity and reverence her, and there was not a man among them that once durft fay a word unto her. Now was Martim fet then in his Chair of State, with all the Honours of a General, and when he had spied the Women coming afar off, he marvelled what the matter meant : but afterwards knowing his Wife which came foremost, he determined at the first to perfist in his obstinate and inflexible rankor. But overcome in the end with natural affection, and being altogether altered to fee them, his heart would not ferve him to tarry their coming to his Chair, but coming down in hafte, hewent to meet them, and first he kissed his Mother, and imbraced her a pretty while, then his Wife and little Children. And Nature fo wrought with him, that the tears fell from his eyes, and he could not keep himfelf from making much of them, but yielded to the affection of his blood, as if he had been violently carried with the fury of a most fwift running stream. After he had thus lovingly received them, and perceiving that his Mother Vo-lumnia would begin to speak to him, he called the chiefest of the Council of the Volsces to hear what she would say. Then she spake in this fort: "If we held our peace (my Son) and determined The Oration "not to speak, the state our poor Bodies, and present sight of our Rayment, would easily bewray of Volumnia "to thee what life we have led at home, fince thy exile and abode abroad, but think now with thy unto her for "felf, how much more unfortunate than all the Women living, we are come hither, confidering that Coriolanus. For we cannot (alas) together pray, both for victory to our Coun-"trey, and for fafety of thy life also: but a world of grievous curses, yea more than any mortall "Enemy can heap upon us, are forcibly wrapt up in our Prayers. For the bitter fop of most hard "choice is offered thy Wife and Children, to forgo one of the two : either to lafe the Person of thy "felf, or the Nurse of their native Countrey. For my felf (my Son) I am determined not to tarry "till Fortune in my life time do make an end of this.War. For if I cannot perswade thee, rather to "do good unto both Parties, than to overthrow and destroy the one, preferring Love and Nature be-"fore the Malice and Calamity of the Wars, thou shalt see, my Son, and trust unto it, thou shalt no " fooner march forward to affault thy Countrey, but thy foot shall tread upon thy Mothers Womb, "that brought thee first into this World. And I may not defer to see the law either that my Son "be led Priloner in triumph by his natural Countrey-men, or that he himfelf do triumph of them, "and of his natural Countrey. For if it were fo, that my request tended to fare thy Countrey, in de-"ftroying the VOLSCES, I must confess, thou wouldst hardly and doubtfully resolve on that. For "as to destroy thy natural Countrey, it is altogether unmeet and unlawfull, so were it not just, and "less honourable, to betray those that put their trust in thee. But my onely demand consisteth, to "make a Goal-delivery of all evils, which delivereth equal benefit and fatety, both to the one and "the other, but most honourable for the VOISCES. For it shall appear, that having victory in "their hands, they have of special favour granted us singular graces, Peace and Amity, albeit them-"felves have no less part of both than we. Of which good, if so it came to pass, thy self is the "onely Author, and so hast thou the onely honour. But if it fail, and fall out contrary, thy self "alone deservedly shalt carry the shamefull reproach and burthen of either party. So, though the end " of War be uncertain, yet this notwithstanding is most certain, that if it be thy chance to conquer, "this benefit shalt thou reap of thy goodly Conquest, to be chronicled the plague and destroyer of "thy Countrey. And if Fortune overthrow thee, then the World will fay, that through defire to " revenge thy private injuries, thou hast for ever undone thy good friends, who did most lovingly and " courteoully receive thee. knees before him : Martius feeing that, could refrain no longer, but went ftraight and lift her up, crying out, On Mother, what have you done to her Aha holding her hat a by the right hand, Of Mother, faid he, you have won a happy Victory for your Countrey, but mortal and huppe for your Son: for I fee my felf vanquifhed by you alone. These words being spoken openly, he spake a little apart with his Mother and Wise, and then let them return again to Rome, for so they did rea new apart with the required and varies, and use the them required them; and to remaining in Camp that night, the next morning he diffloged, and marched homeward into the VOLSCES Countrey again, who were not all of one mind, nor all alike comented.

For fome midliked him and that he had done: other being well pleased that Peace should be made, faid:

was done, did not think him an ill man for that he did, but faid, he was not to be blamed, though he yielded to such a forcible extremity. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but all obeyed his commandment, more for respect of his worthiness and valiancy than for fear of his Authority. Now the Citizens of Rome plainly shewed, in what fear and danger their City stood of this War, when they were delivered. For so soon as the Watch upon the Walls of the City perceived the VOLSCES

Camp to remove, there was not a Temple in the City but was prefently fet open, and full of men wearing Garlands of Flowers upon their heads, facrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do upon the news of some great obtained Victory. And this common joy was yet more manifestly shewed, by the honourable courtefies the whole Senate and People did befrow on their Ladies. For they were all throughly perfuaded, and did certainly believe, that the Ladies onely were cause of the faving of their good will and forwardness, ordained that the Temple and Image should be made at the common charge of the City. Notwithstanding that, the Ladies gathered Money among them, and made with the fame a fecond Image of Fortune, which the ROMANS fay did speak as they offered her from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the fear he had of his Authority, fought divers means to make him away; thinking if he let flip that prefent time, he should never recover the like and fit occasion again. Wherefore Tullus having procured many other of his confederacy, Goriolanas, required Martin might be deposed from his Estate, to render up account to the Volsces of his Charge and Government. Martine fearing to become a private man again under Tulling being Genciral (whose Authority was greater otherwise, than any other among all the Volsces) answered: He was willing to give up his charge, and would refign it into the hands of the Lords of the VOLS-CES, if they did all command him, as by all their commandment he received it. And moreover that he would not refule even at that prefent to give up an account unto the People, if they would tarry the hearing of it. The People hereupon called a Common Council, in which affembly there were certain Orators appointed, that stirred up the Common People against him: and when they had told their tales, Martin role up to make them answer. Now, notwithstanding the mutinous People made a marvellous great noise, yet when they saw him, for the reverence they bare unto his valiantness, they quieted themselves, and gave him audience to alledge with leisure what he could for his purgation. Moreover, the honestest men of the ANTIATES, and who most rejoiced in Peace, shewed by their countenance that they would hear him willingly, and judge also according to their conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him speak, he would prove his innocency to the People, because amongst other things he had an eloquent tongue; besides that the first good service he had done to the People of the VOLSCES, did win him more favour, then these last Accusations could purchase him displeasure; and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a testimony of the good will they ought him; for they would never have thought he had done them wrong for that they took not the City of ROME, if they had not been very near taking of it, by means of his approach and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterprize, neither to tarry for the mutining and rifing of the Common People against him : wherefore, those that were of the conspiracy, began to cry out that he was not to be heard, and that they would not suffer a Traitor to usurp tyrannical power over the Tribe of the Volsces, who would not yield up his State and Authority. And in faying these words, they all fell upon him, and killed him in the Market place, Coriolanus none of the people once offering to rescue him. Howbeit it is a clear case, that this murder was not murdered in generally confented unto, of the most part of the Volsces : for men came out of all parts to honour the City of his body, and did honourably bury him, setting up his Tomb with great store of Armour and spoils, as Antinum. the Tomb of a worthy person and great Captain. The Roman's understanding of his death, shewed needs, the total state of the Roman's understanding of his death, shewed needs, no other honour or malice, faving that they granted the Ladies their request they made : that they might mourn ten Moneths for him, and that was the full time they used to wear blacks for the death of The time of their Fathers, Brethren, or Husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who established the mourtaing ap-fame, as we have enlarged more amply in the description of his Life. Now Marsius being dead, the pointed by whole state of the Volsces heartily wished him alive again. For, first of all they fell out with the ÆQUES (who were their Friends and Confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrel grew on fo far between them, that frays and murders fell out upon it one with another. After that the ROMANS overcame them in Battle, in which Tullus was flain in the Field, and the flower of all Tullus Aufidius their force was put to the Sword: fo that they were compelled to accept most shamefull Conditions of stain in Battle. Peace, in yielding themselves subject unto the Conquerors, and promising to be obedient at their commandment.

weep, or to put forth any humour red or bloody, it is not a thing unpossible. For Wood and Of the fweating and voices themselves, or do take of the air, many forts and kinds of spots and colours: by which figns and tokens it is not amifs, methinks, that the gods fometimes do warn men of things to come. And it is possible also, that these Images and Statues do sometimes put forth sounds like unto sighs or mourning, when in the midft or bottom of the fame, there is made some violent separation, or breaking afunder of things, blown or devised therein; but that a body which hath neither life nor soul, should have any direct - exquisite words formed in it by express voice, that is altogether unpolfible: For the foul, not God himfelf can diftinctly speak without a body, having necessary Organs and inflruments meet for the parts of the fame, to form and utter diffinct words. But where Stories many times do force us to believe a thing reported to be true, by many grave testimonies: therewe must say, that it is some passion contrary to our five natural senses, which being begotten in the imaginative part or understanding, draweth an opinion unto it self, even as we do in our sleeping. For many times we think we hear that we do not hear, and we imagine we see that we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, and zealously given to think on heavenly things, fo as they can no way be drawn from believing of that which is spoken of them, they have this reason to ground the foundation of their belief upon; that is, the Omnipotency of God, which is wonderfull, and hath no manner of refemblance or likenels of proportion unto ours, but is altogether contrary, as touching our nature, our moving, our art, and our force : and therefore if he do any thing unpossible to us, or do bring forth and devile things above mans common reach and understanding, we must not therefore think it unpossible at all. For if in other things he is ar contrary to us, much more in his Works and secret Operations, he far paffeth all the reft : but the most part of Gods doings, as Heraclisms faith, for lack of faith, are hidden and unknown unto us. Now when Martius was returned again into the City of ANT IUM fuffer the Captains of the ATHENIANS to run into great errours, neither would be fee them caft away, by following ill counfell which they took, neither would he forfake them in any danger they put themselves into. But he did the very same that Aristides had done in old time unto Themsstoeles, for which he was then, and is yet fo greatly praifed. For he went unto the Captains that had charge then of the Army of the ATHENIANS, although they were not his friends, and told them wherein they did amis, and what they had further to do. Where Martins to the contrary, did first great hurt unto the whole City of Rome, though all in Rome had not generally offended him : yea, and when the best and chiefest part of the City were grieved for his sake, and were very forry and angry for the injury done him. Furthermore, the ROMANS fought to appeale one onely displeasure and despight they had done him, by many Ambassadors, Petitions and requests they made; whereunto he never yielded, untill his Mother, Wife, and Children came, his heart was so hardened. And bereby it appeared he was entred into this cruel War (when he would hearken to no peace) of an intent utterly to destroy and spoil his countrey, and not as though he meant to recover it, or to return thither again. Here was indeed the difference between them: that Ipials being laid by the LACED & MONIANS to kill Alcibiades. for the malice they did bear him, as also for that they were afraid of him, he was compelled to return home again to ATHENS. Where Martins contrariwise, having been so honourably received and entertained by the VOLSCES, he could not with honefty for fake them, confidering that they had done him that honour, as to choose him their General, and trusted him so far, as they put all their whole Army and Power into his hands ; and not as the other, whom the LACEDAMONIANS rather abused than used him, suffering him to go up and down their City (and afterwards in the midst of their Camp) without honour or place at all. So that in the end Alcibiades was compelled to put himself into the hands of Tilaphernes: unless that they will say that he went thinher of purpose to him. with intent to fave the City of ATHENS from utter destruction, for the defire he had to return home again. Moreover, we read of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with Alcibiades and Money: and when he had it, he would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Martins Coriolans in contrary manner would not fo much as accept gifts lawfully offered him by his Captains, to honour manner for him for his valiantness. And the cause why the People did bear him such ill will, for the controversie Money. they had with the Nobility about clearing of Debts, grew : for that they knew well enough it was not for any gain or benefit he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spite and displeasure he thought to do them. Antipater in a Letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the Philosopher, doth not without cause commend the fingular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this especially, that he passed all other for winning mens good wills. Whereas Martius noble acts and vertues, wanting that affability, became hatefull, even to those that received benefit by them, who could not abide his severity and felf-will: which caufeth defolation (as Plato faith) and men to be ill-followed, or altogether forfaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trim entertainment, and a very good grace with him. and could fashion himself in all Companies, it was no marvel if his well doing were gloriously commended, and himself much honoured and beloved of the People, considering that some faults he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of fport, and toys of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the Commonwealth, yet they did oft make him their General, and trusted him with the charge of the whole City. Where Martins suing for an Office of honour, that was due to him, for the fundry good fervices he had done to the State, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus do we fee, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him : and the other that honoured his vertue, had no liking to love his person. Martins also did never any great exploit, being General of his Countrey-men, but when he was General of their Enemies against his natural Countrey: whereas Alcibiades, being both a private person, and a General, did notable service unto the ATHENIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades wheresover he was present, had the upper Acibiates and hand ever of his Accusers, even as he would himself, and their Accusations took no place against him. Gotolanuslove unless it were in his absence. Where Martin being present, was condemned by the ROMANS: and unto their in his person murdered and slain by the VALSACE Rue have I cannot but they be under a well and Country. in his person murdered and slain by the Volsces. But here I cannot say they have done well, nor justly, albeit himself gave them some colour to do it, when he openly denied the ROMAN Ambassadors Peace, which afterwards he privately granted, at the request of women. So by this deed of his, he took not away the enmity that was between both People : but leaving War still between them, he made the VOISCES (of whom he was General) to lose the opportunity of noble Victory. Where indeed he should (if he had done as he ought) have withdrawn his Army with their counsell and confent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their General : if he had made that account of them, as their good will towards him did in duty bind him. Or elfe, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterprize of this War, but had onely procured it of intent to be revenged, and afterwards to leave it off when his anger was blown over : yet he had no reason for the love of his Mo-

because his Mother and Wife were Members of the Body of his Countrey and City, which he did be-

ties of the Bishops and Priests, to gratifie onely the request of his Mother with his departure : that was

for the pity and intercession of a Woman, and not for the love of it self, as if it had not been worthy of it. And fo was this departure a grace (to fay truly) very odious and cruel, and deferved no thanks of either party, to him that did it. For he withdrew his Army, not at the request of the ROMANS, against whom he made War: nor with their consent, at whose charge the War was made. And of all

THE COMPARISON OF ALCIBIADES with MARTIUS CORIOLANUS.

OW that we have written all the Deeds of worthy memory, done by either of them both, we may prefently difcern, that in matters of War the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardy and valiant for their persons, as also wise and politick in the Wars: unless they will fay, that Alcibiades was the better Captain, as he that had foughten more Battles with his Enemies, both by Sea and Land, than ever Coriolanus had done, and had always the Victory of his Enemies. For otherwife, in this they were much alike: that where they were both present and had charge and power to command, all things prospered notably, and with good success on the part they were of; and also when they took the contrary side, they made the first have the worst every way. Now for matters of Government, the Noble men and honest Citizens did hate Aleibiades manner of rule in the Commonweal, as of a man most dissolute, and given to flattery: because he ever studied by all device he could, to curry favour with the common People. So did the ROMANS malice also Coriolanus Government, for that it was too arrogant, proud, and tyrannical: whereby neither the one nor theother was to be commended. Norwithstanding he is left to be blamed, that seeketh to please and gratific his common People, than he that despifeth and disdaineth them; and therefore offereth them wrong and injury, because he would not seem to flatter them, to win the more Authority. For as it is an evil thing to flatter the common People to win credit: even so is it besides dishonesty, and injustice also, to attain to credit and authority, for one to make himfelf terrible to the People, by offering them wrong The manners and violence. It is true that Martius was ever counted an honelt natured man, plain, and fimple, with out art or cunning: but Alcibiades meerly contrary; for he was fine, fubril, and deceitfull. And the and Curiolanus greatest fault they ever burdened Aleibiades for, was his malice and deceit, wherewith he abused the Ambassadors of the LACED. MONIANS, and that he was a let that Peace was not concluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, though by this act he fuddenly brought the City of ATHENS into Wars, yet he brought it thereby to be of greater power, and more fearful to the Enemies, by making alliance with the Mantineans and the Argives, who by Alcibiades practife entred into League with the ATHENIANS. And Martim, as Dionysim the Historiographer writeth : did by crait and deceit bring the ROMANS into Wars against the Volsces, causing the Volsces maliciously and wrongfully to be suspected, that went to Rome to see the Games plaid. But the cause why he did it, made the fact so much more soul and wicked; for it was not done for any civil dilfention, nor for any jealousie and contention in matters of Government as Alcibiades did: but onely following his cholerick mood, that would be pleafed with nothing, as Dion faid, he would needs trouble and turmoil the most part of ITALY, and so being angry with his Countrey, he destroyed many other Towns and Cities that could not help it, nor do withall. This is true alfo, that Alcibiades spite and malice did work great mischief and misery to his Countrey; but when he faw they repented them of the injury they had done him, he came to himself, and did withdraw his Army. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades, he would not yet his misfortune and iff hap, the aufterity of his nature, and his haughty obstinate mind, was the onely tus menortune and in trap, the ameerity of mentature, and me manging continue mina, was the onety cause: the which of it self being hatefull to the World, when it is joined with ambition, it groweth then much more churliff, fierce and intolerable. For men that have that fault in nature, are not affable to the People, feening thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the People : and yet on the other fide, if the People should not give them bonour and reverence, they would straight take on the vallet line, it in forn, and little care for the matter. For fo did Metellus, Arifides and Epaminondus, all used this manner: not to feek the good will of the common People by flattery and diffinulation: which was indeed, because they despited that which the people could give or take away. Yet would they not was muceu, because the purpose and the proper country fines, or that they banished be offended with their Citizens, when they were americal, and set at any fines, or that they banished oc outcomen when there is a which they were among and net at any mines, or that they before, fo foon as them, or gave them any other repulfe: but they loved them as well as they did before, fo foon as they shewed any token of repentance, and that they were forry for the wrong they had done them, and were eafily made friends again with them, after they were reflored from their banishment. For he that distant to make much of the People, and to have their favour, should much more foom to feek to be revenged when he is repulfed. For, to take a repulfe and denial of honour fo inwardly to the heart, De revenigen when he is repulsed. Put, to take a repulse and united to be included a did not discometh of no other caule, but that he did too earnefully defire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not discometh of no other caule, but that he did too earnefully defire it. cometi of no other came, but that he may not camenty unite it. Intercore 22 instrumer, and not all-femble at all, that he was not very glad to fee himfelf honoured, and forry to be rejected and denied any honour; but alfohe fought all the means he could to make himfelf beloved of those amongst whom he lived. Whereas Marins flourness and haughty flomack, did flay him from making much of those ne lived. Whereas Dearthus acommens and hauging monisons, and may min from maning much of toole that might advance and honour him: and yet this ambition made him gnaw himfelf for fpite and anger, when he faw he was defpited. And this is all that reasonably may be reproved in him: for otherwise which the law lie was helphase. Allow hims as and that a continuous may be acquired in that it is one of the behaved no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and clean hands from taking of Bribes and Money, he may be compared with the most perfect, vertuous, and honest men of all GREECE: but not with Alibiades, who was undoubtedly always too licentious and loofely given, and had too small regard of the duty of Honesty.

THE LIFE OF

Ant. Christ.

HEN I first began to write these Lives, my intent was to profit other : but fince continuing and going on, I have much profited my felf by looking into these Histories, as if I looked into a glass, to frame and fashion my life to the mould and pattern of these vertuous Noble men. For running over their manners in this fort, and feeking also to describe their Lives: methinks I am still conver-fant and familiar with them, and do as it were ledge them with me, one after another. And when I come to perufe their Histories, and to weigh the vertues and qualities they have had, and what fingularity each of them possessed: and to chuse and cull out the chiefest things of note in them, and their best speeches and doings most worthy of memory : then I cry out :

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man civil manners, and a ruled life, or to reform the vice in man? Democritus the Philospher writeth, that we should pray we might ever see happy Images and Signs in the air, and that the good which is meet and proper to our nature, may rather come to us, than that is evil and unfortunate: prefuppoling a false opinion and Doctrine in Philosophy, which allurethmen to infinite superstitions: That there are good and bad Images flying in the air, which give a good or ill impression unto men, and encline men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continual reading of ancient Histories, and gathering these Lives together which now I leave before you, and by keeping always in mind the acts of the most noble, vertuous, and best given men of former age, and worthy memory: I do teach and prepare my felf to shake off and banish from me all lewd and difhonest conditions, if by chance the company and conversation of them whose company. I keep, and must of necessity haunt, do acquaint me with some unhappy or ungracious touch. This is easie unto me, that do dispose my mind, being quiet and not troubled with any passion, unto the deep consideration of so many noble examples. As I do present unto you now in this Volume, the Lives of Timoleon the Co-RINTHIAN, and of Paulus Amylius the ROMAN, who had not onely a good and upright mind with them, but were also fortunate and happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you shall hardly judge, when you have read over their Lives, whether wildom or good fortune brought them to atchieve to such honourable Acts and Exploits as they did. Many (and the most part of Historiographers) do write, that the House and Family of the Amylians in ROME, was alwaies of the most The House of ancient of the Nobility, which they call Patricians. Some Writers affirm also, that the first of that the Amylians House that gave Name to all the Posterity after, was Marcus, the Son of Pythagoras the wife, came of Pywhom King Numa for the sweetness and pleasant grace of his tongue, surnamed Marcus Annylius: thisgory Son, moft part of this Family that obtained Honour and Estimation for their Vertue, were ever fortu-Lucius Paulus nate also in all their doings, saving onely Lucius Paulus onely, who died in the Battle of Can-NES. But his misfortune doth bear manifest testimony of his wildom and valiancy together, Confident NES, But his misiorum wou to the his fellow Consul that would needs join Battle ; and to do as he did, saving that he sled not as the other, who being the first procurer of the Battle, was the first that ran away: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to let him, and did flick by it, and fought it valiantly to the last gasp. This Amylia lest 2 Daughter behind him called Amylia, which was married unto Scipio the Great: and a Son, Paulus Amylius, being the same man whose Life we presently treat Lucius Army of. His youth fortunately fell out in a flourishing time of glory and honour, through the fundry list married to Vertues of many great and noble Perfons living in those days, among whomhe had made his name famous also: and it was not by that ordinary art and course, which the best esteemed young men of that age did take and follow. For he did not use to plead private mens Causes in Law, neither would The vertues of creep into mens favour by fawning upon any of them; though he faw it a common practile, and Pullet Army policy of men, to feek the Peoples favour and good wills by fuch means. Moreover, he refuled not that common course which other took, for that it was contrary to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had been so distiposed, but he rather sought to win reputation on by his honesty, his valianmess, and upright dealing, as choosing that the better way than elther of the other two, infomuch as in marvellous short time he passed all those that were of his Pantus Amy age. The first Office of Honour he fued for, was the Office of Adilu, in which fuit he was preferred before twelve other that fued for the felf-fame Office : who were men of no small quality, for they all came afterwards to be Confuls. After this, he was cholen to be one of the number of the Priefts, whom the ROMANS call Augures: who have the charge of all the Divinations and Sooth-fayings, in telling of things to come by flying of Birds, and figns in the air. He was fo carefull, and took fuch pains to understand how the ROMANS did use the same, and with such diligence fought the observation of the ancient Religion of the ROMANS in all holy matters: that where that Priesthood was before efteemed but a Title of Honour, and defired for the name onely, he brought it to pass, that it was the most honourable Science, and best reputed of in ROME: wherein he confirmed the Philosophers opinion, that Religion is the knowledg how to serve God, For when he did any thing belonging to his Office of PrieRhood, he did it with great experience, judgement and diligence, leaving all other thoughts, and without omitting any ancient Ceremony, or adding to any new; contending oftentimes with his companions, in things which leemed light, and Panhar diligent of annual company declaring unto them, that though we do prefume the gods are easie to be pacified, and that they readily pardon all faults and scapes committed by negligence, yet if it were no more monwealth even in triflet, but for respect of Commonwealths sake, they should not slightly nor carelesty diffemble or pass over faults committed in those matters: For no man (faith he) at the first that committeeth any fault, doth alone trouble the state of the Commonwealth: but withall, we must think he leaveth the grounds of Civil Government, that is not as carefull to keep the Institutions of small matters, as The Discipline also of the great. So was he also a severe Captain, and strict observer of all Martial Discipline, not feeking to win the Souldiers love by flattery, when he was General in the Field, as many did in that time: neither corrupting them for a fecond charge, by shewing bimself gende and courteous in the time: neither corrupting them for a fecond charge, by shewing bimself gende and courteous in the time; nuto those that served under him: but himself did orderly shew them the very Rules and Precepts of the Discipline of Wars, even as a Pricelt that should express the names and Ceremonies of fome holy Sacrifice, wherein were danger to omit any part or parcel. Howbeir, being terrible to execute the Law of Arms upon rebellious and disobedient Souldiers, he kept up thereby the state of the Commonweal the better : judging to overcome the Enemy by force, was but an accessary as a man may term it, in respect of well training and ordering his Citizens by good Discipline. While the ROMANS were in Wars against King Antiochus surnamed the Great, in the South parts, all the chiefest Captains of ROME being employed that ways, there fell out another in the neck of that, Peulus Emy- in the West parts towards Spain, where they were up in Arms. Thinher they sent Amylins list fent Prz- Przetor, not with fix Axes as the other Przetors had born before them, but with twelve: fo that untor into Spain. der the name of Prator, he had the Authority and Dignity of a Conful. He twice overcame the bar-Amylius skill barous People in main Battle, and flew thirty thouland of them, and got this Victory through his tun to enoote place and time great skill and wildom, in chufing the advantage of place and time, to fight with his Enemies, even as they passed over a River: which easily gave his Souldiers the Victory. Moreover, he took there two hundred and fifty Cities, all which did open, and gladly receive him in. So, leaving all that Countrey quiet and in good peace, and having received their Fealty by Oath made between his hands, be returned again to ROME, not inriched the value of a Drachma more than before. For then he took little regard to his expences, he fpent fo frankly, neither was his Purfe his Mafter, though his Revenue was not great to bear it out, as it appeared to the World after his death, for all that he had was Scipio the fe-cond and Fa-little enough to fatific his Wives Joynter. His first Wife was Papyria, the Daughter of a Noble cond and 14. Conful Papyrius Masso, and after they had lived a long time together, he was divorced from her, were the Sors notwithstanding he had goodly Children by her. For by her he had that famous Scipio the fecond, and of Paulas A. Fabius Maximus. The just cause of the Divorce between them, appeared not to us in writing milius, by Pa but methinks the Tale that is told concerning the separation of a certain Marriage is true: That a certain ROMAN having forfaken his Wife, her friends fell out with him, and asked him, What fault dost thou find in her? is she not honest of her body? is she not fair? doth she not bring thee goodly Children? but he putting forth his foot, shewed them his Shoe, and answered them : is A pretty Tale not this a goodly Shoe? is not it finely made? and is it not new? yet I dare fay there is never a one of a Roman of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to fay truly, great and open faults are commonly occasions to make Husbands put away their Wives: but yet oftentimes houshold words run to between them (proceeding of crooked Conditions, or of diversity of Natures, which strangers are not privy unto) that in process of time they do beget such a strange alteration of love and minds in them, as one house can no longer hold them. So Amylim, having put away Papyria his first Wife, he married another that brought him two Sons, which he brought up with himself in his House, and gave his two first Sons (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption to two of the Noblest and richest Families of the City of ROME. The elder of the twain, unto Fabius Maximus, he that was five times Conful, and the younger unto the House of the Cornelians, whom the Son of the great Scipio the African did adopt, being his Coufin-german, and named him Scivio. Concerning his Daughters, the Son of Cato married the one, and Elius Tubero the other, The vertue of who was a marvellous honest man, and did more nobly maintain himself in his poverty, than any Elius Tubero other ROMAN: for they were fixteen persons all of one name, and of the House of the Alians, hispoverty and very near akin one to the other, who had all but one little House in the City, and a small Farm quiet life. in the Countrey, wherewith they entertained themselves, and lived all together in one House, with their Wives, and many little Children. Amongst their Wives, one of them was the Daughter of Paulus Amylius, after he had been twice Conful, and had triumphed twice, not being ashamed of her Husbands poverty, but wondring at his Vertue that made him poor. Whereas Brethren and Innaturality Kinfmen, as the World goeth now, if they dwell not far affunder, and in other Countries, not one among that near another, and that Rivers part them not, or Walls divide their Lands, leaving great wasts between them; they are never quiet, but still in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this Story lay before the wife, and well advised Readers, to learn thereby how to frame their life. and wifely to behave themselves. Now Emylius being chosen Conful, went to make War with . Emylius the LIGURIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, and which otherwise are called LIGUSTINES Conful, These are very valiant and warlike men, and were very good Souldiers at that time, by reason of their continual Wars against the ROMANS, whose near neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth upon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foot joyneth to the Thuscan Sea, and pointeth towards Africk, and are mingled with the Gauls and Spaniards, neighbours unto the Sea Coast : who scowring all the Mediterranian Sea at that time, unto the straight of Hercules pillars, did with their little light Pinnaces of Pirates, let all the Traffick and entercourse of Merchandize, Amylius being gone to feek them in their Country, they tarried his coming with an Army of forty thousand men: nevertheless, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were five to one of his, yet he gave the onfet upon them, and overthrew them, and drave them into their Cities. Then he fent to offer them peace, for the ROMANS would not altogether destroy the LIGURIANS, because their Countrey was as a Rampier or Bulwark against the invasion of the GAULS, who lay lurking for Emplius oopportunity and occasion to invade ITALY: whereupon these LIGURIANS yielded themselves vercometh the unto him, and put all their Forts and Ships into his hands. Amylius delivered unto them their Ligarians. Holds again, without other hurt done unto them, faving that he razed the Walls of their Fortifications; howbeit he took all their Ships from them, leaving them little Boats of three Oars onely, and no greater; and fet all the Prisoners at liberty they had taken, both by Sea and by Land, as well ROMANS as other, which were a marvellous number. These were all the notable acts he did worthy memory, in the first year of his Consulship. Afterwards he oftentimes shewed himself very delirous to be Conful again, and did put forth himself to sue for it: but when he was denied it, he never after made fute for it again, but gave himfelf onely to fludy Divine things, and to fee his Children vertuously brought up, not onely in the ROMAN Tongue which himself was taught, but also a little more curiously in the GREEK Tongue. For he did not onely retain Grammarians, Rhetoricians, and Logicians, but also Painters, Gravers of Images, Riders of Horses, and Hunts of GREECE about his Children: and he himself also (if no matters of Commonwealth troubled him) was ever with them in the School when they were at their Books, and also when they otherwise did exercise themselves. For he loved his Children as much or more than any other ROMAN. Now concerning Inc cowar the state of the Commonwealth, the ROMANS were at Wars with King Perfeus, and they much Romans in blamed the Captains they had fent thither before, for that for lack of skill and courage, they had fo spain. cowardly behaved themselves, as their Enemies laughed them to scorn: and they received more hurt of them, than they did unto the King. For not long before, they had driven King Antiochus beyond Mount Taurus, and made him forfake the rest of Asia, and had shut him up within the Borders of SYRIA, who was glad that he had bought that Countrey with fifteen thousand Talents, which he paid for a Fine. A little before also, they had overcome Philip King of MACEDON in THESSALY, and had delivered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreover, having overcome Hannibal (unto whom no Prince nor King that ever was in the World was comparable, either for his power or valiantness) they thought this too great a dishonour to them, that this War they had against King Perfeus, should hold so long of even hand with them, as if he had been an Enemy equal with the People of ROME: confidering also that they fought not against them, but with the refuse and scattered People of the overthrown Army his Father had lost before,

PAULUS EMYLIUS. and knew not that Philip had left his Army stronger, and more expert by reason of his overthrow, The fuccession than it was before: as I will briefly rehearse the Story from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of of Antigonal the greatest power of all the Caprains and Successors of Alexander the Great, having obtained for himself and his Posterity the Title of a King, had a Son called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonum the second, that was surnamed Gonstos, whose Son was also called Demetrizu, that raigned no long time, but died, and left a young Son called Philip. By reason whereof, the Princes and Nobility of Macedon, fearing that the Realm should be left without Heir, they preferred one Antigonus, cousin to the last deceased King, and made him matry the Mother of Philip the less, giving him the name at the first of the Kings Protector onely, and Lieutenant Generall of his Majesty. But Antigonus Dothen gave him the absolute name of a King, and furnamed him Doson, to say, the Giver: for he promifed much and gave little. After him raigned Philip, who in his green youth gave more hope of himself, than any other of the Kings before: infomuch as they thought that one day he would reflore MACEDON her ancient Fame and Glory, and that he alone would pluck down the pride and power of the ROMANS, who role against all the World. But after that he had lost a great Bartle by Time Battle, and was overthrown by Time Quintus Flaminius near unto the City of Scotusa, then he began to quakefor fear, and to leave all to the mercy of the ROMANS; thinking he escaminist, at the Ped good cheap, for any light Ransome or Tribute the Romans should impose upon him. Yet City of constant afterwards coming to understand himself, he grew to disdain it much, thinking that to raign preparation for through the favour of the ROMANS, was but to make himself a Slave, to feek to live in plea-War in Mase- fure at his eafe, and not for a valiant and noble Prince born. Whereupon he fet all his mind to fludy the Difcipline of Wars, and made his preparation as wifely and closely as possibly he could. For he left all his Towns along the Sea Coast, and standing upon any High-ways, without any fortification at all, and in manner defolate without People, to the end there might appear no occasion of doubt or miftruft in him: and in the mean time, in the high Countries of his Realm far from great beaten ways, he levyed a great number of men of War, and replenished his Towns and strong Holds that lay featteringly abroad, with Armour and Weapon, Money and Men, providing for War, which he kept as fecretly as he could. For he had Provision of Armour in his Armoury, to arm thirry thousand men, and eight million bushels of Corn fasely lockt up in his Forts and stronger places, and ready Money, as much as would ferve to entertain ten thouland strangers in pay, to defend his Countrey for the space of ten years. But before he could bring that to pass he had purposed, he died for grief and sorrow, after he knew he had unjuftly put Demetrisu the best of his Sons to death, upon the falle accufation of the worst, that was Perseus: who as he did inherit the Kingdom of his Father by fuccession, so did he also inherit his Fathers malice against the ROMANS. Bur he had no shoulders to bear so heavy a burden, and especially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many lewd and naughry conditions he had, he was extream covetous and miferable. They fay also, that he was not legitimate, because Philips wife had taken him from treamcovetous Gnathainia (a Taylors Wife born at Arcos) immediately after he was born, and did adopt the Child to behers. And some think that this was the chiefest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, fearing left his lawfull Son would feek occasion to prove him a Bastard. Norwithflanding, fimple though he was, and of vile and base nature, he found the strength of his Kingdom so great, that he was contented to take upon him to make War against the ROMANS, which he maintained a long time, and fought against their Consuls, that were their Generals, and repulsed great Armies of theirs both by Sea and Land, and overcame fome. As Publius Licinius among other, the first that invaded MACEDON, was overthrown by him in a Battle of Horfemen, where he flew at that time two thouland five hundred good men of his, and took fix hundred Prisoners. And their Army by Sea, riding at anchor before the City of Orem, he did fuddenly fet upon, and took twenty great hips of burden, and all that was in them, and funk the rest, which were all loaden with Cotn: and took of all forts besides, about 54 Foysts and Galliots of fility Oars apiece. The second Consul and General he fought withall, was Hoftilius, whom he repulsed, attempting by force to invade Mactout of Maccdon DON by way of the City of ELUMIA. Another time again, when he entred in by stealth upon the Coast of Thessaly, he offered him Bartle, but the other durft not abide it. And as though this War troubled himnothing at all, and that he had cared little for the ROMANS, he went and fought a Battle in the mean time with the DARDANIANS, where he flew ten thousand of those barbarous People, and brought away a marvellous spoil. Moreover he procured the Nation of the Gauls dwelling upon the River of Danuty, which they call Baffarna (men very warlike, and excellent good Gastrdwelling Horsemen) and did practise with the ILLYRIANS also by means of their King Gentists, to make upon the River them join with him in this War: so that there ran a rumour, that for Money he had gotten those of Danubr. GAULS to come down into ITALY, from the high Countrey of GAUL all along the Adriatick Sea. The ROMANS being advertised of these news, thought the time served not now to dispose their Offices in Wars any more by grace and favour unto those that sued for them: but contrariwile, that they should call some Nobleman that were very skilfull and a wife Captain, and could discreetly govern and perform things of great charge: as Paulus Emylius, a man well frepped on in years, being threefcore years old, and yet of good power, by reason of the lufty young men his Sons, and Sons in Law, befides a great number of his friends and Kinsfolk. So all that bare great authority, did all together with one confent counsel him to obey the People, which called him to the Confulfhip. At the beginning indeed he delayed the People much that came to importune him, and utterly denied them: PAULUS ÆMYLIUS.

faying, he was no meet man neither to defire, nor yet to take upon him any charge. Howbeit in the end, feeing the people did urge it upon him, by knocking continually at his gates, and calling him aloud in the streets, willing him to come into the Market-place, and perceiving they were angry with him, because he refused it, he was content to be perswaded. And when he stood among them that sued for the Confulship, the people thought straight that he stood not there so much for defire of the Office. as for that he put them in hope of affured victory, and happy success of this begun War : so great was their love towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they chose him Confull again Anyling thethe second time. Wherefore so soon as he was chosen, they would not proceed to drawing of Lots sen Conful the the fecond time. Wherefore to loon as he was choich, they would not protect to trawing of Loos fecond time, according to their cufforn, which of the two Confuls thould happen to go into MacEDON: but fecond time, according to their cufforn, which of the two Confuls thould happen to go into MacEDON: but presently with a full and whole consent of them all, they gave him the whole charge of the Wars of of the Wars of MACEDON. So being Confull now, and appointed to make War upon King Perfeus, all the Macedon, people did honourably accompany him home unto his house: where a little Girle (a Daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping unto her Father. He making much of her, Good luck asked her why she wept : The poor Girle answered, colling him about the neck, and kissing him, pronounced by Alas Father, wot you what ? our Perseus is dead. She meant it by a little Whelp so called, which Girle. was her play-fellow. In good hour my Girle, faid he, I like the fign well. Thus did Cicero the Orator report of it in his book of Divinations. The ROMANS, had a cuftom at that time, that fuch as were elected Confulls (after that they were openly proclaimed) should make an Oration of thanks unto the people, for the honour and favour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the cuftom) being gathered together to hear Amylius speak, he made this Oration unto them : "That the first time he sued to be Consull, was in respect of himself, standing at that Paulus Amy-"time in need of fuch honour : now he offered himself the second time unto it, for the good love lius Oration "he bare unto them, who flood in need of a Generall, wherefore he thought himself nothing of thanks to "bound nor beholding unto them now. And if they did think also this War might be better when he was "followed by any other then by himself, he would presently with all his heart resign the place. Consul, obser-"Furthermore, if they had any trust or confidence in him, that they thought him a man sufficient to ving the cu-"discharge it : then that they would not speak nor meddle in any matter that concerned his duty, stom. "and the Office of a General, faving onely, that they would be diligent (without any words) to "do whatsoever he commanded, and should be necessary for the War and service they took " in hand. For if every man would be a Commander, as they had been heretofore, of those by whom " they should be commanded; then the world would more laugh them to scorn in this service, then " ever before had been accustomed. These words made the ROMANS very obedient to him, and perceiving good hope to come, being all of them very glad that they had refused those ambitious flatterers that fued for the charge, and had given it unto a man, that durft boldly and frankly tell them the troth. Mark how the ROMANS by yeelding unto reason and vertue, came to command all See what fruit other, and to make themselves the mightiest people of the world. Now that Paulus Amylius set by obedience ting forward to this War, had wind at will, and fair passage to bring him to his journeys end, I and reason. impute it to good fortune, that fo quickly and fafely conveyed him to his Camp. But for the reft of his exploits he did in all his War, part of them being performed by his own hardiness, other by his wildom and good counsell, other by the diligence of his friends in ferving him with good will other by his own resolute constancy and courage in extreamest danger, and last, by his marvellous skill in determining at an instant what was to be done, I cannot attribute any notable act or worthy fervice unto this his good fortune they talk of fo much, as they may do in other Captains doings: unless they will say peradventure, that Perseus covetousness and misery was Emylius good fortune: Perseus covefor his milerable fear of spending Money , was the onely cause and destruction of the whole Realm of touriest and MACEDON , which was in good state and hope of continuing in prosperity. For there came down into milery, was the the Countrey of MACEDON at King Perfeus request, ten thousand Bastarna a Horse-back, and as ma- destruction of ny Footmen to them, who always joyned with them in battel, all mercenary Souldiers, depending up-his Realm of on pay and entertainment of Wars, as men that could not plow, nor fow, nor traffick merchandizes Macedon. by fea, nor skill of grazing to gain their living with : and to be short, that had no other occupation or Bastarne. merchandizes but to serve in the Wars, and to overcome those with whom they fought. Further- mercenary more, when they came to incamp and lodge in the MEDICA, near to the MACEDONIANS, who people. faw them so goodly great men, and so well trained and exercised in handling all kind of Weapons, so brave and lusty in words and threats against their Enemies : they began to pluck up their hearts and to look big, imagining that the ROMANS would never abide them, but would be afraid to look them in the face, and onely to fee their march, it was so terrible and fearfull. But Perfeus after he had encouraged his men in this fort, and had put them in fuch a hope and jollity, when this barbarous supply came to ask him a thousand Crowns in hand for every Captain, he was so damped and Note what ver, but kept it safe locked up in his Treasury, as if he had been asraid to touch it, and had been NET, JUL REPL A JAIL TOLKER OF AN AND A STATE OF THE ROBBE TACE OF the Kings of LYDIA and none of his. And he did not shew that he came of the noble race of the Kings of LYDIA and PHOENICIA, who gloried to be rich: but shewed how by inheritance of bloud he chalenged some part of the vertue of Philip, and of Alexander, who both because they effected to buy Victory with Money, not Money with Victory, did many notable things, and thereby conquered the want money, not make your states, and time, that it was not Philip, but his Gold and Silworld. Hereof came the common faying in old time, that it was not Philip, but his Gold and Silworld. ver that won the Cities of GREECE. And Alexander when he went to conquer the INDIES, feeing the Macedonians carry with them all the wealth of Persia, which made his Camp very heavy, and flow to march: he himself first of all set fire on his own Carriage that conveyed all his necessaries, and perswaded other to do the like, that they might march more lightly and eafily on the journey. But Persess contrarily would not spend any part of his Goods to lave himfelf, his Children and Realm, but rather yeelded to be led Prisoner in Triumph with a great Ranform, to flew the ROMANS how good a husband he had been for them. For he did not onely fend away the Gauls without giving them pay as he had promifed, but moreover having persena away me Galles willione giving main pay as in these Wars, for the sum of three hundred swaded Gentius King of ILLYRIA to take his part in these Wars, for the sum of three hundred Gentus King Talents which he had promited to furnish him with ; he caused the Money to be told , and put up in of the inspirator laterns while the man promined to receive it. Whereupon Gentiss thinking himself fure of the aided Perseur bags by those whom Gentiss fent to receive it. Perfeur double Money promifed, committed a fond and foul part : for he stayed the Ambassadours the ROMANS dealing with fent unto him, and committed them to prison. This part being come to Perfess ears, he thought King Genius. now he needed not hire him with Money to be an Enemy to the ROMANS, confidering he had waded fo far, as that he had already done, was as a manifest fign of his ill will towards them; and that it was too late to look back and repent him, now that his foul part had plunged him into King Gentius certain Wars, for an uncertain hope. So did he abuse the unfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred Talents he had promifed him. And worfe then this, shortly after he fuffered Lucius Ancisse the ROMANS Przetor, whom they fent against him with an Army, to pluck King Gentius, his Wife and Children out of his Kingdom, and to carry them Priloners with the foot of the him. Now when Emylius was arrived in MacEDON, to make War against such an Enemy, mount of man he made no manner of reckoning of his person, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one Camp he had four thousand Horsemen, and no less then forty thousand Footmen, with the which Army he had planted himself along the sea side, by the soot of the Mount Olympus, in a place unpossible to be approached: and there he had so well fortified all the straights and passages unto him with fortifications of wood, that he thought himself to lie safe out of all danger, and imagined to dally with Amylius, and by tract of time to eat him out with charge. Asimplises in the mean feason lay not idle, but occupied his wits throughly, and left no means unattempted, to put something in proof. And perceiving that his Souldiers by overmuch licentious liberty (wherein by fufferance they lived before) were angry with delaying and lying fill, and that they did bufily occupy themselves in the Generals office, saying this, and such a thing would be done that is not done : he took them up roundly, and commanded them they should meddle no more too curioully in matters that pertained not to them, and that they should take care for nothing elfe, but to fee their Armour and Weapon ready to ferre valiantly, and to use their Swords after the ROMANS fashion, when their General should appoint and command them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to look to themselves, he commanded those that watched, should have no Spears nor Pikes, because they should be more wakefull, having no long Weapon to refift the Enemy, if they were affaulted. The greatest trouble his Army had, was lack of fresh Water, because the Water that ran to the Sea, was very little, and marvellous foul by the Sea side. But Emplius considering they were at the foot of the Mount Olympus (which is of a marvellous height, and full of Wood withall) conjectured, feeing the Trees to fresh and green, that there should be some little prety Springs among them, which ran under the ground. So he made them dig many holes and Wells along the Mountain, which were straight filled with fair Water, being pent within ground before for lack of breaking open the heads, which then ran down in streams, and met together in fundry places. And yet fome do deny, that there is any meeting of Waters with in the ground, from whence the Springs do come: and they fay, that running out of the earth as they do, it is not for that the Water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendreth and rifeth at the fame time and place where it runnethnor, turning the substance into Water, which is a moist vapour, thickned and made cold by the coldness of the earth, and so becometh a stream and runneth down. For (say they) as Womens breafts are not always full of Milk (as Milk-pansare; that continually keep Milk) but do of themselves convert the nutriment Women take into Milk, and after cometh forth at their nipples, even so the Springs and watery places of the earth, from whence the Fountains come, have no meetings of hidden Waters, nor hollow places to capable readily to deliver Water from them, as one would draw it out of a Pump or Ciftern, from to many Brooks, and deep Rivers : but by their naurall coldness and moisture, they wax thick, and put forth the vapour and air so strong, that they turn it into Water. And this is the reason why the places where they dig and open the earth, do put forth more abundance of Water by opening the ground : like as Womens breafts do give more Milk when they are most drawn and suckt, because in a fort they do better feed the vapour within them, and convert it thereby into a running humour. Where to the contrary, those parts of the earth that are not digged, nor have no vent outward, are the more unable, and less meet to ingender Water

PAULUS EMYLIUS having not that provocation and course to run, that causeth the bringing forth of moisture. Yet

fuch as maintain this opinion, do give them occasion that love argument, to contrary them thus; Then we may fay by like reason also, that in the bodies of beafts there is no bloud long before, and that it ingendreth upon a sudden,, when they are hurt, by transferring of some spirit or flesh that readily changeth into some running liquor. And moreover, they are consuted by the common experience of those mine-men, that dig in the mines for mettall, or that undermine Castles to win them: who when they dig any great depth, do many times meet in the bowels of the earth with running Rivers, the water whereof is not ingendred by little and little, as of necessity it should be, if it were true, that upon the prefent opening of the ground, the humour should immediately be created, but it falleth vehemently all at one time. And we see oftentimes, that in cutting thorow a Mountain or Rock, fuddenly there runneth out a great quantity of water. And thus much for this matter. Now to return to our History again. Emylius lay there a convenient time, and stirred not : and it is faid there were never feen two fo great Armies one so near to the other, and to be so quiet. In the end, casting many things with himself, and devising fundry practises, he was informed of another way to enter into MACEDON, through the Countrey of PERRÆBIA, over against the Temple called Pythion, and the Rock upon which it is built, where there lay no Garison : which gave him better hope to pass that way, for that it was not kept, then that he feared the narrowness and hardness of the way unto it. So, he brake the matter of his counsel. Thereupon Scipio called Nasica (the Son adopted Scipio Nasica, of that great Scipio the African, who became afterwards a great man, and was Prefident of the and Fatins Senate or Councell) was the first man that offered himself to lead them, whom it would please him to Maximus, offer fend to take that paffage, and to affault their Enemies behind. The fecond was Fabius Maximus, the to take the eldeft Son of Amylius, who being but a very young man, role notwithstanding, and offered himself Straights, wery willingly. Amylim was very glad of their ofters, and gave them not to many men as Polybim writeth, but so many as Nasica himself declareth in a Letter of his he wrote to a King, where he reporteth all the story of this journey. There were I hree thousand ITALIANS, leavied in ITALY, by the confederates of the ROMAN'S, who were not of the ROMAN Legions, and in the left wing about Five thousand. Besides those, Nasica took also One hundred and twenty men at Arms, and about Two hundred CRETANS and THRACIANS stringled together, of those Harpalus had sent thither. With this number Nafica departed from the Camp, and took his way toward the fea fide. and lodged by the Temple of Hercules, as if he determined to do this feat by fea, to environ the Camp of the Enemies behind. But when the Souldiers had supped, and that it was dark night, he made the Captains of every Band privy to his enterprise, and so marched all night a contrary way from the fea, untill at length they came under the Temple of Pythion, where he lodged to reft the Soulfrom the lea, until at rengen uncy came moves the source of the mount olympus is above ten furlongs high, as The height of

Olympus mount is just, by measure made with line. Twelve hundred seventy paces trod, as measure can assign. The measure being made, right o're against the place, Whereas Apollo's Temple stands, ybuils with stately grace. Even from the levell plot, of that Same Countries plain, Unto the top which all on high, doth on the hill remain. And To Xenagor as the Son of Eumelus, In olden days by measure, made, the same did find for us: And did engrave it here in writing for to fee;

When as he took his Lately large (Apollo god) of thee.
Yet the Geometricians say that there is no Mountain higher, nor Sea deeper, then the length of ten furlongs : fo that I think this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his measure at adventure, and by guels, but by true rules of the Art and instruments Geometrical. There Natica refted all night. King Perfeus perceiving in the mean time that Amylim ftirred not from the place where he lay, mistrusting nothing his practise, and the coming of Masica, who was at liand; until fuch time as a Traytor of CRETE (flealing from Nasica) did reveal unto him the pretended practife, as also the ROMAN's compassing of him about : he wondred much at these news, howbeit he removed not his Camp from the place he lay in , but dispatched one of his Captains called Milon, with Ten thousand Strangers, and Two thousand MACEDONIANS: and straightly commanded him with all the possible speed he could, to get the top of the hill before them. Polybins faith, that the ROMANS came and gave them an alarm, when they were fleeping : Bur Nasica writeth, that there was a marvellous sharp and terrible Battel on the top of the Mountain : and faid plainly, that a THRACIAN Souldier coming towards him, he threw his Dart at him, and hitting him right in the breaft, flew him stark dead ; and having repulsed their Enemies, Nashea won Milon their Captain shamefully running away in his Coat without Armour or Weapon, he followed the straights him without any danger, and so went down to the valley, with the fafety of all his Company. of Macedon. This conflict fortuning thus Perfeus railed his Camp in great haste from the place where he was, and being disappointed of his hope, he retired in great fear, as one at his wits end, and not knowing how to determine. Yet was he constrained either to stay, and incamp before the City of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of Battel, or else to divide his Army into his Cities and strong holds, and to receive the Wars within his own Countrey, the which being once crept in, could never be driven out again, without great mirder and bloudshed. Hereupon his friends did counsel him, to chuse rather the fortune of battel : alledging unto him, that he was the stronger in men a great way, chuie rather the fortune of outer: aneuging unto that, that he was the fatonger in men a great way, and that the MACEDONIANS would fight luftily with all the courage they could, confidering that they fought for the fafety of their Wives and Children, and also in the presence of their King, who thould both fee every mans doing, and fight himself in person also for them. The King moved by Perfeurpitched these persuastions, determined to venture the chance of battel. So he pitched his Camp and viewed the fituation of the places all about, and divided the Companies amongst his Captains, purposing the mutation of the place and about, and divided the Companies amongst the profession of Police.

The place and Countrey was the place and Countrey was the police of Police. fuch, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to range a battel of Footmen in, and little prety hills also one depending upon another, which were very commodious for Archers, naked men, and fuch as were lightly armed, to retire themselves being diffrested, and also to environ their enemies behind. There were two small Rivers also, Afon and Leness that ran through the same, the which though they were not very deep, being about the latter end of Summer, yet they would an only the ROMANS notwithflanding. Now when Amyline was joyned with Nafica, he marched on ftraight in battel ray towards his enemies. But perceiving afar off their battel marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the fame: he wondred to behold it, and fuddenly frayed his Army, confidering with himfelf what he had to do. Then the young Captains having charge under him, defirous to fight it our prefently, went unto him to pray him to give the onlet, but Nafica specially above the reft, having good hope in the former good luck he had at his Emplier an- first encounter. Amylise smiling, answered him: So would I do if I were as young as thou; But fwer to scipio the fundry Victories I have won herecofore, having raught me by experience the faults the vanquish-Najac, for gl- ed do commit, do forbid me to go fo hotly to work (before my Souldiers have reflect, which did return but now) to affault an Army fer in fuch order of battel. When he had answered him thus, he commanded the first Bands that were now in view of the Enemies, should embattel themfelves, flewing a countenance to the Enemy as though they would fight; and that those in the rereward should lodge in the mean time, and fortifie the Camp: So, bringing the foremost men to be hindmost, by changing from man to man, before the Enemies were aware of it; he had broken his battel by little and little, and lodged his men, fortified within the Camp without any tumult or noile, and the enemies never perceiving it. But when night came, and every man had supped, as they were going to fleep and take their rest; the Moon which was at the full, and of a great height, began to darken and to change into many forts of colours, loting her light, untill fuch time as the vanished away, and was eclipfed alrogether. Then the ROMAN's began to make a noise with Basons and Pans, as their fashion is to do in such a chance, thinking by this sound to call her again, and to make her come to her light, lifting up many Torches lighted and firebrands in to the air. The MACEDONIAN'S on the other fide did no fuch matter within the Camp, but were altogether stricken with an horrible fear ; and there ran a whileering rumour through the people, that this fign in the element fignified the eclipse of the King. For Emylius was not ignorant of the divertities of the eclipfes, and he had heard fay the caufe is, by reason that the Moon making her ordinary course about the world (after certain revolutions of time) doth come to enter mo the round shadow of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden, untill such time as having past the dark region of the shadow, the cometh asterwards to recover her light which the Moon had recovered her former brightness again, he facrificed eleven Calves. And the next morning also by the break of day, making farrifice to Hercules, he could never have any figns or tokens that promifed him good luck, in facrificing twenty Oxen one after another : but at the one and twentieth he had figns that promifed him victory, to he defended himfelf. Where fore, after he had vowed a folemp facrifice of an hundred Oxen to Hercules, and also Games of prizes at the Weapons, he commanded his Captains to put their men in readiness to fight; and fo sought to win time, tarrying till the Sun came about in the afternoon towards the Welt, to the end that the ROMANS which were turned towards the Eaft, should not have it in their faces when they were fighting. In the mean time, he reposed himself in his Tent, which was all open behind towards the fide that looked into the valley, where the Camp of his Enemies lay. When it grew towards night, to make the Enemies fet upon his men, some say he used this policy. He made a Horse be driven towards them without a bridle, and certain ROMANS followed Enyliur poli- him, as they would have taken him again: and this was the cause of procuring the skirmish. O ther fay, that the THRACIANS serving under the charge of Captain Alexander, did set upon certain forragers of the ROMANS, that brought forrage into the Camp: out of the which, from hundred of the LIGURIANS ran fuddenly to the refere, and relief coming still from both Armies, at the laft the main battel followed after. Wherefore Emplis like a wile General forfeeing by the danger of this skirmish, and the stirring of both Camps, what the fury of the bar tel would come to : came out of his Tent , and passing by the Bands did encourage them , and prayed them to flick to it like men. In the mean time, Nafica thrufting himfelf into the place where the skirmift was hotteft, perceived the Army of the Enemies marching in battel ready to joyn. The first that marched in the vaward were the THRACIANS, who feemed terribe to look upon, as he writeth himself: for they were mighty made men, and carried marvellous bright the Maccdo rook upon, as new mean manch: for they were armed with Greaves, and their thighs with Tales, and their thighs with Tales, and their thighs with Tales, and their thigh with Tales, and the tales, and tales, and tales, and the tales, and tales, their Coats were black, and marched shaking heavy Halberds upon their shoulders. Next uno there THRAGIANS, there followed them all the other strangers and Souldiers whom the King had hired, diverfly armed and fet forth : for they were people of fundry Nations gathered together. among whom the PAONIANS were mingled. The third fquadron was of MACEDONIANS, and all of them chosen men, as well for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantness of their persons : and they were all in goodly gilt armours, and brave purple cassocks upon them, spick and fpan new, And at their backs came after them, the old bands to shew themselves out of the Camp with Targets of Copper, that made all the Plain to shine with the brightness of their Steel and Copper. And all the Hills and Mountains thereabouts did ring again like an Echo, with the cry and noise of so many fighting men, one encouraging another. In this order they marched so fiercely with fo great heart-burning, and fuch fwiftness; that the first which were slain at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs from the Camp of the ROMANS. The charge being given and The battel the battel begun, Amylius gallopping to the vaward of the Battel, perceived that the Captains betweet Perof the MACEDONIANS which were in the first ranks, had already thrust their Pikes into the Ro-MAN'S Targets, fo as they could not come near them with their Swords; and that the other MACEDONIANS carrying their Targets behind them, had now plucked them before them, and did base their Pikes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the Targets of the ROMANS. Which when he had confidered, and of what strength and force his wall and rank of Targets was, one joyning to near another, and what a terrour it was to fee a front of a battel with fo many armed Pikes and steel heads : he was more afraid and amazed withall, then with any fight he ever faw before, nevertheless he could wisely diffemble it at that time. And so passing by the companies of his Horsemen, without either Curaces or Helmet upon his head, he shewed a noble cheerfull countenance unto them that fought. But on the contrary fide, Perfeus the King of MACEDON, as Polybius writeth, Perfeus goeth fo foon as the battel was begun, withdrew himself, and got into the City of PyDNE, under pretence to go to do facrifice unto Hercules : who doth not accept the faint facrifice of Cowards, neither doth receive their Prayers, because they be unreasonable. For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not should hit the white : nor that he should win the victory, that bideth not the battel; neither that he should have any good, that doth nothing towards it : nor that a naughty man should be fortunate and prosper. The gods did favour Amylius prayers, because he prayed for victory with his by labour no: Sword in his hand, and fighting did call to them for aid. Howbeit there is one Postdonius a Writer, by sloth. who faith he was in that time, and moreover that he was at the Battel : and he hath written an Hiflory containing many Books of the Acts of King Perfeus; where he faith, That it was not for faint heart, nor under colour to facrifice unto Hercules, that Perfeus went from the Battel, but because he had a ftrip of an Horse one the thigh the day before: who though he could not very well help himself, and that all his friends sought to perswade him not to go to the Battel, yet he caused one of his Horses to be brought to him notwithstanding (which he commonly used to ride up and down on) and taking his back, rode into the Battel unarmed, where an infinite number of Darts were thrown at him from both fides. And among those, he had a blow with a Dart that hurt him fomewhat, but it was overthwart, and not with the point, and did hit him on the left fide glancing wife, with fuch a force, that it rent his coat, and rafed his skin underneath, fo as it left a mark behind a long time after: And this is all that Posidonius writeth to defend and excuse Perseus. The Ro-MANS having their hands full, and being staied by the battel of the MACEDONIANS that they satius a Capcould make no breach into them; there was a Captain of the Pelignians called Salius, who tain of the took the Enfign of his Band, and cast it among the prease of his enemies. Then all the Pelignians NIANS fer upon them, with a marvellous force and tury in that place : for all ITALIANS think figurand threw it too great a shame and dishonour for Souldiers to lose or for lake their Ensign. Thus was there it among the marvellous force of both fide used in that place; for the PELIGNIANS proved to cut the MACE- enemies. DONIANS Pikes with their Swords, or elfe to make them give back with their great Targets, or to make a breach into them, and to take their Pikes with their hands. But the MACEDONIANS to the contrary holding their Pikes fast with both hands, ran them through that came near unto them, fo that neither Target nor Corflet could hold out the force and violence of the push of their Pikes, infomuch as they turned up the heels of the Pelignians and Thracians, who like desperate beasts without reason, shutting in themselves among their enemies, ran wilfully upon their own deaths, and their first rank were flain every man of them. Thereupon those that were behind, gave back a little, but fled not turning their backs, and onely retired giving back towards the Mountain Olocrus. Amylius feeing that (as Posidonius writeth) rent his arming coat from his back for anger, because that some of his men gave back : other durst not front the battel of the MACEDONIANS, which was fo strongly imbattelled on every fide and so mured in with a wall of Pikes prefenting their armed heads on every fide a man could come, that it was impossible to break into them, no not so much as come near them onely. Yet notwithstanding, because the field was not altogether plain and even, the battel that was large in the front, could not always keep that wall, continuing their Targets close one to another, but they were driven of necessity to break and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the Souldiers : that in one place they thrust forward, and in another they give back, and leave a hole. Wherefore Amylius suddenly taking the vantage of this occasion, divided his men into small companies, and commanded them they should quickly thrust in between their enemies, and occupy the places they faw void in the front of their enemies, and that they should fet on them in that fort,

in fundry places. Emylius gave this charge unto the private Captains of every Band and their

For they went prefently into those parts where they saw the places open, cute their communities. For they make open, and being once entred in among them, fome gave charge upon the flanks of the MACEDONIANS, where they were all naked and unarmed : other fet upon them behind, fo that the Arength of all the where they were an market sine market in keeping close together) being opened in this fort, was corps of the battel (which conflitted in keeping close together) ftraight overthrown. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or a few against a few, the Macedonians with their little thort Swords, came to strike upon the great Shields of the ROMANS, which were very strong, and covered all their bodies down to the foot. And they ROMANS, WHICH WERE VELY MEDIS, and DOCKER to the blows of the firong heavy fwords of the to the contrary, were driven of necessity to receive the blows of the firong heavy fwords of the ROMANS, upon their light weak Targets, fo that what with their heaviness, and vehement force wherewith the blows lighted upon them, there was no Target nor Corflet, but they paffed it torce wherewith the prows figured apparatually and the no long refiftance, whereupon they through, and ran them in : by reason whereof they could make no long refiftance, whereupon they through, and ran them in : by reason whereon they come make no long reintance, whereupon they turned their backs and ran away. But when they came to the fquadron of the old beaten Souldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelleft fight and most desperate service, where they say of the MACEDONIANS, there was the created again and more despatate service, where they say that Marcin Cato (Son of great Cato, and Son in law of Emyline) shewing all the valunties in his person that a noble mind could possibly perform, lost his Sword which fell out of his ners in his perion that a noor minute come points, periodic, not his several which it out of the hand. But he like a young man of noble courage, that had been valiantly brought up in all discipline, nano. Due the line a young man of mone courage, that had been variantly of origin up in an uncipline, and knew how to follow the fteps of his Father (the nobleft person that ever man faw) was to shew then his valour and worthiness, and thought it more honour for him there to die, then livingto then his valour and worthheirs, and though it more honour for him there to the, then hynge fuffer his enemies to enjoy any spoil of his. So, by and by he ran into the ROMAN Army, to find out some of his friends, whom he told what had befallen him, and prayed them to help him to recover his Sword, whereto they agreed. And being a good company of lufty valiant Souldiers together, they rushed straight among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and so did fer upon them with such force and sury, that they made a lane through the midst of them, and with great flanghter and spilling of bloud, even by plain force, they cleared the way still before them. Now when the place was voided, they fought for the Sword, and in the end found it with great ado, amongst a heap of other Swords and dead bodies, whereat they rejoyced marvellously. Then singing a long of victory, they went again more fiercely then before to give a charge upon their enemies, who were not yet broken afunder: untill fuch time as at the length, the three thousand chosen MACEDONIAN'S fighting valiantly even to the last man, and never for faking their ranks, were all flain in the place. After whose overthrow, there was a great flaughter of other also that fled, so that all the valley and foot of the mountains thereabouts was covered with dead bodies. The next day after the battel, when the Romans did pass over the River Lenem, they found it running all bloudy. For it is faid there were sain at this field of Perseum men above five and twenty thought and of the ROMANS side, as Postdonius saith, not above sixtore; or as Nasica writers, but fourfcore onely. And for so great an overthrow, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done and executed : for they began to fight about three of the clock in the after-noon, and had won the victory before four, and all the reft of the day they followed their enemies in chafe, an hundred and twenty furlongs from the place where the battel was fought, fo that it was very late, and far forth night, before they returned again into the Camp. So fuch as returned, were received with marvellous great joy of their Pages, that went out with Links and Torches lighted, to bring their Masters into their Tents, where their men had made great bonefires, and decked them up with Crowns and Garlands of Laurel, faving the Generals Tent onely; who was very heavy, for that of his two Sons he brought with him to the wars, the younger could not be found, which he loved best of the twain, because he saw he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethren. For even then, being new crept our of the shell as it were, he was marvellous valiant and hardy, and defired honour wonderfully. Now Emyline thought he had been cast away, fearing left for lack of experience in the wars, and through the rathnels of his youth, he had put himself too far in fight amongst the prease of the enemies. Hereupon the Camp heard straight what sorrow Emylius was in, and how grievoully he took it. The ROMANS being fet at supper, rose from their meat, and with Torch-light some ran to Amyline Tent, other went out of the Camp to seek him among the dead bodies, if they might know him : so all the Camp was full of forrow and mourning, the valleys and hills all about did ring again with the cries of those that called Scipio aloud. For even from his childhood he had a natural gift in him, of all the rare and fingular parts required in a Captain and wife Governour of the Commonweal, above all the young nem of his time. At the laft, when they were out of all hope of his coming again, he happily returned from the chafe of his enemies, with two or three of his familiars onely, all bloudied with new bloud (like a fwift running Greyhound fleshed with the bloud of the Hare) having pursued very far for joy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the Cities of CAR-THAGE and Numantium, who was the greatest man of war and valiantest Captain of the Ro-MANS in his time, and of the greatest authority and reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time the execution of her fpite, which she did bear to so noble an exploit, suffered cEmplius for that time, to take his full pleasure of that noble victory. And as for Perfess, he field first from the City of PYDNE, unto the City of Pella, with his horsemen, which were in manner all faved. Whereupon the footmen that faved themselves by flying, meeting them by the way, called them Traitors, Cowards, and Villains, and worfe then that, they turned them off their Horsebacks, and fought it out luftily with them. Perfem feeing that, and fearing left this mutiny might turn to light on his neck, he turned his horse out of the High-way, and pulled off his Purple coat, and carried it before him, and took his Diadem in his hand, fearing to be known thereby, and that he might the more eafily speak with his friends by the way, he lighted on foot, and led his Horse in his hand. But fuch as were about him, one made as though he would mend the latcher of his shoe, another feemed to water his Horse, another as though he would drink; fo that one dragging after another in this fort, they all left him at the laft, and ran their way, not fearing the enemies fury fo much as their Kings cruelty: who being grieved with his misfortune, fought to lay the fault of the overthrow upon all other but himself. Now he being come into the City of Pella by night, Eucline and Eu- Time and dudam, two of his Treasurers came unto him, and speaking boldly (but out of time) presumed to tell ty to be obserhim the great fault he had committed, and to counfell him what he should do. The King was so mo-ved to the ved with their prefumption, that with his own hands he stabled his Dagger in them both, and slew Death, the inthem out right. But after this fact, all his fervants and friends refused him, and there onely tarried dignation of with him but Evander CRETAN, Archedamus ETOLIAN, and Neo BOEOTIAN. And as for the Prince. the mean Souldiers, there were none that followed him but the CRETANS, and yet it was not for The coverousthe good will they did bear him, but for the love of his gold and filver, as Bees that keep their nefs of the hives for love of the Honey : for he carried with him a great Treasure, and gave them leave to spoil certain Plate and veffels of gold and filver, to the value of fifty Talents. But first of all when he was come into the City of AMPHIPOLIS, and afterwards into the City of ALEPSE, and that the fear was well blown over, he returned again to his old humour which was born and bred with him, and that was avarice and mifery: for he complained unto those that were about him, that he Mifers whine had unwares given to the Souldiers of CRETA, his Plate and veffel of gold to be spoiled, being for their goods those which in old time belonged unto Alexander the Great : and prayed them with tears in his eves that had the Plate, they would be contented to change it for ready Money. Now fuch as knew his nature, found ftraight this was but a fraud and a CRETAN lie, to deceive the CRETANS with: but those that trusted him, and did restore again the Plate they had, did lose it every jot, for he never payed them peny for it. So he got of his friends the value of thirty Talents, which his enemies foon after did take from him. And with that fum he went into the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, where he took the fanctuary and priviledge of the Temple of Castor and Pollux. They say, that the MACEDONIANS of long continuance did naturally love their Kings: but then feeing all their hope and expectation broken, their hearts failed them, and broke withall. For they came and fubmit. The Macedoted themselves to Amyliu, and made him Lord of the whole Realm of MACEDON, in two days: nians submit themselves to and this doth feem to confirm their words, who impute all Amylism doings unto his good fortune. Amylism And furely, the marvellous fortune he happened on in the City AMPHIPOLIS, doth confirm it much, which a man cannot afcribe otherwise, but to the speciall grace of the gods. For one day beginning to do facrifice, lightning fell from Heaven, and fet all the wood on fire upon the Altar, and fanctified the facrifice. But yet the miracle of his tame is more to be wondred at. For four daies after Wonders, Perfess had loft the battell, and that the City of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the Lifts or shew-place, seeing Horses run for Games : suddenly there arose a rumour at the en- News brought tring into the Lifts where the Games were, that Anylim had won a great battel of King Per- to Rome out of fem, and had conquered all MACEDON. This news was rife straight in every mans mouth, and four days, of there followed upon it a marvellous joy and great cheer in every corner, with shouts and clapping Emplies viof hands, that continued all the day through the City of ROME. Afterwards they made diligent en- cory there: quiry, how this rumour first came up, but no certain authour could be known, and every man faid and no man they heard it spoken: so as in the end it came to nothing, and passed away in that sort for a time. knew t But shortly after, there came Letters, and certain news, that made them wonder more then before, from whence the meffenger came that reported the first news of it, which could be devised by no naturall means, and yet proved true afterwards. We do read also of a battel that was fought in ITALY, near unto the River of SAGRA, whereof news was brought the very fame day unto PE-LOPONNESUS. And of another also in like manner that was fought in ASIA against the MEDES, before the City of MYCALA: the news whereof came the fame day unto the Campof the GRE-CIANS, lying before the City of PLATOES. And in that great journey where the ROMANS overthrew the Tarquins, and the Army of the LATINES : immediately after the battel was won, they faw two goodly young men come newly from the Camp, who brought news of the victory to ROME, and they judged they were Caftor and Pollux. The first man that spake to them in the marketplace before the fountain, where they watered their Horses being all of a white foam, told them, that he wondered how they could so quickly bring these news. And they laughing came to him, and took him foftly by the beard with both their hands, and even in the market-place his hair being black before, was prefently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeve the report the man made, who ever after was called Another bus, as you would fay, bearded as yellow as gold. Another like mat- Another bus ter that happened in our time maketh all such news credible : For when Antonius rebelled against the why so called. Emperour Domitian, the City of Rome was in a marvellous perplexity, because they looked for great wars towards GERMANIE. But in this fear there grew a fudden rumour of victory, and it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius himself was slain, and all his Army overthrown, and not a man left alive. This rumour was fo rife, that many of the chiefest men of ROME beleeved ir, and did facrifice thereupon unto their gods, giving them thanks for the victory. But when the matter came to fifting, who was the first authour of the rumour, no man could tell : for one put it they could never boult out any certain ground of it: but even as it came flying into Rome, so went it flying away again, no man could tell how. Notwithstanding Domitian holding on his journey to make this War, met with Pofts that brought him Letters of the certain victory: and remembring the rumour of the victory that ran before in ROME, he found it true, that it was on the very fame day the victory was gotten; and the diffance between ROME and the place where the field was won, was above twenty thousand furlongs off. Every man in our time knoweth this to be true. But again to our History. Cn. Ollavim, Lieutenant of the Army of Amylim by sea, came to anker under to our rintory. Ln. Yet he had secretly practised ne was, for the reverence in an orange min in or flie by fea out of the Island. Yet he had fecretly practifed fuch fort, as he could not scape him, nor flie by fea out of the Island. with one Oreander a Cretan, that had a Brigantine, and was at a price with him for a lum of Mowill one Uroanut; a CRE LAN, man was a replacement of a minor Money to convey him away by night: But the CRETAN ferved him a right CRETANS trick: For ney to convey min away by night into his veffel, all the Kings treasure of gold and filver, he sent when he had taken a sound of the next night following to come into the Peer by the Temple of Ceres, with his Wife, his Children and Servants, where indeed was no possibility to take shipping; but the next night following he hoifed fail, and got him away. It was a pitifull thing that Perfeus was driven to do and fuffer at that time. For he came down in the night by ropes, out of a little ftraight window upon the walls, and not onely himself, but his Wife and little babes, who never knew before what flying and hardness meant. And yet he fetched a more grievous bitter figh, when one told him on the Peer, that he saw Organdes the CRETAN under sail in the main seas. Then day beginning to break, and feeing himfelf void of all hope, he ran with his Wife for life to the wall, to recover the fanctuary again, before the ROMANS that faw him could overtake him. And as for his Children, he had given them himfelf into the hands of one lon, whom before he had marvelloully loved, and who did then traiteroully betray him: for he delivered his Children unto the ROMANS. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that drave him (as a beast that will follow her little ones being taken from her) to yeeld himself into their hands that had his Children. Now he had a special confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld himself: but it was answered him, that he was not there. Then he began to lament his hard and milerable fortune every way. And in the end, confidering how necessity enforced him, he yielded himself into the hands of Cnem Oftwine; wherein he shewed plainly, that he had another vice in him more unmanly and vile, then avarice; that was, a faint heart, and fear to die. But hereby he deprived himfelf of others pity and compassion towards him, being that onely thing which fortune cannot deny and take from the afflicted, and specially from them that have a noble heart. For he made requeft they would bring him unto the General Amyliu, who role from his chair when he faw him come, and went to meet him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meet a great King, by fortune of war and by the will of the gods, fallen into that most lamentable state. But he to the contrary, unmanly, and shamefully behaved limitelf. For he fell down at his seer, and embraced his knees, and uttered such uncomely speech and vile requests, as Amylius self could not abide to hear them : but knitting his browes against him , being heartily offended , he spake thus unto him "Alas poor man, Why doft thou discharge fortune of this fault, where thou mightest "juftly charge and accuse her of thy discharge, doing things, for the which every one judgeth thou "half deferred thy prefent mifery, and art unworthy also of thy former honour? Why doft thou defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing thy self so base a man, as my "honour is not great to overcome to unworthy an enemy? The ROMANS have ever efteemed "magnanimity, even in their greatest enemies ; but dastardlines, though it be fortunate, yet it is "hated of every body. Norwithstanding, he took him up; and taking him by the hand, gave him into the cultody of Alim Tubero. Then Amylim went into his Tent; and carried his Sons and Sons in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the younger fort. And being set down, he continued a great space very pensive with himself, not speaking a word; infomuch that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end be began to enter into discourse and talk of fortune, and the unconflancy of these worldly things, and said unto them: "Is there any man "living, my friends, who having fortune at will, should therefore boast and glory in the prosperity "of his doings, for that he had conquered a Countrey, City or Realm: and not rather to fear the "unconstancy of fortune? who laying before our eyes, and all those that profess arms at this pre-"fent, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainly teach us to think, that "there is nothing conftant or perdurable in this world. For when is it that men may think them-" selves affured, considering that when they have overcome others, then are they driven to mistrust "fortune most, and to mingle fear and mistrust, with joy of victory: if they will wisely consider the "common course of fatall destiny that altereth daily, sometime favouring one, otherwhile throwing "down another? You see, that in an hours space we have trodden under our feet the house of " Mexander the Great: who hath been the mightest and most redoubted Prince of the world. You "fee a King that not long fince was followed and accompanied, with many thousand Souldiers of "Horfemen and Footmen, brought at this prefent into such miterable extremity, that he is inforced "to receive his meat and drink daily at the hands of his enemies. Should we have any better hope "then, that Fortune will always favour our doings, more then the doth now his at this prefent? "no out of doubt. Therefore digefting this matter well, you young men I say, be not too brag nor " roolish proud of this conquest and noble victory; but think what may happen hereafter, marking to what end fortune will turn the envy of this our present prosperity. Such were Anylius words to these young men as it is reported, bridling by these and such like perswasions, the lustv bravery of this youth, even as with the bit and bridle of reason. Afterwards he put his Army into Amylius hogarilons to refresh them; and went himself in person in the mean time to visit GREECE, ma- nourable proking it an honourable progress, and also a commendable. For as he passed through the Cities, he gress in Greece relieved the people, reformed the government of their State, and ever gave them fome gift or prefent. Unto some he gave Corn, which King Persen had gathered for the Wars : and unto other he gave Oyls, meeting with fo great store of provision, that he rather lacked people to give it unto. to receive it at his hands, then wanting to give, there was fo much. As he paffed by the City of Del-PHOS, he faw there a great Pillar, four fquare, of white ftone, which they had fet up, to put King Perfess image of gold upon it. Whereupon he commanded them to fet up his in that place, faying: It was reason the conquered should give place unto the Conquerours. And being in the City of OLYMPIA, visiting the Temple of Jupiter Olympia, he spake this openly, which ever since hath been remembred: that Phidias had rightly made Jupiter, as Homer had described him. Afterwards when the ten Ambassadours were arrived that were sent from ROME to establish with him the Realm of MACEDON, he redelivered the MACEDONIANS their Countrey and Towns again, to live Employ fetat liberty, according to their Laws, paying yearly to the ROMANS for Tribute, a hundred Ta-teth Macedon lents : where before they were wont to pay unto their Kings ten times as much. And he made Plays at a flay. and Games of all forts, and did celebrate fumptuous Sacrifices unto the gods. He kept open Court to all comers, and made noble Feafts, and defrayed the whole charge thereof, with the Treasure King Perfess had gathered together, sparing for no cost. But through his care and foresight, there was a speciall good order taken, every man so courteously received and welcomed, and so orderly marshalled at the Table according to their estate and calling, that the GRECIAN'S wondred to see him so carefull in matters of sport and pleasure: and that he took as great pains in his own person. to fee that fmall matters should be ordered as they ought, as he took regard for discharge of more weighty causes. But this was a marvellous pleasure to him, to see that among such sumptuous sights prepared to shew pleasure to the persons invited, no sight nor stately shew did so delight them, as to enjoy the fight and company of his person. So he told them, that seemed to wonder at his diligence and care in these matters : that to order a feast well , required as great judgement and discretion , as Emplius to feta battel : to make the one fearfull to the enemies, and the other acceptable to his friends, words about But men esteemed his bounty and magnanimity for his best vertue and quality. For he did not onely the care and refuse to see the Kings wonderfull treasure of Gold and Silver, but caused it to be told and delivered good order at to the custody of the Treasurers, to carry to the coffers of store in Rome : and onely suffered his . Emvisive Sons that were learned, to take the Books of the Kings Library. When he did reward the Soul- abstinence: diers for their valiant service in this battel, he gave his Son in law Alina Tubero a Cup, weighing five Talents. It is the fame Tubero we told you of before, who lived with fixteen other of his Kin all in one house, and of the onely revenue they had of a little Farm in the Countrey. Some say, that that Cup was the first piece of Plate that ever came into the house of the Alyans; and yet it came for honour and reward of vertue: but before that time, neither themselves, nor their Wives, would ever have, or wear any Gold or Silver. After he had very well ordered and disposed all things, at the last he took leave of the GRECIANS, and counselled the MACEDONIANS to remember the liberty the ROMANS had given them, and that they should be carefull to keep it, by their good government and concord together. Then he departed from them, and took his journey towards the Countrey of EPYRUS, having received Committion from the Senate of ROME, to fuffer his Souldiers who had done fervice in the Battel, and overthrow of King Perfess, to spoil all the Cities of that Countrey. Wherefore that he might surprise them on a sudden, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the Cities that they should send him by a certain day, ten of the chiefest men of every City. Who when they were come, he commanded them to go and bring him by fuch a day, all the Gold and Silver they had within their Cities, as well in their private houfes, as in their Temples and Churches, and gave unto every one of them a Captain and Garifon with them, as if it had been onely to have received and fearched for the Gold and Silver he demanded. But when the day appointed was come, the Souldiers in divers places (and all at one time) Æmylius cruel fer upon their enemies, and did rifle and spoil them of that they had, and made them also pay ran- act in spoiling fom every man : fo as by this policy, they were taken and made flaves in one day, a hundred and of Epiria. fifty thousand persons, and threescore and ten Cities spoiled and sacked every one; and yet when they came to divide the spoil of this generall destruction of a whole Realm by the poll, it came not to every Souldiers part, above eleven filver Drachmes apiece : Which made every one to wonder greatly, and to fear also the terrour of the Wars, to see the wealth and riches of so great a Realm. to mount to so little for every mans share. When Amylius had done this fact against his own Amylius took nature, which was very gentle and courteous, he went unto the lea fide to the City of ORICA, and fhip at the Cithere embarked with his Army bound for IT ALY. Where when he was arrived, he went up the ty of Orca, and River of Tyber against the stream, in King Perseu chief Galley, which had fixteen oars on a returned into fide, richly fet out with the Armour of the Prisoners, rich clothes of purple colour, and other such Italy. spoils of the Enemies: so that the ROMANS running out of ROME in multitudes of people to fee his Galley, and going fide by fide by her as they rowed foftly, Anyling took as great pleafure in it, as in any open Games or Feafts, or Triumph that had been shewed indeed. But when the Soul-

Nevertheless they durft not speak it openly, but did accuse him, that he had been too straight unto them in this war: and therefore they did they no great defire nor forwardness, to procure him the honour of Triumph. Which Serving Galba understanding, that had been an old enemy of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a Servin Galba thousand men under him in this War: he like an envious viper told the people, that Envlim had not deferved the honour of Triumph, and fowed feditious words against him among the Souldiers, to aggravate their ill will the more against him. Moreover he craved a day of the Tribunes of the to aggravate their in win the mote against than anoteoned the travel away or the resources of the people, to have respit to bring forth such matters as they determined to object against him: saying, people, to nave reign to oring total had made a same acteriance to object against min; laying, the time then was far spent, the Sun being but four hours high, and that it would require longer time and leisure. The Tribunes made him answer, that he should speak then what he had to fay against him, or otherwise they would not grant him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long Oration in his dispraise, full of railing words, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing Oration. Afterwards when night came on , the Tribunes brake up the Affembly , and the next morning the Souldiers being encouraged by Galba's Oration, and having confedered together, did. flock about Galbs in the mount of the Capitol, where the Tribunes had given warning they would keep their affembly. Now being broad day, Amylius Triumph was referred to the most number of voices of the people, and the first Tribe flatly did deny his Triumph. The Senate, and the residue of the people hearing that, were very forry to fee they did Amyliss fo open wrong and injury. of the people maning man, which is, but feemed to be very forry, howbeit they fought no redress. The Lords of the Senate cried out upon them, and faid, it was too much shame; and exhorted one another to bridle the infolency and boldness of those Souldiers, who would grow in the end to such another to british the importance and commit all mischief and wickedness, if betimes they were not looked to and prevented, feeing they did fo openly stand against their General, feeking to deprive tooked to and prevented, recting they and to openly mand against their Octional, recking to deprive him of the honour of his Triumph and Victory. So they affembled a good company of them together, and went up to the Capitol, and prayed the Tribunes they would fray to take the voices of the people, untill they had acquainted them with fuch needfull matter as they had to open unto them, The Tribunes granted to it, and filence was made. There Marcus Servilius, who had been Conful, and had fought three and twenty combats of life and death in his own parfon, and had always flain and not rought three and twenty standard him man for man; role up, and foake in favour of Amylina as many of his enemies as challenged him man for man; in this matter: "I know now (faid he) better then before, how noble and worthy a Captain " Paulus Amylius is, who hath archieved such glory and honourable victory, with so dishonou-"rable and disobedient Souldiers. And I can but wonder that the people not long fince rejoyced and "made great account of the Victories and Triumphs won upon the ILLYRIANS and other Nations " of A FRICK and that now they should for spite envy his glory! "home, and doth deliver you most assured victory, you do frustrate the Gods most solemn thanks "and honour due to them, and do deprive your felves also of your wonted glory in such a case : as if "you were afraid to fee the greatnels of your prosperity, or that you meant to pardon a King, your "llave and prisoner. And yet of the two, you have more reason to binder the Triumph, as pittying the "King, then envying your Captain. But the malice of the wicked, through your patience is grown "to fuch an infolent audacity and boldness, that we see men present here before us, which never went "from the smoke of the chimney, nor carried away any blows in the field, being crammed at "home like Women and house-Doves; and yet they are so impudent and shameless, as they dare "prefume unreverently to your faces, to prate of the office and duty of a General of an Army, and of the defert of Triumph, before you I fay, who by experience of many a fore cur and wound upon "your bodies in the Wars, have learned to know a good and valiant. Captain, from a vile and "cowardly person. And speaking these words, he cast open his Gown, and shewed before them all the infinite fears and cutshe had received upon his breaft: and then turning him behind, shewed all fuch places as were not fit to be feen openly, and fo turned himself again to: Galba, and faid unto him : "Thou mockeft me for that I shew thee : but I rejoyce before my Countreymen and "Citizens, that for ferving my Countrey night and day on horse-back, I have these wounds upon "me which thou feeft. Now get thee about thy bufiness and receive their voices; and I will come "after, noting them that are naughty and unthankfull Cirizens, who like to be foothed with flattery, "and not flourly commanded, as behoved a General in the War. These words so reined the hardheaded Souldiers with the curb of reason, that all the other Tribes agreed in one; and granted *Emplise Triumph: the order and folemnity whereof was performed in this fort. First, the people having fetup fundry scaffolds, as well in the Lists and field called Circos by the LATINS, where the Games and common running of Horses and Chariots are made, as also about the market-place, A notable deand in other streets of the City, in the which the shew of the Triumph should pass: they all prefcription of fented themselves in their best Gowns to see the magnificence and state thereof. All the Temples Emylius of the gods also were set wide open, hanged full of Garlands of Flowers, and all perfumed within: Triumph. and there were fet through all the quarters of the City, numbers of Sergeants and other Officers holding Tipstaves in their hands to order the stragling people, and to keep them up in corners and Lanes ends, that they should not pefter the Streets, and hinder the Triumph. Furthermore the fight of this Triumph was to continue three days, whereof the first was scant sufficient to see the passing by of the Images, Tables, Pictures, and Statues of wonderfull bigness, all won and gotten of their Enemies, and drawn in the shew upon two hundred and fifty Chariots. The second day, there was carried upon a number of Carts, all the fairest and richest Armour of the MACEDONIANS, as well of Copper, as also of Iron and Steel, all glistring bright, being newly surbushed, and artificially laid in order (and yet in fuch fort, as if they had been cast in heaps one upon another, without taking any care otherwise for the ordering and laying of them) fair Burganets upon Targets : Habergious, or Brigantines and Corflets, upon Graves: round Targets of the CRETANS, and Javelins of the THRACIANS, and Arrows amongst the armed Pikes: all this Armour and carriage, being bound one to another fo trimly (neither being too loofe, nor too ftraight) that one hitting against another, as they drew them upon the Carts through the City, they made fuch a found and noise, as it was fearfull to hear it : fo that the onely fight of these spoils of the captives being overcome, made the fight fo much more terrible to behold : after these Carts loden with Armour , there followed three thousand Men, which carried the ready Money in seven hundred and fifty Veffels, which weighed about three Talents apiece, and every one of them were carried by four men : and there were other that carried great Bolls of Silver, Cups and Goblets fashioned like pitchers, and other Potsto drink in , goodly to behold , as well for their bigness , as for their great and singular imbossed works about them. The third day early in the morning the Trumpets began to found and fet forwards, founding no march nor sweet note, to beautifie the Triumph withall : but they blew out the brave alarum, the found at an affault, to give the Souldiers courage for to fight. After them followed fixicore goodly fat Oxen, having all their horns gilt, and Garlands of Flowers and Nosegaies about their heads, and there went by them certain young men, with aprons of needle-work, girt about their middle, who led them to the Sacrifice, and young boys with them also, that carried goodly Basons of Gold and Silver, to cast and sprinkle the bloud of the Sacrifice about. And after these, followed those that carried all Coyns of Gold divided by Basons and Vessels, and every one of them weighing three Talents, as they did before, that carried the great holy Cup, which Emylius had caused to be made of massie Gold, set full of precious Stones, weighing the weight of ten Talents, to make an Offering unto the gods. And next unto them went other that carried Plate, made and wrought after antick fashion, and notable Cups of the ancient Kings of MACEDON: as the Cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and to be short, all the whole cubboord of Plate of Gold and Silver of King Perseus. And next them came the Chariot of his Armour, in the which was all King Perfeus harnels, and his royall Band (they call a Diadem) upon his Armour. And a little space between them, followed next the Perfeus Chil-Kings Children, whom they led Prisoners, with the train of their School-masters and other Officers, dren. and their fervants, weeping and lamenting: who held up their hands to the people that looked upon them, and taught the Kings young Children to do the like, to ask mercy and grace at the peoples hands. There were three pretty little Children, two Sons and a Daughter amongst them, whose tender years and lack of understanding, made them (poor fouls) they could not feel their present misery, which made the people so much the more to pity them, when they saw the poor little infants, that knew not the change of their fortune : so that for the compassion they had of them, they almost let the Father pass without looking upon him. Many peoples hearts did melt for very pity, that the tears ran down their cheeks, fo as this fight brought both pleasure and forrow together to the lookers on, untill they were past and gone a good way out of fighr. King Perseus the Father, followed after his King Perseus. Children and their train, and he was cloathed in a black Gown, wearing a pair of Slippers on his feet after his countrey manner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled mind, opprest with forrow of his most misferable state and fortune. He was followed with his Kinsfolks, his familiar friends, his Officers and houshold fervants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamenting tears, and forrowfull eyes cast upon their unfortunate Master, how much they forrowed and bewailed his most hard and cruel fortune, little accounting of their own misery. The voice goeth, that Perfeus fent unto Amylius to intreat him, that he should not be led through Amylius the City in the shew and fight of the Triumph. But Amylius mocking (as he deserved) his cowardly scorneth Pcrfaint heart, answered: As for that, it was before, and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let fens cowardhim understand thereby, that he might rather chuse to die, then living to receive such open Thame. Howbeit his heart would not ferve him, he was fo cowardly, and made fo effeminate, by a certain vain hope he knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his own spoils. After all this, there followed four hundred princely Crowns of Gold, which the Cities and Towns of GREECE had purposely sent by their Ambassadours unto Amylius, to honour his Victory : and Crowns of next unto them, he came himself in his Chariot triumphing, which was passing sumptuously set forth Gold centures and adorned. It was a noble sight to behold: and yet the person of himself onely was worth the Emplies by looking on, without all that great pomp and magnificence. For he was apparelled in a purple Gown the Cities of branched with gold, and carried in his right hand a Laurel bough, as all his Army did besides : the Greece. which being divided by Bands and Companies, followed the triumphing Chariot of their Captain, some of the Souldiers singing Songs of Victory, which the ROMANS use to sing in like Triumphs, mingling them with merry pleasant toys, rejoycing at their Captain. Other of them also did sing Songs of Triumph, in the honour and praise of Amylius noble Conquest and Victory. He was openly praised, bleffed and honoured of every body, and neither hated nor envied of honest men:

When this forrowfull chance had befallen him, every one in ROME did pity him in their of age. bearts: but fortunes spine and cruelty did more grieve and fear them, to see her little regard towards him, to put into a house of Triumph (full of honour and glory, and of facrifices and joy) such a pitifull mourning, and mingling of forrows and lamentations of death, amongst such Songs of Tria punum mountains. Notwithstanding this, Amylins taking things like a wife man, thought that he umpn and victory. Procuming and magnanimity, againft the Sword and Pike of the enemy: but alike was not onerly to the commancy and magnituding, against the order and the or the circum; but alike also against all adversity and enmity of spiteful fortune. So he wisely weighed and considered his arro against an automy and an arrow in a single frequency and finding his misfortune counterpoiled with felicity, and his private griefs cut off with common joy, he gave no place to his forrows and mischancny, and its private grains and an arrangement page in the fraction in the first success, neither blemifted any way the dignity of his Triumph and victory. For when he had buried the eldeft of his two last Sons, he left not to make his triumphant entry, as you have heard before. And his fecond Son also being deceased after his Triumph, he caused the people to affemble, and in face of the whole City he made an Oration, not like a discomfitted man, but like one rather that did comfort his forrowfull Countreymen for his mifchance. He told them, "That concerning mens matrore ins fortowall Countrymen to the author things above, he ever feared Fortune, midtruffing her "ters, never any thing did fear him: but for things above, he ever feared Fortune, midtruffing her "change and inconftancy, and specially in the last War, doubting for so great prosperity as could the country of the country "be wished, to be payed home with an after intollerable adversity and finisher chance. For as I went trouble for the "(faid he) I paffed over the gulf of the Adriatick Sea, from BRINDES unto CORFU in one "day : and from thence in five days after, I arrived in the City of DELPHOS, where I did facrifice "any: and from the transfer of the fame, "and the fame, "and the fame, "and the fame, "and the fame, "Mackdon. And after I had done the Sacrifice, and due Ceremonies for purifying of the fame, "Mackdon. "I prefently began to follow the purpose and cause of my coming; so as in sitteen days after I "made an honourable end of all those Wars. But yet, mistrusting Fortune always, seeing the "prosperous course of my affairs, and considering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers I receded to fear: I feared forely fhe would change at my return, when I should be upon the Sea, "bringing home to goodly and victorious an Army, with to many spoils, and to many Princes and "Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was faiely arrived in the Haven, and seeing all the City at "my return full of joy, and of feafts and Sacrifices, I still suspected Forume, knowing the manner "well enough, that the useth not to gratifie men so franckly, nor to grant them so great things clear-"ly, without fome certain spark of envy waiting on them. Neither did my mind being ftill occu-"pied in fear of some thing to happen to the Commonwealth, shake off this fear behind me : but "that I faw this home-milhap and mifery lighted upon me, enforcing me with mine own hands in "these holy days of my Triumph, to bury my two young Sons one after another, which I onely "brought up with me, for the succession of my Name and house. Wherefore me thinks now I may "fay, I am out of all danger, at the leaft touching my chiefeft and greatest missortune; and do begin to "flablish my self with this affured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remain with is "evermore, without fear of other unlucky or finister chance. For the hath sufficiently countervailed "the favourable Victory she gave you, with the envious milhap wherewith she hath plagued both me "and mine: shewing the Conquerer and Triumpher, as noble an example of mans milery and weak-"ness, as the party conquered, that had been led in Triumph: laving that Perfess yet conquered as "he is, hath this comfort left him, to fee his Children living, and that the Conquerour Amylim hath "loft his. And this was the fum of Emylism noble Oration he made unto the people of ROME, proceeding of a noble and honourable disposed mind. And though it pitied him in his heart to see the strange chance of King Perseus fortune, and that he heartily desired to help him, and to do him good : yet be could never obtain other grace for him, but onely to remove him from the common prison (which the ROMANS call Career) into a more cleanly and sweeter house: where being ftraightly guarded and looked unto, he killed himself by abstinence from mear, as the most part of Historiographers do write. Yet some Writers tell a marvellous strange rale, and manner of his death. A strange kind For they fay the Souldiers that guarded him, kept him from sleep, watching him streightly when fleep took him, and would not fuffer him to flut his eye-lids onely (upon malice they did bear him, because they could not otherwise hurt him) keeping him awake by sorce, not suffering him to take reft: untill such time as nature being forced to give over, he gave up the ghost. Two of his Sons died also: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent Turner and Joyner, and was learned, and could speak the ROMAN tongue very well, and did write it so trimly, that afterwas realized, and could plean the Acoust rougher very wen, and did wifely and differently behave himfelf wards he was Chancellour to the Magistrates of ROME, and did wifely and differently behave himfelf in his Office. Furthermore they do add to this goodly conquert of the Realm of MACEDON, in his Conference and the that Anyliss conquered another special good thing, that made him marvellously well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought so much Gold and Silver unto the Treasury store of ROM, lowed with men of fmall quality and base condition, that had been Slaves before, but otherwise could skilially handle fuch practifes, bring the People together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voyces (if need were) obtain what they would in the Affemblies of the City : he spake out aloud, and said : O Paulus Amilius, now haft thou good cause to fight and mourn in thy grave where thou lieft (if the dead do know what we do here on Earth Jin 100 Amylim a common Serjeant, and Licinim a pratling Fellow, how they bring thy Son unro the Dignity of a Cenfor. And as for Scipio, he was always beloved of the common People, because he did favour them in all things. But Anylius also, although he took ever the Noblement part, he was not therefore the less beloved of the common People then those that always flattered them; doing all things as the People would, to please them: which the common People did witness, as well by other Honours and Offices they offered him, as in the Dignity of the Cenfor which they gave him. For it was the holieft Office of all other at that Amplius chotime, and of greatest Power and Authority, specially for inquiry and reformation of every mans life fen Cenfor. and manners. For he that was Cenfor, had Authority to put any Senator off the Council, and fo The Office degrade him, if he did not worthily behave himfelf according to his Place and Calling; and might and authority. name and declare any one of the Senate, whom he thought to be most honest, and fittest for the of the Cenfor. place again. Moreover, they might by their Authority, take from licentious young men, their Horse which was kept at the charge of the Common-weal. Furthermore, they be the Sessions of the People, and the Muster-masters, keeping Books of the number of persons at every mustering. So there appeared numbred in the Register-book Emylius made then of them, three hundred seven and thirty thousand , four hundred and two and fifty men , and Marcus Emylius Lepidas named Prefident of the Senate, who had that honour four times before, and did put off the Council three Senators that were but mean men. And the like mean and moderation he and his companion Marti-26 Philippus kept, upon view and Muster taken of the ROMAN Horsmen. And after he had ordered and disposed the greatest matters of his Charge and Office, he fell fick of a Disease that at the Amyllus fickbeginning feemed very dangerous, but in the end there was no other danger, faving that it was a lin- nefs. gring Difease, and hard to cure. So, following the counsell of Physicians, who willed him to go to a City in ITALY called VELIA, he took Sea and went thither, and continued there a long time, Emyliasredwelling in pleasant houses upon the Sea side, quietly and out of all noise. But during this time of his moved from Rome, and absence, the ROMANS wished for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered to dwelt in the gether in the Theaters, to fee the Playes and Sports, they cried out divers times for him: whereby City of Pelis, they shewed that they had a great defire to see him again. Time being come about, when they used to make a folemn yearly Sacrifice, and Amylius finding himself also in very good perfect health: he returned again to ROME, where he made Sacrifice with the other Priefts, all the People of ROME gathered about him, rejoycing much to fee him. The next day after, he made another particular Sacrifice, to give thanks unto the gods for recovery of hishealth. After the Sacrifice was ended, he went home to his house, and sate him down to dinner; he suddenly fell into a raving (without any The death of perseverance of sickness spied in him before, or any change or alteration in him) and his wits went Amylius in from him, in fuch fort, that he died within three days after, lacking no necessary thing that an earthly Rome. man could have, to make him happy in this World. For he was even honoured at his Funerals, and Amylius Fuhis vertue was adorned with many goodly glorious Ornaments, neither of Gold, Silver, nor Ivory, nerals, nor with other fuch fumptuousness or magnificence of Apparell, but with the love and good will of the People, all of them confessing his vertue and well-doing : and this did not onely his naturall Countreymen perform in memory of him, but his very Enemies also. For all those that met in ROME by chance at that time, that were either come out of Spain, from Genua, or out of Macedon, all those that were young and strong, did willingly put themselves under the Cossin where his Body lay, to help to carry him: and the old men followed his Body to accompany the fame, calling Amylim the Benefactor, Saviour, and Father of their Countrey. For he did not onely intreat them gently, and graciously, whom he had subdued : but all his life time he was ever ready to pleasure them : and to fet forwards their Caufes, even as they had been his Confederates, very Friends, and near Kinsmen. THE LIFE OF TIMOLEO N.

Ann. Mund. 3607.

The flate of the Syracufians before Timoleens coming.

Efore Timoleon was fent into SICILE, thus flood the ftate of the SYRAcustans. After that Dios had driven out the Tyrant Diosifius, he himself after was slain immediately by Treason; and those that aided him to reftore the SYRACUSIANS to their liberty, fell out, and were at diffention among themselves. By reason whereof, the City of Syracu-SA changing continually new Tyrants, was fo troubled and turmoyled with all forts of evils, that it was left in manner defolate, and without inhabitants. The rest of SICILE in like case was utterly destroyed, and no Cities in manner left standing, by reason of the long Wars; and those few that remained, were most inhabited of forraign Souldiers and stranfew that remained, were most inhabited of forraign Souldiers and stranfew that remained, gers (a company of loofe men gathered together that took pay of no Prince nor City) all the Dominion of the long things and the look pay of no Prince nor City). gers (a company or none men gamerea together mat took pay of no remee not City) and the fame being eafily usurped, and as easile to change their Lord. Informed, Dionysian the Tyrant, ten years after Dim had driven him out of SICILE, having gathered a certain number of Souldiers together again, and through their help driven out Nifem, that reigned at that time in SURRELES EDUCATE again, and unrough their neith university. The recovered the Realm again, and made himself King. So, if he was strangely surreless to feel again. expuled by a small power out of the greatest Kingdom that ever was in the World . likewish more firangely recovered it again, being banished and very poor, making himself King over them, who before had driven him out.

Thus were the Inhabitants of the City compelled to serve this Iyrant; who befides that of his own nature was neither courteous nor civill, he was now grown to be far more dogged and cruell, by reafon of the extream milery and misfortune he had indured. Letter, Tyrant But the nobleft Citizens repaired unto Icetes, who at that time as Lord ruled the City of the Leonic of the Icetes, Tyrant But the nobleft Citizens repaired unto Icetes, who at that time as Lord ruled the City of the Leonic of the Icetes, and the Icetes of the Icetes TINES, and they chose him for their Generall in these Wars: not for that he was any thing better then the open Tyrants, but because they had no other to repair unto at that time: and they trusted him best, for that he was born (as themselves) within the City of SYRACUSA, and because of the head man of the search had again the Toronto of the head man of the search had again the Toronto of the head man of the search had again to the trust of the head man of the search had again to the trust of the search had again to the search had aga cause also he had men of War about him, to make head against the Tyrant. But in the meantine, the CARTHAGINIANS came down into SICILE with a great Army, and invaded the Contrey. The SYRACUSIANS being afraid of them, determined to fend Ambaffadours into GREECE unto the CORINTHIANS, to pray aid of them against the barbarous People, having better hope of them, then of any other of the GRECIANS. And that not altogether because they were line ally defeended from them, and that they had received in times paft many pleasures at their hands: but also for that they knew that CORINTH was a City, that in all ages and times did ever love Lines of Vines. berry and hate Tyrants, and that had always made their greateft Wars, not for ambition of Kingdoms, nor of coverous defires to conquer and rule, but onely to defend and maintain the Life berry of the GRECIANS. But Icetes in another contrary fort, took upon him to be General, with a mind to make himself King of SYRACUSA. For he had secretly practifed with the CAR-THAGINIANS, and openly norwithflanding, in words he commended the counfell and determination of the SYRACUSIANS, and fent Ambaffadours from himfelf also with theirs, unto PELO-PONNESUS: not that he was defirous any aid should come from them to SYRACUSA, but because he hoped if the CORINTHIAN'S refused to fend them aid (as it was very likely they would for the Wars and troubles that were in GREECE) that he might more casily turn all over to the CARTHAGINIANS, and use them as his friends, to aid him aginst the SYRAC U SIANS. Or the Tyrant Diony fime. And that this was his full purpole and intent, it appeared plainly foon after. Now when their Ambaffadours arrived at CORINTH, and had delivered their Meffage, the CORINTHI-ANS, who had ever been carefull to defend such Cities as had fought unto them, and specially SY-RACUSA: very willingly determined in Council to fend them aid, and the rather for that they werein good peace at that time, having Wars with none of the GRECIANS. So their onely ftay refted upon choosing of a Generall to lead their Army. Now as the Magistrates and Governours of the City were naming such Citizens, as willingly offered their service, defirous to advance themselves, there stept up a mean Commoner who named Timoleon, Timodemso Son, a man that until that time wasnever called on for fervice, neither looked for any fuch preferment. And truly it is to be thought it By what voice was the fecret working of the gods, that directed the thought of this mean Commoner to name Ti- Timoleon came moleon: whose election Fortune favoured very much, and joyned to his valiantness and vertues marvellous good fuccels in all his doings afterwards. This Timoleon was born of Noble Parents both by Father and Mother: his Father was called Timodemne, and his Mother Demareta. He was naturally in-Timoleons Pa-Father and Mother: nis rather was taked 1 members and was always gentle and courteous to all men, remage and clined to love his Countrey and Commonweal: and was always gentle and courteous to all men, manners. faving that he mortally hated Tyrants and wicked men. Furthermore, Nature had framed his body apr for Wars and for pains: he was wife in his greenest youth, in all things he took in hand, and in tor wars and tot panis. The had an elder Brother called Timophanes, who was nothing Timophanes Tiins age in incondition; for he was a rash hair-braind man, and had a greedy desire to raign, being put into his head by a company of mean men, that bare him in hand they were his friends, and ther, what he ing put into his nead by a company of dicar many man bare faith in man they were his friends, and there by certain Souldiers gathered together, which he had always about him. And because he was very was, hot and forward in Wars, his Citizens took him for a notable Captain, and a man of good fervice, and therefore oftentimes they gave him charge of men. And therein Timoleon did help him much to hide the faults he committed, or at the leaft made them feen less, and lighter then they were, still increasing that small good gift that Nature brought forth in him. As in a Battell the CORINTHI-ANS had againft the ARGIVES and the CLEONEIANS, Timoleon ferved as a private Souldier amongst the Footmen : and Timophanes his Brother, having charge of the Horsemen, was in great danger to be caft away, if present help had not been. For his Horse being hurt, threw him on the ground in the midft of his Enemies: whereupon part of those that were about him, were afraid and ground in the man of the state of and those that remained with him, being few in number, and Timoleon save having many Enemies to fight withall, did hardly withstand their force and charge. But his Brother his Brothers Timoleon seeing him in such instant danger afar off, ran with all speed possible to help him, and clap-life. ping his Target before his Brother Tim: phanes, that lay on the ground, receiving many wounds on his The Cerinibibody with Sword and Arrows, with great difficulty he repulled the Enemies, and faved his own and ansentertained body with Sword and Arrows, with great cumcultry he repunes the Ententies, and tayed in sown and four hundred his Brothers life. Now the CORINT HIAN'S fearing the like matter to come that before had happen firangers, and pened unto them, which was, to lofe their City through default of their friends help, they relolved made Timobbiin Council, to entertain in pay continually four hundred Souldiers that were strangers, whom they nes Captain in Council, to entertain in pay continuary our humated shader state of the trust reposed in of them to assigned over to Timophanes charge: who, abandoning all honesty and regard of the trust reposed in keep their keep their him, did presently practise all the ways he could to make himself Lord of the City: and having put City. divers of the chiefest Citizens to death without order of Law, in the end he openly proclaimed himself Timophanes King. Timoleon being very forry for this, and thinking his Brothers wickedness would be the very high-cruelty and uway to his fall and destruction, fought first to win him with all the good words and perswations he surpation of could, to leave his ambitious defire to reign, and to feek to falve (as near as might be) his hard the Kingdom. dealing with the Citizens. Timophanes fet light by his Brothers perswasions, and would give no ear unto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went to one Afehilus his friend , and Brother unto Timophanes Wife, and to one Satyrus a Soothfayer (as Theopompus the Historiographes calleth him, and Ephorm calleth him Orthagoras) with whom he came again another time unto his Brother : and they three coming to him, inftantly befought him to believe good counfell, and to leave the Kingdom. Timophanes at the first did but laugh them to scorn, and sported at their perswasions : but afterwards he waxed hor, and grew into great choler with them. Timoleon feeing that; went a little afide, and covering his face fell a weeping: and in the mean feafon, the other two drawing out their Swords, flew Timophanes in the place. This murder was straight blown abroad through the City, and the Timobhines better fort did greatly commend the noble mind and hate Timoleon bare against the Tyrant : consi- slain by his dering that he being of a gentle nature, and loving to his Kin, did notwithstanding regard the be- Brothers pronefit of his Countrey, before the naturall affection of his Brother, and preferred Duty and Justice, curement before Nature and Kindred. Such then as milliked popular Government and liberty, and always followed the Nobility, they fet a good face on the matter, as though they had been glad of the Tyrants death : yet still reproving Timoleon for the horrible murder he had committed against his Brother, declaring how detestable it was both to the gods and men; they so handled him, that it grieved him to the heart he had done it.

But when it was told him that his Mother took it marvellous ill, and that she pronounced horrible Curses against him, and gave out terrible words of him, he went unto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit the could never abide to fee him, but always that her door against him. Thenhe being wounded to the heart with forrow, took a conceit fuddenly, to kill himfelf by abstaining from meat but his friends would never for lake him in this despair, and urged him to far by intreaty and perfuafion, that they compelled him to eat. Thereupon he reloved thenceforth to give himself over to a folitary life in the Countrey, feeluding himfelf from all company and dealings: lo as at the beginning, he did not onely refule to repair unto the City, and all accels of company, but wandring up and down in most folitary places, confumed himself and his time with melancholy. And thus up and down in most ioniary praces, comband influence and the war including and independents are lightly carried away (by praife or dispraise) if they be we ice, that counters and judgements are appeared in themselves. And therefore not shored up with rule of Reason and Philosophy, and rest consounded in themselves. And therefore it is very requifite and necessary, that not onely the act be good and honest of it fell, but that the refoliation thereof be also constant, and not subject unto change: to the end we may do all things confiderately; left we be like unto lickerous mouthed men, who as they defire meats with a greedy apperite, and after are foon weary, disliking the same: even so do we suddenly repent our actions grounded upon a weak imagination, of the honefty that moved us thereunto. For repentance maketh the act naught which before was good. But determination, grounded upon certain knowledge and truth of reason, doth never change, although the matter enterprised, have not always happy success, And therefore Phocion the ATHENIAN having registred (as much as in him lay) certain things which the Generall Leosthenes did, and which contrary to his mind took good effect: and perceiving the Athenians did open Sacrifice unto the gods, to give them thanks for the same, and much rejoyce at the Victory they had obtained : I would have rejoyced too (faid he) if I had done this: but so would I not for any thing, but I had given the countell. And after that fort, but more Ariffides grave sharply, did Arifides LOCKIAN (a very friend and companion of Plato) answer Diansfius the elder, Tyrant of Syracus A: who asked his good will to marry one of his Daughters. I had rather fee my Daughter dead (faid he) then married unto a Tyrant. And within a certain time after, the Tyrant put all his Sons to death: and then he asked him in derition to grieve him the more, If he were still of his former opinion, for the marrying of his Daughter. I am very forry (faidh) with all my heart for that which thou haft done: but yet I do not repent me of that I have faid. That peradventure proceedeth of a more perfect, vertue, But to return again unto Timoleon. Whether that inward forrow ftruck him to the heart for the death of his Brother Timophanes, or that shame did fo abath him, as he durft not abide his Mother, twenty years after he did never any notable or Timoleon cho- famous act. And therefore, when he was named to be Generall of the aid that should be sent into SICILE, the People having willingly chofen and accepted of him: Teleclides, who was chief Governour at that time in the City of CORINTH, standing upon his feet before the People, spake unto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behave himself like an bonest man, and valiant Captain in this charge. For, faid he, if that you handle your felf well, we will think you have killed a Tyrant: but if you order your felf otherwife then well, we will judge you have killed your Brother. Now Timoton being busie in levying of men, and preparing himself, Letters came to the Co-RINTHIANS from Iceres, whereby plainly appeared, that Iceres had carried two faces in one hood, and that he was become a Traytor. For he had no fooner dispatched his Ambassadours unto them, but he straight took the GARTHAGINIANS part, and dealt openly for them, intending to drive out Dionjim, and to make himself King of Syracusa. But fearing left the Corns-THIANS would fend aid before he had wrought his feat, he wrote again unto the CORINTHI-ANS, fending them word, that they should not need now to put themselves to any charge or danger for coming into Sicile, and specially, because the Carthaginians were very angry, and did also lye in wait in the way as they should come, with a great Fleet of Ships to meet with their Army: and that for himself; because he saw they tarried long, he had made league and aminy with them, against the Tyrant Dienssia. When they had read his Letters, if any of the CORIN-THIANS were before but coldly affected to this journey, choler did then fo warm them against lees, that they frankly granted Timoleon what he would ask, and did help to furnish him to fet him out. When the Ships were ready rigged, and that the Souldiers were furnished of all things necessary for their departure, the Nuns of the goddels Proferpina, faid they faw a Vision in their Dream, and that the goddesse Geres and Proserpina did appear unto them, apparelled like Travellers to take 2 journey: and told them, that they would go with Timoleon into SICILE. Upon this Speech onely, the CORINTHIANS rigged a Galley, they called, the Galley of Ceres and Proferpina: and Timoleon himself before he would take the Seas, went into the City of DELPHOS, where he made Sacrifice unto Apollo. And as he entred into the Sanctuary where the Answers of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull fign unto him. For amongst the Vows and Offerings that are hanged up upon the Walls of the Sanctuary, there fell a Band directly upon Timoleons head, imbroidered all about with Crowns of Victory: so that it feemed Apollo fent him already crowned, before he had fet out one foot towards the journey. He took Ship, and failed with feven Galleys of CORINTH, two of CORPHUE, and ten the LEUCADIANS did fet out. When he was launced out into the main 'ea, having a frank gale of wind and large, he thought in the night that the Element did open, and that out of the same there came a marvellous great bright light over his Ship, and it was much like to a Torch burning, when they shew the Ceremonies of the holy Mysteries. This Torch did accompany and guide them all their Voyage, and in the end it vanished away, and seemed to fall down upon the Coaft of ITALY, where the Ship-mafters had determined to arrive. The wife mens opinions being asked what this might fignific, they answered: That this wonderfull fight did betoken the Dream the Nuns of the goddess Ceres dreamed , and that the goddesses favouring his lourney, had shewed them the way, by sending of this Light from Heaven : because that the lile of Si-CILE is confecrated unto the goddess Proferpina; and specially for that they report her ravishment was in that Isle, and that the whole Realm was assigned unto her for her Joynter, at the day of her Marriage. Thus did this Celeftiall fign of the gods both incourage those that went this Journey; and deliver them also affured hope, who failed with all speed possible they could, untill such time as having croffed the Seas, they arrived upon the Coast of ITALES. But when they came thither the news they understood from SICILE, put Timoleon in great perplexity, and did marvellously difcourage the Souldiers he brought with him: for Icetes having overthrown the Battell of the Tyrant Dion fine, and possessed the greatest part of the City of Syracusa, he did besiege him within the Castle, and within that part of the City which is called the Isle, where he had pent him up, and inclosed him in with Walls round about. And in the mean time he had prayed the CARTHAGI- geth Disciplins. NIANS, that they would be carefull to keep Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the end that by preventing that aid, they might eafily divide SICILE between them, and no man to lett them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his request, fent twenty of their Galleys unto RHEGIO. amongst which Iceres Ambassadours were fent unto Timoleon, with testimony of his doings : for they were fair flattering words to cloak his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timeleon Leges fendesh that he should go himself alone (if he thought good) unto Icetes, to counsell him, and to accom. Ambassade urs pany him in all his doings, which were now fo far onwards in good towardness, as he had almost unto Timoleon. ended them all. Furthermore, they did also perswade him, that he should fend back his Ships and Souldiers to CORINTH again, confidering that the War was now brought to good pals, and that the CARTHAGINIANS would in no case that his men should pass into Sicile, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORIN-THIANS at their arrivall into the City of RHEGIO, finding there these Ambassadours, and seeing the Fleet of the CARTHAGINIANS Ships , which did ride at Anker not far off from them : it spited them on the one side, to see they were thus mocked and abused by Iceres. For every one of them were marvellous angry with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poor SICILI-ANS, whom too plainly they faw left a prey unto Icetes for reward of his Treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyranny which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other fide, they thought it impossible to conquer the Ships of the CARTHAGINIANS. which did lye in wait for them, and fo near unto them, confidering they were twice as many in number as they : and as hard for them to subdue the Army also that was in the hands of Icetes in SICILE, confidering that they were not come to him, but onely for the maintenance of the Wars. Norwithstanding Timoleon spake very courteoully unto those Ambassadours, and Captains of the Timoleon cras-CARTHAGINIANS Ships, letting them understand that he would do as much as they would tier then the have him: and to fay truly, if he would have done otherwise, he could have won nothing by it. Carthaginians. Neverthelesshedefired for his discharge, they would say that openly, in the presence of the People of RREGIO (being a City of GREECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had Rhogio a City fpoken to him in fecret: and that done, he would depart incontinently, alledging that it ftood him of Greece. very much upon for the fafety of his discharge, and that they themselves also should more faithfully keep that they had promifed unto him touching the SYRACUSIANS, when they had agreed upon it, and promised it before all the People of RHEGIO, who should be witness of it. Now all this was but a fetch and policy delivered by him to shadow his departure, which the Captains and Governours of RHEGIO did favour, and feem to help him in: because they wished SI-CILE should fall into the hands of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to have the barbarous People for their Neighbours. For this cause they commanded a generall Assembly of all the People, during which time, they caused the Gates of the City to be shut; giving it out, that it was because the Citizens should not go about any other matters in the mean time. Then when all the People were affembled, they began to make long Orations without concluding any matter: the one leaving always to the other a like matter to talk of , to the end they might win time , untill the Galleys of the Corinthians were departed. And staying the Carthaginians also in this Affembly, they miftrusted nothing, because they faw Timoleca present: who made a countenance, as though he would rife to fay fomething. But in the mean time, fome one did fecretly advertise Timoleon, that the other Galleys were under Sayl and gone away, and that there was but one Galley left, which tarried for him in the Haven. Thereupon he fuddenly ftole away through the preas, with the help of the RHBGIANS, being about the Chair where the Ora- Timuleon lantions were made: and trudging quickly to the Haven, he imbarked incontinently, and hoifed sail defined in State of the Chair where the Ora- Timuleon landing with the Chair where the Ora- Timuleon landing were made: and trudging quickly to the Haven, he imbarked incontinently, and hoifed sail defined in State of the Chair where the Ora- Timuleon landing with the Or also. And when he had overtaken his Fleet, they went all safe together to land at the City of ic. TAUROMENION, which is in Sicile: there they were very well received by Andromachus, Andromachus who long time before had fent for them, for he governed this City as if he had been Lord thereof, the Father of He was the Father of Timess the Historiographer, and honestest man of all those that did bear rule Historiograat that time in SICILE. For he did rule his Citizens in all Justice and Equity, and did always pher, Goverthew himself an open Enemy to Tyrants. And following his affection therein, he lent his City nour of the

Due the Capitains of the Caribagic when they knew that Timoleon was under Sail and gone, after that the Affembly of the Council when they knew that I imposed was much out and gone, and the Anchony of the Council was broken up, they were ready to their fingers for fpight to fee themselves thus finely mocked and deceived. The RHEGIANS on the other fide, were merry at the matter, to fee how the PHOENICIANS fformed at it, that they had fuch a fine part played them. Howbeit in the end, they determined to fend an Ambaffadour unto T Auromenton, in one of their Galleys. This Amof Turomenian they determined to fend an Ambanaaour unto 1 Aurone in one of their Gaueys. In Sambana but fend and barbaroully unto Andromachus, and in a choler: and laft of all, he bardromachus the palmand but first the palm of his hand, then the back of his hand, and did threaten him that his thewed him first the palm of his hand, then the back of his hand, and did threaten him that his back of his hand and did threaten him that his back of his hand and did threaten him that his back of his hand and did threaten him that his hand and did threaten him that his hand and him the him that his him that him the him that his him that him the him that his him the him that him the him that him the him that him that him the him that him that him the him that him that him the him the him the him that him the h City involue octo turned at him, and did turn his hand up and down as the Ambaffadour had done, and commanded him that he should get him going, and that with all speed out of his City, if he would not fee the Keel of his Galley turned upward. Icetes now understanding of Timoleons cowould not see the rect of the County function of Galleys unto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then ming, and being afraid, sent for a great number of Galleys unto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the Syracusians began to despair utterly when they saw their Haven full of the Carthagi-NIANS Galleys, the best part of their City kept by Icetes, and the Castle by the Tyrant Dionysim. And on the other fide, that Timoleon was not yet come but to a little corner of SICILE, having no more but the little Cityof TAUROMENION, with a small power, and less hope: because there was not above a thousand Footmen in all, to jurnish these Wars, neither provision of Victuals, was not above a moutaine rounding in an analysis and pay them. But by reason of the violent Exportions they had of late suffered, or SICILE and nothing that many they hated all Captains and Leaders of men of War to the death, and specially for the treachery of Calippu and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN, and the other a LACEDEMO. Both of them faid they came to fet SICILE at liberty, and to drive out the Tyrans; and yer nevertheless, they had done so much hurr unto the poor Sicilians, that the misery and yes nevertureres, they had fuffered under the Tyrants, seemed all to be gold unto them, in respect of that which thefe Captains had made them to abide. And they did think them more happy, that may write under captains and make the poke of fervitude: then those which they faw reflored had willingly submitted themselves unto the yoke of fervitude: and fet at liberty. Therefore perfuading themselves, that this CORINTHIAN would be no beand ict at interty. Saving the ADRANITANS onely, whole little City being conferrated to the god Adrawas (and greatly honoured and reverenced through all SICILE) was then in differntion one against another: informuch as one part of them took part with Icutes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and anount: muomen as one party management that both the one and the other, making all the potter fent unto Timokon. Icus drinus. had about five thousand Souldiers. Timoleon had not in all above twelve hundred men, with which he departed to go towards the City of ADRANUS, diffant from TAUROMENION about three hundred and fourty Furlongs. For the first days Journey he went no great way, but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very hashily, and had marvellous ill way. When night was come, and day light flut in, he had news that I ceter did but newly arrive before ADRANUS, where he encamped. When the private Captains underflood his, they caused the Vaward to stay, where he encamped. When the private captains inscribed him, they cauted the yaward to tay, to cat and repose a little, that they might be the lustier, and the stronger to fight. But Timoleon did see still forwards, and prayed them not to stay, but to go on with all the speedhey motion and net term torwards, and prayed ment not to may, but to go on which an die specially could possible, that they might take their Enders out of order (asit was likely they should) be singly but newly arrived, and troubled with making their Cabbins, and preparing for Supper. Therefore, the could be supported by the could b with as he spake these words, he took his Target on his arm, and marched himself the foremof man, as bravely and couragiously as if he had gone to a most assured Victory. The Soulders timelemoverfeeing him march with that life, they followed at his heels with like courage. So they had not here letter letter letter letter, and pating thirty Furlongs to go, which when they had overcome, they ftraight fet upon their Ent. mies, whom they found all out of order, and began to flie, fo foon as they faw they were upon their backs before they were aware. By this means there were not above three hundred man flain, and twice as many more taken Priloners, and so their whole Camp was possessed. Then that yeld unto the ADRANITANS opening their Gates, yeelded unto Timoleon, declaring unto him with great fear, and no less wonder, how at the very time when he gave Charge upon the Enemics, the Doors of the Temple of their god opened of themselves, and that the Javelin which the Image of their god did hold in hishand, did shake at the very end where the iron head was, and how all his face was feen to fweat. This (in my opinion) did not onely fignifie the Victory he had got Timoleon. ten at that time, but all the notable Exploits he did afterwards, unto the which, this first Encounter ter gave a happy beginning. For immediately after, many Cities sent unto Timoleon, to joynin league with him. And Mameress the Tyrant of CATANA, a Souldier, and very full of Money, did also seek his Friendship. Furthermore, Dionysius the Tyrant of Syrac us a, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding himfelf in manner forced unto it by long continuance of siegs, made no more reckoning of Iceres, when he knew that he was to thamefully overthrown. And contrariwife, much efteeming Timoleon, valiantness, he sent to advertise him, that he was contento yeeld himself and the Castle into the hands of the CORINTHIAMS. to take possession of the Castle, with four hundred men, not all at a time, nor openly (for it was impossible, the Enemies lying in wait in the Haven) but by small Companies, and by stealth . he conveyed them all into the Caftle, fo the Souldiers possessed the Caftle, and the Tyrants Palace with all the Moveables and Munition of War within the same. There were a great number of Horse of Service, great store of staves and Weapons offensive of all forts, and Engines of Battery to shoot far off, and fundry other Weapons of defence, that had been gathered together of long time, to arm threefcore and ten thouland men. Moreover, befides all this, there were two thouland Souldiers , whom with all the other things rehearfed , Dionyfine delivered up into the hands of Timoleon : and he himself, with his Money and a few of his friends, went his way by Sea, Iceres not knowing it, and so came to Timoleons Camp. This was the first time that ever they saw Dionysius a private man, in base and mean estate. And yet within few days after, Timoleon sent him from thence Dionvisus the note CORENTH in a Ship, with little flore of Money; who was born and brought up in the Trantof Str greatest and most famous Tyranny and Kingdom, conquered by force, that ever was in the World: racusation to and which himself had kept by the space of ten years after the death of his Father. Since Dion Corinth. drave him out, he had been marvellously turmoyled in Wars, by the space of twelve years: in which time, although he had done much mischief, yet he had suffered a great deal more. For he faw the death of his Sons when they were men grown, and able to serve and carry Armour. He The miseries faw his Daughters ravished by force, and defloured of their Virginity. He saw his own Sister (who and calamities was also his Wise) first of all shamed, and exceed his his with the greatest villanies of Dionyshar and most vile parts done unto her, that his Enemies could devise : and afterwards horribly murdered the Tyrant. with her Children, and their bodies in the end thrown into the Sea, as we have more amply declared in the Life of Dian. Now when Dianglins was arrived in the City of CORINTH, every GRE- Dianglins CIAN was wonderfull defirous to go fee him, and to talk with him. And fome went thither very Corinth. glad of his overthrow, as if they had troden him down with their feet, whom Fortune had overthrown , so bitterly did they hate him. Other pitying him in their hearts to see so great change did behold him as it were with a certain compassion, considering what great power, secret and Divine Causes have over mens weakness and frailty, and those things that daily pass over our heads. For the World then, did never bring forth any Work of Nature, or of mans hand to The inconwonderfull, as was this of Fortune: who made the World fee a man, that before was in manner flancy of for-Lord and King of all SICILE, fit then commonly in the City of CORINTH, talking with a Vi- tune. Ctualer, or fitting a wholeday in a Perfumers Shop, or commonly drinking in some Cellar or Tavern; or to brawl and fcold in the midst of the streets, with common Whores in the face of the World, or elfe to teach common Minstrels in every Lane and Alley, and to dispute with them with the best reason he had, about the harmony and musick of the Songs they sang in Theaters. Now fome fay he did this, because he knew not else how he should drive the time away, for that indeed he was of a base mind, and an effeminate person, given over to all dishonest lusts and desires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the less regarded, for fear lest the CORINTHIANS should have him in jealoufie and fuspicion, imagining that he did take the change and state of his life in grievous part, and that he should yet look back, hoping for a time to recover his state again : and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose seigned many things against his Nature, and seeming to be a ftark Idiot, to fee him do those things he did. Some notwithstanding have gathered together certain of his Answers, which do teffishe that he did not all these things of a base brutish mind, but to fit himself onely to his present misery and missortune. For when he came to Leucades, Notable favan ancient City built by the CORINTHIANS, as was also the City of Syracusa, he told the ings of Diony. Another time, being at CORINTH, a stranger was very busy with him (knowing how familiar Dionylius was with learned men and Philosophers, while he reigned in SYRACUSA) and asked him in the end in derision: what benefit he got by Plato's wisdom and knowledge? He answered him again : How thinkest thou, hath it done me no good, when thou The benefit of feest me bear so patiently this change of Fortune? Aristoxensu a Musitian, and other, asking him Philosophy. what oftence Plaso had done unto him : he answered , That Tyrants state is ever unfortunate , and subject to many evils: but yet no evill in their state was comparable to this; that none of all those nate they take to be their most familiars , dare once tell them truly any thing : and that through their This agreeth fault, he left Plato's company. Another time there cometh a pleasant fellow to him, and thinking with Afops to mock him finely, as he entred into his Chamber, he shook his Gown, as the manner is words to solon, when they come to Tyrants, to shew that they have no Weapons under their Gowns. But Diony-him coming fins encountred him as pleafantly, faying to him: Do that when thou goest hence, to see if thou to Princes to haft ftoln nothing. And again , Philip King of MACEDON , at his table one day descending please them, into talk of Songs, Verse, and Tragedies, which Dionysine his Father had made, making as though not to come he wondred at them, how possibly he could have leisure to do them; he answered him very trially, See Solons and to good purpose: He did them even at such times (quoth he) as you and I, and other great Life, and his Lords whom they reckon happy, are disposed to be drunk, and play the Fools. Now for Plato, he Answer to never faw Dionyfins at CORINTH. But Diogenes Sinopian , the first time that ever he met with Dio- JEfop ny sim, faid unto him: O, how unworthy art thou of this state! Diony sim stayed suddenly and replyed: Truly I thank thee (Diogenes) that thou hast compassion of my misery. Why, said Diogenes

Roriographer, bewaiting the hard fortune of the Daughters of the LEPTINES, faying that they were brought from the top of all worldly felicity, honour and goods (whereof tyrannicall flate aboundeth) unto a bafe, private and humble life: methinks they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that forroweth for the lofs of her Boxes of painting Colours, or for her Purple Gowns, or for other fuch pretty fine trims of Gold, as women use to wear. So, methinks these things I have intermingled concerning Dionysius, are not impertinent to the description of our Lives, neither are they troublefome or unprofitable to the hearers, unless they have other hafty business to lett or trouble them. But now if the Tyrant Diony sim wretched state seem strange, Timoleons prosperity then was no leis wonderfull. For within fifty days after he had fet foot in SICILE, he had the Caftle of Syra-CUSA in his possession, and sent Dionysius as an exile to CORINTH. This did set the CORIN-THIANS in fuch a joility, that they fent him a supply of two thousand Footmen, and two hundred Horfmen, which were appointed to land in ITALY, in the Countrey of the Thursans. And perceiving that they could not possibly go from thence into SICILE, because the CARTHAGINIANS kept the Seas with a great many of Ships, and that thereby they were compelled to fay for berans kept the Seas with a great many of ter opportunity: in the mean time they bestowed their leisure in doing a notable good act. For the THURIANS being in Wars at that time with the BRUTIANS, they did put their City into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as it had been their own native Countrey. Icees all this while did befiege the Caftle of Syracus A, preventing all he could possible, that there should come no Corn by Sca unto the Corinthians that kept within the Caftle: and he had hired two ftrange Souldiers, which he fent unto the City of ADRANUS, to kill Timoleon by Treason, who kept no guard about his person, and continued amongst the ADRANITANS, mistrusting nothing in the World, for the truit and confidence he had in the fafeguard of the god of the ADRANITANS. These Souldiers being sent to do this murther, were by chance informed that Timoleon should one day do Sacrifice unto this god. So upon this, they came into the Temple, having Daggers under their Gowns, and by little and little thrust in through the prease, that they got at the length hard to the Altar. But at the prefent time as one incouraged another to dispatch the matter, a third person they thought not of, gave one of the two a great cut in the head with his Sword, that he fell to the ground. The man that had hurt him thus, fled flraight upon it, withhis Sword drawn in his hand, and revered the top of a high Rock.

The other Souldier that came with him, and that was not hurt, got hold of a corner of the Altar, and belought pardon of Timolson, and told him he would discover the Treason practiced against him. Timoteon thereupon pardoned him. Then he told him how his Companion that was flain, and himfelf, were both hired, and fent to kill him. In the mean time, they brought him also that had taken the Rock, who cried out aloud, He had done no more then he fhould do: for he had killed him that had flain his own Father before, in the City of Leonti-NES. And to justific this to be true, certain that stood by did affirm it was so indeed. Whereat they wondred greatly to confider the marvellous working of Fortune, how the doth bring one thing to pass by means of another, and gathereth all things together, how far afunder foever they be, and linkeththem together, though they feem to be clean contrary one to another, with no manner of likeness or conjunction between them, making the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter throughly, gave him that flew the Solidier with his Sword, a Crown of the value of ten Minas, because that by means of his just and the word of the solidier with his Sword. ger, he had done good fervice to the god that had preferved Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hap did not onely ferve the prefent turn, but was to good purpole ever after. For those that faw it, were put in better hope, and had thenceforth more care and regard unto Timoleons person, because he was a holy man one that loved the gods, and that was purposely sent to deliver SICILE from captivity. But Icetes having miffed his first purpole, and feeing numbers daily drawn to Timoleons devotion, he was mad with himself , that having fo great an Army of the CARTHA-had been ashamed of his fact, and had used their friendship by stealth. So he sent thereupon for Letts bringeth Mago their Generall, with all his Fleet. Mago at his request brought an huge Army to see to. Mag a Car of a hundred and fifty Sail, which occupied and covered all the Haven: and afterwards landed threeor a nunared and nity sail, which occupied and covered an ine stance. and appearance interthaginin with feore thousand men, whom he lodged every man within the City of Syracusa. Then every a great Army man imagined the time was now come, which old men had threatned SICILE with many years before, and that continually: that one day it should be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous People. For in all the Wars the CARTHAGINIANS ever had before in the Countrey of SIGILE, they could never come to take the City of Syracusa; and then through Icetes Treason, who had received them, they were feen encamped there. On the other fide, the CORINTHIANS that were within the Cattle, found themselves in great diffress, because their Victuals waxed scant, and the Harmannian for Aminhala har ven was fo straightly kept. Moreover, they were driven to be armed continually to defend the Walls, which the Enemies battered, and affaulted in fundry places, with all kinds of Engines of battery, and fundry forts of devided Inftruments and inventions to take Cities: by reason whereof, they were compelled also to divide themselves into many Companies. Nevertheles, Timoleon without, gave them all the aid he could possible: fending them Corn from CATANA, in little Fisher-boats and fmall Crayers, which got into the Castle many times, but specially in stormy and foul weather, passing by the Galleys of the barbarous People, that lay scattering one from another, dispersed abroad by tempest, and great billows of the Sea. But Mago and Jeeres finding this, determined to go take the City of CATANA, from whence those of the Caftle of SYRACUSA were victualled : and taking with them the best Souldiers of all their Army, they departed from SYRACUSA, and failed towards CATANA. Now in the mean space , Lean CORINTHIAN , Captain of all Leon Captain and failed towards CATANA. Now in the mean space of Leon CORINIHAN, Captain of an those that were within the Caffle, perceiving the Enemiss within the City, kept but stender Ward thins within made a sudden Salley out upon them, and taking them unawares, slew a great number at the first the Castle. Charge, and drave away the other. So by this occasion he wan a quarter of the City, which they Leon wan call ACRADINA, and was the best part of the City, that had received least hurt. For the City of Acradina, SYRACUSA feemeth to be built of many Towns joyned together. So having found there great plenty of Corn, Gold and Silver, he would not forfake that Quarter no more, nor return again into the Caftle : but fortifying with all diligence the compass and precinct of the fame, and joyning it unto the Castle with certain Fortifications he built up in haste, he determined to keep both the one and the other. Now were Mago and Iceres very near unto CATANA, when a Post overtook them, purpolely fent from Syracusa unto them, who brought them news, that the Acra-DINA was taken. Whereat they both wondred, and returned back again with all speed possible (having failed of their purpose they pretended) to keep that they had yet left in their hands. Now for that matter, it is yet a question, whether we should impute it unto wisdom and valiancy, or unto good fortune: but the thing I will tell you now, in my opinion, is altogether to be ascribed unto Fortune. And this it is: The two thousand Footmen and two hundred Horsemen of the Corinthi-Contention of ANS, that remained in the City of the THURIANS, partly for fear of the Galleys of the CAR Fortune and THAGINIANS, that lay in wait for them as they should pass, Hanno being their Admirall: and valiancy, partly also for that the Sea was very rough and high many dayes together, and was always in storm and tempest: in the end, they ventured to go through the Countrey of the BRUTIANS, and partly with their good will (but rather by force) they got through , and recovered the City of RHEGIO, the Sea being marvellous high and rough. Hanno the Admirall of the CARTHAGINIANS, looking no more then for their paffage, thought with himself that he had devised a marvellous fine policy , to deceive the Enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to pur Garlands of Flowers of Tri- The strategem umph upon their heads, and therewithall also made them dress up, and set forth his Galleys, with of Hanno the Targets, Corflets, and Brigantines, after the GRECIANS fashion. So in this bravery he returned Admirall of back again, fayling towards Syracusa, and came in with force of Oars, rowing under the Ca- the Carthagiftles fide of Syracusa, with great laughing and clapping of hands, crying out aloud to them that nians. were in the Castle, that he had overthrown their aid which came from CORINTH, as they thought to pals by the Coast of ITALY into SICILE; flattering himself, that this did much discourage those that were belieged. But whilest he sported thus with this fond device, the two thousand Co-RINTHIANS being arrived through the Countrey of the CRUTIANS in the City of RHEGIO, perceiving the Coast clear, and that the passage by Sea was not kept, and that the raging Seas were by miracle (as it were) made of purpose calm for them ; they took Sea forthwith in such Fisherboats and Paffengers as they found ready, in the which they went into SICILE, in fuch good fafety, as they drew their Horse (holding them by the rains) alongst their Boats with them. When they were all passed over, Timoleon having received them, went immediately to take MESSINA, and marching thence in Battell ray , took his way towards Syracusa, trufting better to his good Fortune, then to his Porce he had: for his whole number in all were not above four thousand fighting men. Notwithstanding, Mago hearing of his coming, quaked for fear, and doubted the more upon this occasion. About Syracus a are certain Marshes, that receive great quantity of sweet fresh Water, as well of Fountains and Springs, as also of little runnings, Brooks, Lakes, and Rivers, which run that ways towards the Sea : and therefore there are great store of Eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all times, but specially for such as delight to take Eoles. Whereupon the GRECIANS that took pay on both fides, when they had leifure, and that all was quiet between them, they intended fishing. Now, they being all Countreymen, and of one Language, had no private quarrell one with another : but when time was to fight, they did their duties, and in time of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with another, and specially when they were busie fishing for Eels : saying, that they marvelled at the situation of the goodly places thereabouts, and that they ftood fo pleafantly and commodious upon the Sea fide. So one of the Souldiers that ferved under the CORINTHIANS chanced to fay unto them: Is it possible that you that be GRECIANS born, and have so goodly a City of your own, and full of so many goodly Commodities that ye will give it up unto these barbarous People, the CARTHA-GINIANS, and most cruell murderers of the World? where you should rather wish that there were many Siciles betwirt them and Greece. Have ye so little consideration or judgement to think, that they have affembled an Army out of all AFRICK, unto Hercules Pillars, and to the Sea ATLANTICK, to come hither to fight to stablish Icetes tyranny? who, if he had been a wife and skilfull Captain, would not have cast out his Ancestors and Founders, to bring into his Countrey the ancient Enemies of the same : but might have received such Honour and Authority of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleca, as he could reasonably have defired, and that with all their favour and good will. The Souldiers that heard this Tale, reported it again in their Camp: infomuch they made Mago suspect there was Treason in hand, and so sought some colour to be gone. But hereupon, notwithstanding that Iceres prayed him all he could to tarry, declaring unto him how much

Where there were already a great number of other come unto Timoleon, as well out of SICILE it felf, as out of ITALY befides: fo that the whole number (as Athania writeth) came to threefcore terr, as out of International House of the City thousand perfons. Amongst them he divided the whole Countrey, and fold them Houses of the City The Corinthiumto the value of a thousand Talents. And because he would leave the old Syracusians able an repleusshed to recover their own, and make the poor People by this means to have Money in common, to defray the common charge of the City, as also their expences in time of Wars: the Statues or Ima-racusa with ges were fold, and the People by most voyces did condemn them: for they were solemnly indicted, threefcore accused and arraigned, as if they had been men alive to be condemned. And it is reported that the thousand SYRACUSIANS did referve the Statue of Gelon, an ancient Tyrant of their City, honouring his memory because of a great Victory he had won of the CARTHAGINIANS, near the City of HIMERA: and condemned all the rest to be taken away out of every corner of the City, and to be fold. Thus began the City of Syracusa to replenish again, and by little and little to recover it felf, many People coming thither from all parts to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to fet all the other Cities at liberty also, and utterly to root out all the Tyrams of SICILE : and to obtain his purpose, he went to make Wars with them at their own doors. The first he went against was Icetes, whom he compelled to forfake the League of the CARTHAGINIANS, and to promife alfo that he would raze all the Fortreffeshe kept, and to live like a private man within the City of the Le-ONTINES. Laptines in like manner, that was Tyrant of the City of Apollonia, and of many Laptines, Tyrant of the City of Apollonia, and of many transfer of dealers. other little Villages thereabouts, when he faw himfelf in danger to be taken by force, did yeeld himfelf: Whereupon Timoleon faved his life, and fent him unto CORINTH: thinking it honourable for Timoleon. his Country, that the other GRECIANS should see the Tyrants of Sicile in their chief City of fame, living meanly and poorly like banished People. When he had brought this to pass, he returneth forthwith to Syracus a about the stablishment of the Common-weal, affisting Cophalus and Dionylism, two notable men fent from CORINTH to reform the Laws, and to help them to stablish the goodliest Ordinances for their Common-weal. And now in the mean time, because the Souldiers had a mind to get fomething of their Enemies, and to avoid idleness, he fent them out abroad into a Countrey subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, under the charge of Dimarchus and Demaratus: where they made many little Towns rebell against the barbarous People, and did nor onely live in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered Money together also to maintain the Wars: The CARTHAGINIANS on the other fide, while they were busie about thesematters, came down into LyLIBEA, with an Army of threefcore and ten thousand men, two hundred Galleys, and a thoufand other Ships and Veffels that carried Engineer of battery, Carts, Victuals, Munition, and other neceffary Provision for a Camp, intending to make sporting Wars no more, but at once to drive all the GRECIANS again quite out of SICILE. For indeed it was an able Army to overcome all the SICILIANS, if they had been whole of themselves, and not divided. Now they being advertised that the SICILIANS had invaded their Countrey, they went towards them in great tury led by Afthat the Army drubal and Amilear, Generals of the Army. This news was straight brought to SYRACUSA, and Ships of drubal and Amilear, Generals of the Afmy. This news was traight brought to 37 KACUSA, the Carthagiand the Inhabitants were so stricken with fear of the report of their Army: that being a marvellous great number of them within the City, scant three thousand of them had the hearts to arm them- Timolon, Af-felves, and to go to the Field with Timoleon. Now the strangers that took pay, were not above four druhal and Athousand in all: and of them, a thousand of their hearts failed, and left him in mid-way, and returned militar being home again: faying, that Timoleon was out of his wits, and more rash then his years required, to Generals. undertake with five thousand Footmen, and a thousand Horse, to go against threescore and ten thoufand men; and befides, to carry that small force he had to defend himself withall, eight great days journey from Syracusa : fo that if it chanced they were compelled to flie, they had no place Timoleon went whither they might retire themselves unto with fafety, nor man that would take care to bury them, with fix thouwhen they were flain. Nevertheless, Timoleon was glad he had that proof of them, before he fand men a came to Battell. Moreover, having encouraged those that remained with him, he made them march gainst the Carwith speed towards the River of CRIMESUS; where he understood he should meet with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting up upon a little hill, from whence he might fee the Camp of Crimcfus ft. the Enemies on the other fide: by chance certain Moils fell upon his Army, loaden with smallage. The Souldiers took a conceit at the first upon fight of it, and thought it was a token of ill luck : be- Smallage an ill cause it is a manner we use, to hang Garlands of this Herb about the Tombs of the dead. Hereof fign came the common Proverb they use to speak , when one lieth a passing in his bed : He lacketh but Proverb. Smallage: as much to fay, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw them from this foolith Superstition and discourage they took, staid the Army: and when he had used certain perswasions unto them, according to the time, his leifure, and occasion, he told them that the Garland of it felf came to offer them Victory before hand. For, faid he, the CORINTHIANS do crown them that win the ISTMIAN Games (which are celebrated in their Countrey) with Garlands of Smallage. And at that time also even in the folemn ISTMIAN Games, they used the Garland of Smal- Garlands of lage for reward and token of Victory: and arthis present it is also used in the Games of NEMEA. Smallage.

And it is but lately taken up, that they have used branches of Pine Apple-trees in the ISTMIAN Games: When Timoleon had thus encouraged his men, as you have heard before; he first of all took of this Smallage, and made himself a Garland, and put it on his head; and after him the Captains or this surange, and make unincer a containe, and made themselves the like. The Soothsayers in like and all the Souldiers also took of the same, and made themselves the like. The Soothsayers in like manner at the very fame time, perceived two Eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding mainter as the very rame time, percent through and through, and the other as she flew, gave a tera Snake in her talents, which she pierced through and through, a snake in ner taients, while the post-tained by Souldiers, who did then all together with one voyce rible cry. So they shewed them both unto the Souldiers, who did then all together with one voyce call upon the gods for help. Now this fortuned about the beginning of Summer, and towards the latter end of May, the Sun drawing towards the folftice of Summer: when there arole a great mift out of the River, that covered all the fields over, fo as they could not fee the Enemies Camp, but onely heard a marvellous confused noise of mens voyces, as it had come from a great Army : and rifing up to the top of the hill, they laid their Targets down on the ground to take a little breath: and the Sun having drawn and fucked up all the moilt vapours of the mift unto the top of the hills, the air began to be fo thick, that the tops of the mountains were all covered over with clouds: and contrarily, the Valley underneath was all clear and fair, that they might eafly fee the River of CRIMESUS, and the Enemies also, how they passed it over in this fort. First, they had put their the cractron the Carthagi- Carts of War foremost, which were very horly armed and well appointed. Next unto them there followed ten thousand Footmen, armed with white Targets upon their armes: whom they seeing asar off fo well appointed, they conjectured by their flately march and goodly order, that they were the Carthaginians themselves. After them, divers other Nations followed confusedly one with another, and fo they thronged over with great difforder. There Timeleon confidering the River gave him opportunity to take them before they were half past over, and to fet upon what number he would: after he had shewed his men with his finger, how the Battell of their Enemies was divided in two parts by means of the River, some of them being already passed over, and the other to pass: he commanded Demaratus with his Horsemen to give a Charge on the Vaward, to keep them from putting themselves in order of Battell. And himself coming down the hill also with all his Footmen into the Valley, he gave to the SICILIANS the two Wings of his Battell, mingling with them fome frangers that served under thim: and placed with himself in the midst, the Syracusans with all the choife and best liked strangers. So he tarried not long to joyn, when he saw the small good his Horfemen did. For he perceived they could not come to give a lufty Charge upon the Bartell of the Carthagintans, because they were paled in with these armed Carts, that ran here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled to wheel about continually (unless they would have pur themselves in danger to have been utterly overthrown) and in their returns to give venure of charge, by urns on their Enemies. Wherefore Timoleon taking his Target on his arm, Timoleonsmar-cried out aloud to his Footmen, to follow him couragiously, and to fear nothing. Those that head his voyce, thought it more then the voyce of a man, whether the fury of his defire to fight did fo ms voyce, mought a more men the voyce of a man, whenever the lary of his active to high and to frain it beyond ordinary course, or that some god (as many thought it then) did firetechnis voyce to cry out to loud and fenfibly. His Souldiers anilwered him again with the like voyce: and prayed him to lead them without longer delay. Then he made his Horlemen understand, that they should draw on the one fide from the Carts, and that they should charge the Carthaginians on the Flanks: and after he did fet the foremost rank of his Battell, Target to Target against the Enemies, commandding the Trumpets withall to found. Thus with great fury he went to give a charge upon them, who valiantly received the first Charge, their bodies being armed with good iron Corfelets, and their beads with faire Murrions of Copper, besides the great Targets they had also, which did easily receive the force of their Darts, and the thruft of the Pike. But when they came to handle their Swords, where agility was more requisite then force: a fearfull tempest of thunder, and flashing lightning withall, came from the Mountains. After that came dark thick clouds also (gathered together from the top of the Hills) and fell upon the Valley where the Battell was fought, with a marvellous extrain shower of rain, fierce violent winds, and hail withall. All this Tempest was upon the GRECI-ANS backs, and full before the barbarous People, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eyes, and continually tormented them with the rain that came full upon them with the wind, and the lightnings to oft Hashing amongst them, that one understood not another of them. Which did marvelloufly trouble them, and specially those that were but fresh-water Souldiers, by reason of the terrible thunder-claps, and the noise the boysterous wind and hail made upon their Harness: for that made them they could not hear the order of their Captains. Moreover, the dirt did as much they fought. annoy the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were not nimble in their Armour, but heavily armed, as we have told you: and besides that also, when the plaits of their Coats were through wer with water, they did load and hinder them for much the more, that they could not fight with anyease. This flood the GRECIANS to great purpose, to throw them down the easier. Thus when they were tumbling in the dirt with their beavy Armour, up they could rife no more. Furthermore, the River of CRIMESUS being rifen high through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of People that paffed over it, did overflow the Valley all about : which being full of Ditches, many ny Caves, and hollow places, it was ftraight all drowned over, and filled with many running ftream, that ran overthwart the Field without any certain channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compaffed all about with these waters, they could hardly get the way out of it. So as in the end they being overcome with the ftorm that still did beat upon them, and the GRECIANS laving flain of their men at the first onset, to the number of four hundred of their choisest men, who made the first front of their battle: all the rest of their Army turned their backs immediately and fled for life. Infomuch as some of them being followed very near, were put to the sword in the midst of the Valley: other, holding one another hard by the arms together, in the midst of the River as they paffed over, were carried down the stream and drowned with the swiftness and violence of the River. But the greatest number thinking by footmanship to recover the hills thereabouts, Timoleons Viwere overtaken by them that were light armed, and put to the fword every man. They say, that of ctory of the ten thousand which were slain in this Battle, three thousand of them were natural Citizens of CAR- Caribaginians. THAGE, which was a very forrowfull and grievous loss to the City: for they were of the nobleft, the richest, the lustiest and valiantest men of all CARTHAGE. For there is no Chronicle that mentioneth any former Wars at any time before, where there died so many of CARTHAGE at one Field and Battle, as were flain at that present time. For before that time, they did always entertain the FYBIANS, the SPANIARDS, and the NOMADES in all their Wars: fo as when they lost any Battle, the loss lighted not on them, but the strangers paid for it. The men of account also that were flain, were eafily known by their spoils. For they that spoiled them, stood nor trifling about getting of Copper and Iron together, because they found Gold and Silver enough. For the Battle being won, the GRECIANS paffed over the River, and took the Camp of the barbarous people, with all their carriages and baggage. And as for the Prifoners, the Souldiers stole many of them away. and fent them going: but of them that came to light in the common division of the spoil, they were about five thousand men, and two hundred Carts of War that were taken besides. Oh, it was a noble fight to behold the Tent of Timoleon the Generall, how they environed it all about with heaps of spoils of every fort: among which there were a thousand brave Corcelets gilt and graven with marvellous curious works, and they brought thither with them also ten thousand Targets. So the Conquerors being but a small number, to take the spoil of a multitude that were flain, they filled their Purses even to the top. Yet were they three days about it, and in the end, the third day after the Battle, they fet up a mark or token of their Victory. Then Timoleon fent unto CORINTH, with the news of this overthrow, the fairest Armour that were gotten in the spoil: because he would make his Countrey and native City spoken of and commended through the world, above all the other Chies of GREECE. For that at CORINTH onely, their chief Temples were fet forth and adorned, not with the spoils of the GRECIANS, nor Offerings gotten by spilling the blood of their own Nation and Countrey, (which to fay truly, are unpleasant memories,) but with the spoils taken from the barbarous people their Enemies, with inscriptions witnessing the valiancy and justice of those also, who by Victory had obtained them. That is to wir, that the Co-RINTHIANS and their Captain Timoleon (having delivered the GRECIANS dwelling in SI-CILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had given those Offerings unto the gods, to give thanks for their Victory. That done, Timoleon leaving the strangers he had in pay, in their Countrey subject to the CARTHAGINIANS, to spoil and destroy it, he returned with the rest of his Army unto Syra cusa: where at his first coming home, he banished the thousand Souldiers that had Timpleon has forfaken him in his journey, with express charge that they should depart the City before Sun set. So nisheth the these thousand cowardly and mutinous Souldiers passed over into ITALY, where, under promise of thousand traithe contrary, they were all unfortunately slain by the BRUTIANS: such was the justice of the terous Souldigods to pay the just reward of their Treason. Afterwards, Mamereus the Tyrant of Catana, and cite. Icetes (whether it was for the envy they did bear to Timoleons famous deeds, or for that they were afraid of him) perceiving Tyrants could look for no peace at his hands: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote unto them that they should send another Army and Captain suddenly, if they would not utterly bedriven out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS fent Gifco thi- Gifco fent from ther with threescore and ten fail, who at his first coming took a certain number of GRECIAN Carthage with Souldiers into pay, which were the first the CARTHAGINIANS everyteained in their fervice, for cite. they never gave them pay untill that prefent time, when they thought them to be men invincible, and the best Souldiers of the World. Moreover the inhabitants of the territory of Massina, having Mellina tifeth made a secret conspiracy among themselves, did slay four hundred men that Timoleon had sent unto against Timothem : and in the Territories subject unto the CARTHAGINIANS, near unto the place they called teon. HIERES, there was another ambush laid for Enthimus LEUCADIAN, so as himself and all his Souldiers were cut in pieces. Howbeit the loss of them made Timoleons doings notwithstanding more fortunate: for they were even those that had forcibly entred the Temple of Apollo in the City of DEL-PHOS, with Philodemus the PHOCIAN, and with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their facriledge. Moreover, they were loose people and abjects, that were abhorred of every body, who vagabondlike wandred up and down the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS, when Timoleon for lack of other was glad to take them up. And when they came into SICILE, they always overcame in all Battles they fought, whilst they were in his company. But in the end, when the fury of Wars was pacified, Timoleon fending them about some special service to the aid of some of his, they were cast away every man of them: and not all together, but at diverstimes. So as it seemed that Gods justice, in favour of Timoleon, did feperate them from the rest, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deferts, fearing left good men should suffer hurt by punishing of the evil. And so was the grace and good will of the gods wonderfull towards Timoleon, not onely in matters against him, but in those things that prospered well with him. Notwithstanding, the common people of Syracusa took the jefting words and writings of the Tyrants against them, in marvellous evil part. For Mamercus amongst other, thinking well of himself, because he could make Verses and Tragedies, having in certain Battles gotten the better hand of the strangers which the SYRACUSIANS gave pay unto, he gloried very much. And when he offered up the Targets he had gotten of them, in the Temples of the gods, he fet up also these cutting Verses, in deristion of them that were variquished:

With Bucklers pot-lid like, which of no value were, With a nuclei possessing, some of or richly trimmed here, And gorgeously with gold, and the with Ivory, With purple colours finely wrought, and deckt with Ebony. These things done, Timeleon led his Army before the City of CALAUREA, and Iceres therewhile entred the confines of the Syracustans with a main Army, and carried away a marvellous great spoil : and after he had done great hurt, and spoiled the Countrey, he returned back again, and GIRAL HOLL AND ALL AND bout him. Timoteon fuffered him to passby, but followed him afterwards with his Horse-men and lightest armed Foot-men. Icetes understanding that, passed over the River called Damitrias, and fo staid on the other side as though he would fight, trusting to the switt running of the River, and the to train on the other time as mough the words 1810; containing to the time training of the factory and the height of the banks on either fide of the fame. Now the Captains of Timoleons Bands fell out marvelloully amongst themselves, striving for honour of this service, which was cause of delaying the battle. For none would willingly come behind, but every man defired to lead the vaward, for honour to begin the charge: fo as they could not agree for their going over, one thrufting another to get before his companion. Wherefore Timoleon fell to drawing of Lots, which of them thould pals over first, and took pamon. Wherefore 1 supplement and coaft them all within the lap of his cloak: fo rolling them together, a Ring of every one of them, and caft them all within the lap of his cloak: Lots to pathe by chance he pluckt one at the first, whereon was graven the marks and tokens of a Triumph. The young Captains feeing that, gave a shout of joy, and without tarrying drawing of other Lots, they began every man to pals the River as quickly as they could, and to fet upon the Enemies as fuddenly. But they being not able to abide their force, ran their ways, and were fain to cast their armour away to make more hafte: howbeit there were a thousand of them lay dead in the field. And within few days Timilion taketh Icertand

European and the General of his Horteman who were delivered into his boad by the boad keth Iceres and arres, 1 1000 to 1000 reasoning instating to the Cary of the Laborat Laboration access arrest mere, with his Soa Eupolemus, and the General of his Horfemen, who were delivered into his hands by his own Soul-Eupstemus IIIs Son alive, and diers. So lettes and his Son were put to death, like Trayrors and Tyrants: and fo was Euthydemus did put them also, who though he was a valiant Souldier, had no better mercy shewed him, than the Father and the Son, because they did burthen him with certain injurious words he spake against the CORINTHIANS. For they fay, that when the CORINTHIANS came first out of their Countrey into SICILE, to make Warsagainst the Tyrants: that he making an Oration before the LEONTINES, said amongst other things, that they should not need to be afraid, if The Women of Corinth were come out of their Countrey. Thus we see, that men do rather suffer hurt, than put up injurious words: and do pardon their Enemies, though they revenge by deeds, because they can do no less. But as for injurious words they seem to proceed of a deadly hate, and of a cankred malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned again to Syracusa, the Syracusians arraigned the Wives of Iceres, and his Son, and their Dughand Children ters: who being arraigned, were also condemned to die by the judgement of the people. Of all theads put to death. Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the fouleft deed; for if he had lifted, he might have

Citizens, who would be revenged of them, for the injuries that were done to Dion, after he had driven The cruelty of his cities with marking the control of the cruelty of his cities with a called Arate, the Wife of Dion, to be call into the Se, Inter trueny of his Sifter Aristomacke, and his Son that was yet a fucking Child, as we have written in another place Dion and his. in the Life of Dion. That done, he went to CATANA against Mamercus, who tarried for him by the River Abolus, where Mamereus was overthrown in Battle, and above two thousand men slain, the greatest part whereof were the CARTHAGINIANS, whom Gifco had sent for his relief. Afterwards he granted Peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, upon earnest fuit made to him, with condition, that they should keep on the other side of the River of Lycus, and that it should be lawfull for any of the inhabitants there that would, to come and dwell in the territory of the Syracowith the Car SIANS, and to bring away with them their goods, their Wives and Children: and furthermore, that from thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS should renounce all League, Consederacy and Alliance with the Tyrants. Whereupon Mamercus having no hope of good fuccess in his doings, he would go into ITALY, to thir up the Lucanians against Timoleon and the Syracu SIANS. But they that were in his company, returned back again with their Gallies in the midway: Catana yielded and when they were returned into SICILE, they delivered up the City of CATANA into the hands unant Time of Timoleon, fo as Mamere us was constrained to fave himself, and to fly into MESSINA, to Hippon the Tyrant thereof. But Timoleon followed him, and befreged the City both by Sea and by Land. Whereat Hippon quaked for fear, and thought to fly by taking of Ship, but he was taken staring. And the MESSINIANS having him in their hands, made all the Children come from the School to the Theatre, to fee one of the goodlieft fights that they could devife: to wit, to fee the Tyran rant of Mcffina. punished, who was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yield himfelf unto Timoleon, to be judged by the SYRACUSIANS, fo that Timoleon might not be his accuser. So he was brought unto Syracusa, where he attempted to make an Oration to the People, which he had premeditated long before. But feeing that the People cryed out and make a great noise, because they would not hear him, and that there was no likelihood they would

pardon him: he ran overthwart the Theatre, and knocked his head as hard as he could drive upon one of the degrees whereon they fate there to fee their sports, thinking to have dashed out his brains, and have rid himself suddenly out of his pain. But he was not happy to die so, for he was taken straight being yet alive, and put to death as Thieves and Murderers are. Thus did Timoleon root all Tyrants Mamerius the out of SICILE, and made an end of all Wars there. And whereas he found the whole Ille, wild; favage, and hated of the natural Countrey men and inhabitants of the fame, for the extream calamities and miseries they suffered, he brought it to be so civil, and so much defired of strangers, that they came Timoleon quifar and near to dwell there, where the natural inhabitants of the Countrey fell before, were glad to fly cteth all sinte and forfake it. For AGRIGENTUM and GELA, two great Cities, did witness this, which after the Wars of the ATHENIANS, had been utterly for faken and destroyed by the CARTHAGINIANS, and werethen inhabited again: the one, by Megellin and Pheriftus, two Captains that came from ELEA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the Isle of CBO. And as near as they could, they gathered again together the first ancient Citizens and inhabitants of the fame : whom Timoleon did not onely affure of peace and fafety to live there, to fettle them quietly together : but willingly did help them befides, with all other things necessary, to his uttermost mean and ability, for which they loved and honoured him as their Father and Founder. And this his good love and tayour was common also to all other people of Sicile whatfoever. So that in all Sicile there was no truce taken in Wars, nor Laws established, nor Lands divided, nor institution of any policy or government thought good or available. if Timoleons device had not been in it, as chief director of such matters: which gave him a fingular grace to be acceptable to the gods, and generally to be beloved of all men. For in those days, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did marvellous great things: amongst whom were Timoleon comthele, Timothem, Agesslam, Pelopidas and Epaminondas: which Epaminondas, Timoteon sought to pared with the follow in all things, as near as he could, above any of them all. But in all the actions of these other in Greece, great Captains, their glory was always mingled with violence, pain and labour : fo as fome of them have been touched with reproach, and other with repentance. Whereas contrariwife, in all Timoleans doings (that onely excepted which he was forced to do to his Brother) there was nothing but they might with troth (as Timans faid) proclaim the faying of Sophocles :

O mighty gods of heaven, what Venus Stately dame, Or Cupid, (God) bave thus yout, their hands unto the fame ?

And like as Antimachus verses, and Dionysius painting, both COLOPHONIANS, are full of sinews and ftrength, and yet at this prefent we fee they are things greatly laboured and made with much pain : and that contrariwise in Nichomachus tables, and Homers verses, besides the passing workmanship and fingular grace in them, a man findeth at the first fight, that they were easily made, and without great pain. Even so in like manner, whosoever will compare the painfull bloudy Wars and Battles of Epaminondas and Agefilaus, with the Wars of Timoleon, in the which befides equity and justice, there is also greatease and quietness: he shall find, weighing things indifferently, that they have not been Fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble and fortunate courage. Yet he himself Timoleonatertdoth wifely impute it unto his good hap and favourable fortune. For in his Letters he wrote unto his buteth his familiar friendsat Corinth, and in some other Orations he made to the people of Syracusa, good success he spake it many times, that he thanked the almighty gods, that it had pleased them to save and deliver unto Fortune. SICILE from bondage by his means and service, and to give him the honour and dignity of the name. And having builded a Temple in his house, he dedicated it unto Fortune, and furthermore did confecrate his whole house unto her. For he dwelt in a house the Syracus I ans kept for him, and Timpleon dwelgave him in recompence of the good service he had done them in the Wars, with a marvellous fair leth still with pleasant house in the Countrey also, where he kept most when he was at leisure. For he never after re- the Syracustans turned unto CORINTH again, but fent for his Wife and Children to come thither, and never dealt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongst the GRECIANS, neither did make himself to be envied of the Citizens (a milchief that most Governours and Captains do fall into through their unfatiable defire of honour and authority) but lived all the reft of his life after in Sicile, rejoycing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many Cities and thousands of people happy by his means. But because it is an ordinary matter, and of necessity (as Simonides faith,) Simoniles saythat not onely all Larks have a tuft upon their heads, but also that in all Cities there be accusers, ing. where the people rule: there were two of those at Syracusa, that continually made Orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphystius, and the other Demanetus. So this Laphystiss appointing Timoleon a certain day to come and answer to his acculation before the people, thinking to convince him: the Citizens began to mutiny, and would not in any case fuffer the day of adjournment to take place. But Timoleon did pacific them, declaring unto them that he had taken all the extream pains and labour he had done, and had passed so many dangers, because every Citizen and inhabitant of Syracusa, might frankly use the liberty of their Laws. And another time Demanetus, in open affembly of the people, reproving many things Timoleon did when he was General: Timoleon answered never a word, but onely said unto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had so requested of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once fee the Syracusians have full power and liberty to fay what they would. Now Timoleons Timoleon in all mens opinion, had done the noblest acts that ever GRECIAN Captain did in his time, great praise, and had alone deferved the fame and glory of all the noble exploits, which the Rhetoricians with all their eloquent Orations perswaded the GRECIANS unto, in the open affemblies, and common

Feats and Plays of GREECE, out of the which Fortune delivered him fafe and found before the trouble of the civil Wars, that followed foon after : and moreover he made a great proof of his valiancy nie of the tivit wars, that ioniowed monator and more than the property and knowledg in Wars, against the barbarous people and Tyranis, and had shewed himself also a just and knowledg in wars, against the balance proper and the Grecians. And furthermore, seeing and mercifull man unto all his friends, and generally to all the Grecians. he won the most part of all his Victories and Triumphs, without the shedding of any one rear of his men, or that any of them mourned by his means, and also rid all SICIDE of all the miseries and calamili, or that any or that time, in less than eight years space: he being now grown old, his sight first bemuce reigning at that the first state of the lock is altogether. This happed, not through any cause or graning a mere to ran min, morely and a color a anogeness. A manageness, nor mayors any came or occasion of fickness that came unto him, nor that Fortune had casually done-him this injury: but it was Timoleon in his

in my opinion, a difease inheritable to him by his Parents, which by time came to lay hold on him also. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like case had also lost their fight, which by little and little rot the voice went, the limit, or many Wars he had against Mamercus and Hippon, 28 he was in his Camp at MY LLES, there came a white foot in his eyes, that dimmed his fight formewhat: fo that every man perceived that he should lose his fight altogether. Notwithstanding that, he did not raise his fiege, but continued his enterprize, until he took both the Tyrants at last: and to foon as he returned to Syrac us A again, he did 'put himself out of his office of General, praying the Citizens to accept that he had already done, the rather because things were brought to fo good pass, as they themselves could defire. Now, that he patiently took this misfortune to be blind altogether, peradventure men may fomewhat marvell at it: but this much

The great ho- more is to be wondred at, that the SYRA CUSAN's after he was blind, did fo much honour him, and acthe great not more is to be womanted at, man the or a contract the state with this oft, and brought frangement the Syra- knowledg the good he had done them, that they went themselves to visit him oft, and brought frangement. cofin did Ti ers (that were travellers) to his house in the City, and also in the Countrey, to make them see their beers (mar were traveuers) to mis nome in the Cary, and ano in the Committee, to make them be-nefactor, rejoycing and thinking themselves happy, that he had chosen to end his life with them, and that for this cause he had delpised the glorious return that was prepared for him in Gradiers, for the moleon being great and happy victories he had won in SICILE. But amongst many other things the STRACUSANS did, and ordained to bonour him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefett; that they made a uni, and ordanica to notice man wan, this of an other me unincent was the effected and tot against their own perpetual Law, so of as they should have Wars against forreign People, and not against their own Countrey men, that they should chuse a Corinthian for their General. It was a goodly thing alfo to fee how they did honour him in the affemblies of sheir Council. For if any trifling matter fell in question among them, they dispatched it of themselves: but if it were a thing that required great counfell and advice, they caused Timoleon to be sent for. So he was brought through the Market-place in his Litter, into the Theatre, where all the affembly of the people was, and carried in even so in his Litter as he fate; and then the people did all falure him with one voice, and he whem in like case. And after he had pauled a while, to hear the praifes and bleffings the whole affembly gave him, they did propound the matter doubtfull to him, and he delivered his opinion upon the fame: which being passed by the voices of the people, his fervants carried him back again in his Litter through the Theatre, and the Citizens did wait on him a little way with cries of joy, and clapping of hands: and that done, they did repair to dispatch common causes by themselves, as they did before. So his old age being thus entertained with fuch honour, and with the love and good will of every man, as of a common Father to them all: in the end a fickness took him by the back, whereof he died. So the SYRACUSANS had a certain Timpleons Futime appointed them to prepare for his Funerals, and their neighbours also thereabours to come unto it. By reason whereof his Funeral was so much more honourably performed in all things, and specially for that the people, appointed the noblest young Gentlemen of the City to carry his Coffin upon their shoulders, richly surnished and see forth, whereon his body lay, and so did convey him through the place, where the Pallace and Castle of the Tyrant Dionysia had been, which then was razed to the ground. There accompanied his body also many thousands of people, all crowned with garlands of Howers, and apparelled in their best apparell; so as it feemed it had been the procession of tone folem Feaft, and all their words were praifings and bleflings of the dead, with tears running down their cheeks, which was a good testimony of the entire good will and love they did bear him, and that they did not this as men that were glad to be discharged of the honour they did him, neither for that it was fo ordained : but for the just forrow and grief they took for his death, and for very hearty good love they did bear him. And laftly, the Coffin being put upon the flack of wood where it should be burnt.

Demetriss one of the Heraulds that had the loudest voice, proclaimed the Decree that was ordained by the people, the effect whereof was this: The people of Syracusa hath ordained, that this prefer body of Timoleon Corinthian, the Son of Timodemus, should be buried at the charges of the the System and Commonweal, unto the furn of two hundred Minas, and hath honoured his memory with Plays and for the memory of Timoleon. Gaunes of Mulick, with running of Horfes, and with other exercifes of the body, which shall be celebrated yearly on the day of his death for evermore: and this, because he did drive the Tyrants out of SICILE, for that he overcame the barbarous people, and because he replenished many great Cities with inhabitants again, which the Wars had left defolate and uninhabited; and laftly, for that he had reftored the SICILIANS again to their liberty, and to live after their own Laws. And afterwards, his Tomb was built in the Market-place, about the which a certain time after, they builded certain Closfters and Galleries to exercife the youth in, with exercise of their bodies; and the place so walled in, was called Timoleontium: and fo long as they did observe the Laws and civil policy he established a mongst them, they lived long time in great and continual prosperity.

The End of Timoleons Life.

THE COMPARISON OF PAULUS EMYLIUS with TIMOLEON.

Ith these two men were such as the Historiographers have described them to be: it is certain, that comparing one with the other, we shall find no great odds or difference between them. For first of all, the Wars they made, have been against The comparigreat and famous Enemies : the one against the MACEDONIANS, and the other fon of Timoleagainst the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their Victories very notable. For on and Paulus the one of them conquered the Realm of MACEDON, which he took from the Emplies for feventh King that reigned by fuccession from the Father to the Son, fince the time of the great Antigonus; and the other drave all the Tyrants out of Sicile, and restored the whole Isle and Cities therein, unto their former liberty. Unless some will alledge perhaps that there was this difference between them, that Amylius fought against King Perfeus, when he had all his power whole and entire, and had fought with the ROMANS many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon fet upon Dionysius, when he was in greatest despair, and in manner-interly cast away. On the contrary fide, it may be objected for Timoleon, that he overcame many Tyrants, and a mighty great Army of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a very small number of men, and yet men of all forts : not as Amylius with a great Army of well trained and expert Souldiers in Wars, but with men gathered together at adventure of all forts, being mercenary hirelings, and men fighting for pay, loole people, and unruly in wars, that would do but what they lifted. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the means unequal; there we must confess that the praise is due unto the General. Both the one and the other kept their hands clean from corruption, in the charge which they took upon them. But it seemeth that "Amylius came so fashioned and prepared, by the good civil Law, and morall discipline of his Countrey: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards fashioned himself to be that he was. And this is to be proved: for that all the ROMANS in that time were so civilly brought up, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the Laws of their Countrey. Where to the contrary, there was not one of the Captains of the GRECIANS that came then, or were fent into Sicile, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foot into Sici-LE, Dion onely excepted : and yet they had a certain suspition of him, that he aspired to the Kingdom, and imagined in his head to stablish a certain Empire at Syracusa, like unto that of Laceda-MON. Times the Historiographer writeth, that the SYRACUSANS fent Gilippus with shame back again into his Countrey, for his unfatiable greedy covetousness, and for his great thefts and bribes taken in his charge. Divers other have also written the great treasons and falshoods Pharax SPARTAN, and Calippus Athenian did commit, both of them feeking to make themselves Lords of Syracusa, and yet what men are they, and what means had they to have such a foolish vain hope and fancy in their heads? confidering that the one did follow and ferve Dionyfius, after he was driven out of SYRACUSA: and the other also was but a private Captain of a band of Footmen, of those that came with Dion. Timoleon in contrary manner was sent to be General of the SYRACUSANS, upon their great instance and fuir. And he having no need to feek or hunt after it, but onely to keep the power and authority they did willingly put into his hands: fo foon as he had destroyed and overthrown all such as would unjustly usurgshe Government, he did immediately of his own good will, frankly refign up his Office and charge. And sure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus Enylius: who having conquered to great and rich a Realm, he never encreated his goods the value of one arthing, neither did see nor handle any Money at all, although the was very liberal, and gave large. The wonder-ly unto others. I mean not in speaking this to upbraid or detect Timoleon, for that he accepted of Emplian a fair House the Syracus ans gave him in the City, and a goodly Mannor also in the Countrey: from bribes.

for in such cases there is no dishonesty in receiving, but yer it is greater honesty to resule then to take. But that vertue is most rare and singular, where we see they will receive nor take nothing, though they have juftly deferved it. And if it be fo, that the body is stronger and better compounded, which best abideth change of parching heat, and nipping cold : and that the mind is much more stronger and stable, that swelleth not up with pride of prosperity, nor droopeth for forrow in advertity. Then it applies that swelleth not up with pride of prosperity, nor droopeth for forrow in advertity. Then it applies vertue was so much more perfect, in that he shewed himself of no less grave Pampitur con- and constant a mind, in the patience he endured for his loss and forrow happened unto him, (losing at stancy far exceedeth Timo one time in manner both his Children) then he had done before, in all his Triumph and greatest Felicity. Where Timoleon to the contrary, having done a worthy act against his Brother, could with no reason suppress the grief and sorrow he felt : but overcome with bitter grief and repentance, continued the space of twenty years together, and never durst once onely shew his face again in the Marketplace, nor deal any more in matters of the Commonweal. Truly, for a man to beware to do evil, and to flun from evil, it is a very good and comely thing: fo also to be forry, and afraid of every reproach, and ill opinion of the world, it sheweth a simpleness of nature, and a good and well disposed mind, but no manly courage.

THE LIFE OF PELOPIDAS.

ATO the elder, answered certain on a time, that marvellously commended a bold, a venturous, and desperate man for the Wars: That there was great oddes, to efteem manhood fo much, and life so little. And furely it was wifely spoken of him. The report goeth, that King Antigonus gave pay to a Souldier among other, that was very hardy and venturous, but he had a naughty fickly body. The King asked him one day, What he ailed to be so pale and evil coloured? The Souldier told him, he had a secret Disease upon him, that he might not tell him with reverence. The King hearing him fay fo, commanded his Phyfitians and Surgeons to look to him, and if he were curable, that they should heal him with all possible speed: and so they did. After the Souldier had his health again, he would venture no more fo desperately in the wars, as he did before. Infomuch as King Antigonus felf perceiving his flackness in drawing back, rebuked him, and faid unto him: That he wondred to fee so great a change and alteration in him. The Souldier never shrinking at the matter, told him the troth plainly: Your self, and it please your The answer of Majesty, is cause of my cowardlines now, by healing of my Disease, that made my life loathlome to me. Much like were a Sybaritans words, touching the life and manner of the Laci-DEMONIANS: That it was no marvell they had fuch a defire to die in the Wars, Divers opini- feeing they did it to tid themselves of their troubles, and most milerable and straight ons of life and life. But we must not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womanish men, altogether given death. to pleasure, did so think: that those men hared their lives, who seared not death, for the defire they had to do good, and good will they had to do their duty. Which was contrary in the LACEDEMO-NIANS: for they were of opinion, that to live and die willingly, was a vertue: as thele funeral Verfes do witness:

> The dead which here do rest, did not in life esteem; . That life or death were (of themselves) or good or badto deem, But even as life did end, or death wai brought to paf, Sa life or death, was good or bad; this their opinion was.

And indeed to fly death is no thame, fo it proceed not of a cowardly heart; neither to delire death And inacces to my season and contempt of life. This is the reason why Homer saith, the vais commencative, it is to with that and containing to harde. The Law-makers among the GRECIANS, cities do punish do ever punish him that casts away his Target, but never him that casteth away his Sword or Lance, him that cast-For every man must first think to desend himself, before he seek to hurt his Enemy, and specially such eth away his as have the whole state of a Realm in their hands, and be Generals of the stell, For if the compari. Target. fon be true, that Iphichates the ATHENIAN Captain made, that in an Army of men, the Light-hotel-partition of a men refemble the hands, the men of Arms the feet, the battle of footmen the stomach and breast, the Army of men, Captain, the head of a mans body: it feemeth then that the venturous Captain putting himself in danger without cause, is not onely careles of his own life, but also of all theirs whose lives depend upon his safety. And contrarily, he being carefull of his own person, cannot but be carefull of his Souldiers that ferve under him. Therefore Califoratidal a LACEDAMONIAN Captain, and a worthy man o. A Lieutenant therwise, did unwisely answer a Soothsquer that bad him take heed to himself; for the figure and tokens of an Army must be careof the Sacrifices did threaten his death. SPARTA, faid be, standeth not upon one man alone. It is true, full to save that to fight by Sea or by Land, man for man, Callier atidas was but one man of himself; but as himself.

Captain or Lieurenant General; the had the whole power and force of the Army in his person: For he was not a man alone, when so many mens lives were lost with him. Now old Antigonus was of a contrary mind: for he being ready to give battle by Sea, about the Isle of ANDROS, made a better answer to one that faid unto him; his Enemies had more Ships than himself. For how many Ships then doft thou reckon my felf, faid he? Therein he did wifely to make great account of the worthiness of a General, specially when it is joined with hardiness and experience: For the chiefest point of service, is to fave him that faveth all other. For when Chares on a time shewed the ATHENIANS openly. the fundry wounds and curs he had received upon his body, and this Target also thrust through with the tunaty wounds and this is that the history of the standard of the mind. For whea I did be- Timesbess fayfiege the City of Samos, I was affiained to fee a Dart thrown from the Walls, light hard by me, ing for that I shewed my selfa rash young man, and more venturous than became a General of so great an Army. For when it standeth much upon the whole Army, and that it is necessary the General thereof do put himself in danger: then he should put himself forward, and occupy both hands and body without respect, not regarding their words that say, A good and wife Captain should die for age, or at the leaft, old. But where there is a small honour to be won by very good success, and contrariwise much loss and destruction by great missortune : no man of wildom or judgment would wish a General to fight as a private Souldier, to hazard the lofs of a General. I thought good therefore to make this Preface before the Lives of Pelopida and of Marcellus, both which were worthy men, and died otherwise than they should. For they were both valiant Souldiers in the Field, and did both of them honour their Countrey with famous Victories, and specially against great and dreadfull Encmies. For the one was the first (as they say) that overthrew Hannibal, who was never overcome by any before. And the other alfo overcame the LACEDEMONIANS in battle, that ruled all GREECE Pelopids and at that time both by Sea and by Land. Yet they both carelelly loft their lives, by venturing too bold-Marcelus loft ly, when their Countrey stood in greatest need of such men and Captains as they were. This is the both their lives ly, when then Countrey thood in greatest need of such men and captains as they were. I mis is the by too much caule why we following the refemblance that was between them, have compared their Lives together, venturing. Pelopidus; the Son of Hippocliss, came of the noblest houses of the City of THEBES, as Epa- Pelopidus flock minondas did. He being brought up in great wealth, his Father left him Heir of all his Lands and and liberality. Goods, being but a young man. So he straight shewed himself willing to do good, with his Money, to those that needed help, and were worthy : to let the world see, that his Money was not his Master. For as Arifforle faith of these rich men, the most part of them do not use their Goods for extream co- Arifforles fav. vetousnels: other again do abuse them, as being given to overmuch pleasures. So rich men become ing of rich men flaves all their lifetime, fome to pleasure, other to profit. Now, all Pelopidas other friends would be beholding to him, and take very thankfully his courtefie and liberality towards them: but Epaminondas could never be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeir Pelopidas, self followed Epaminondas manner: for he took a pride and pleasure to go simply apparelled, to sare meanly, to labour willingly, and to make Wars openly as he did. He was even fuch another, as Euripides the Poet described Capaneus to be, when he said of him;

He rich and mealthy was, yes was he therewithall No wight that purchas'd worldly hate, nor infolent at all.

For he would have been ashamed, that the poorest man of the City of THERES, should have worn meaner apparel upon his back than himself. As for Epaminondas, his poverty was not dainty to him, because his Parents were ever poor, and yet for all that he passed it over more easily by study of Philosophy, which he gave himself unto, and for that from his youth he liked to lead a fpare life without excess. Where Pelopidus matched in a noble house, and married highly, and had two Children by his Wife: nevertheless he had no mind to keep or encrease his Goods the more for that, but gave himfelf altogether to ferve the Commonweal as long as he lived. By reason whereor his wealth decayed, and his best friends grew angry with him, telling him that be did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was so necessary, as to have Goods. And he answered them: Indeed they are necessary I do confess, but yet for such a one as this poor, lame and blind man that stand-Pelopidus fayeth by. ethics of the pelopidus took most pleasure in the exercise of his wit and learning. So as the pastime each of them took when they were at leisure was, that the one delighted to wrastle and to hunt, and liked any kind of exercife of his body; and the other to hear, to study, and always to The perfect friendship betwite Pelpidar

For if a man will confider, and look into the doings of Arift des, Themistocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicia, and Alcibiades, how full of diffentions, envies and fuspitions they were one against another, in governing the Commonweal: and again will confider the love, honour and kindness, that continued always betwixt Pelopidas and Epaminondas: no doubt they will say these two are more worthy to be called Brethren in War (as they fay) and companions in government, than any of them we have named before, whose care and study was always rather to overcome one another, than to overcome their Enemies; and the onely cause thereof was their Vertue. For their acts shewed they did not feek glory, nor riches for themselves (the coverousnels whereof doth always breed quarrels The true cause and envy) but both of them from the beginning fell one in love with another, with a great kindnels and estimation of themselves, to see their Countrey flourish, and grow to great honour through their fervice, and in their time: and fo they reckoned all the good exploits both of the one and the other, that tended to that end, as their own. The most part of Writers think, this great and earnest love the one did bear to another, did grow first between them in a journey they made together unto MANTINEA, to aid the LACEDEMONIANS, that were at that time Confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both fet in battle ray, one hard by another among the Footmen, against the ARCADIANS that frood before them : it fortuned that the point of the battle of the LACEDEMONIANS in the which they were, gave back, and many of them ran away. But they determining to die rather than to fly, ffood close together, and fought with the Enemies that came upon them, untill fuch time as Pelopidas being hurt in feven places before, fell down at the laft upon a heap of dead bodies, as well of their own Souldiers as of their Enemies, even one upon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had been flain, stept notwithstanding before him to defend his body and armour, and he alone fought against many, being willing to die rather than to forsake Pelapidas lying amongst the dead bodies: untill himself being thrust into the breast with a Pike, and fore cut on his arm with a Sword, was even ready to give over, when Agefipolis (King of the LACEDEMONIANS) came with the other point of the battle in happy hour, who faved both their lives past all hope. Now after this Battle, the LACED'EMONIANS both in words and deeds did courteoully intreat the THEBANS as their friends and confederates. Notwithstanding in truth they began to sear the power and great courage of that City, and specially the faction and affociates I menias and Androclidas had fet up, whereof Pelopidas also was a companion: because they thought it was popular, and inclined much to defire liberty. Whereupon Archias, Leontidas, and Philip, all three great wealthy men of the City of THEBES, and milliking to be equall with other Citizens, did periwade Phebidas, a Captain of the LACEDEMONIANS, that going and coming through the Countrey of BOEOTIA with an Army, he would one day affay to take the Caftle of THEBES called CAD-Calle of The MEA, and driving those out of the City that would resist him, he would put the government of the State into the hands of a few of the Nobleft persons, who would be at the devotion of the La-CEDEMONIANS, and obey them in all things. Phabidas brought it to pais, and did work his feat before the THEBANS miltrufted any thing, upon a holy day called THESMOPORIA. After he had won the Caftle, he apprehended Ifmenias, and fent him to LACEDAMON, where shortly after they put him to death, Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many others faved themfelves by flying, and were banished THEBES by found of Trumpet. Epaminondas tarried still in THEBES, and no man touched him, for they made finall account of him, because he was altogether given to his book: and though his good will had ferved him to have done fome feat, his poverty made him unable to do anything. The LACEDEMONIANS understanding of the taking of the from Thebes. Castle, did straight put Phebidas out of his charge, and ser a fine of a hundred thousand Drachmes upon his head: but yet they kept still the Castle of CADMEA in their hands with a great Garrison. All the other Cities and People of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they should allow the fact, and punish notwithfunding the doer. So the Thebans having loft their ancient liberty, and being made subject by both these, Archia and Leoniidas, so as all hope was taken from them Lesstidas, Go- ever to wind out of this tyranny, or at any time to overthrow it, feeing it was maintained and defended by the LACEDEMONIANS, and that they could not possibly take from them all the feigniory and dominion they had throughout GREECE, as well by Sea as by Land: Leonisdas and his followers notwithstanding, when they understood that they who were banished from THEBES,

The ATHENIANS, notwithstanding, being men always trivity given, and inclined in nature to humanity, as being born, and bred up withall, and very defirous besides to requite the THEBANS courtefie, who had been the chiefest means and doers in restoring again the The thankfull. popular state and government at ATHENS: they would by no means offer the Thebans nets of the Attention unany such injury, seeing they had stablished a Law and Decree, that if any ATHENTAN passing to the Technis. too and fro through the Countrey of BOEOTTA, did bear armor against the thirty Tyrams, that were Governors and oppressors of the Liberry of ATHENS, there should no Boeb TIAN feem to fee, or know any thing thereof. In the mean time Pelopidas, though he were of the younger fort, did procure still every one that was banished, to seek the liberty of his Country, and open- Petapidas ly made an Oration to them all, declaring that it were not onely a cowardly part, that all of a wick liberty of the ked offence to the gods, if they would fuffer their Country to remain fo in continual bon-Thebana. dage, and strangers to inhabit it with a Garrison, to make them subject to the yoke: and they in the mean time to be contented to fave themselves, to live delitately and idly at ATHEMS, to fludy to do what shall please the ATHENIANS to command them, and to be assault of the Orators, and those which through eloquence can perswade the common people to do what they Therefore he perswaded them that they should hazard all, being a matter of so great weight, and take example of Thrafybulus noble courage and hardiness; who departing from THERES, did drive out the Tyrants that oppressed ATHENS: and even so, we departing from ATHENS, should feek to deliver There's alsolisom bondage. When he had by these perswateons drawn them to his opinion, they fecretly lint unto their friends that remained Rill in THE-BES, to let them understand their mind and determination : who all liked very well of their purpole. Infomuch as Charon that was the chiefest man among them, promited to lend them his house to affemble in. Philidas also found means to be Secretary to Philip and Archids. who were Governours and Captains of the City at that tittle for the LACEDENO WIANS. Examinondas on the other fide making no snew of any thing, had of long time practifed to flirth the courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they were at any Games or exercises of body, he would ever procure them to wreftle with the LACEDEMONIANS. And after he faw them rejoice when they had cast them, and that they were the firringer: he would chide them, and tell them they might be ashamed, for lack of courage to suffer the LACEDEMONIANS to hold their notes to the grindstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the confe- Conspiracy aderates appointed a day certain to break the ice of their pretended enterprize, and agreed that gainft the La-Pherenicus, with other that were banished, should tarry at the Village of THRIASTUM, and for the Liberty that they should fend the valiantest and lustiest young men before, to give the venture to enter the of Thebes, City: adding this therewithall, that if the Enemies fortuned to furprize them, all the other of the confpiracy jointly together, should be ready to give order, that their Fathers, Mothers and Children should lack nothing necessary for them. Pelopidas was the first man that offered himself to undertake the enterprize : and after him Melon, Damoelidas and Theopompus, all three, men of the greatest houses of THEBES, who laved marvellously together, and for no respect would ever offend one another, although from the beginning there was ever entitlation among them for honour their coming, and they themselves went on their journey, casting little short cloaks upon them, and taking Hounds with them, and Hunters staves in their hands, because their enterprize should not be mistrusted by those that met them on the way, and that they should think them Hunters up and down the fields for their pleasure. So, when the messengers they sent, came to the Ciry, and had told Charon that they were coming, he never shrank from his word, though the danger towards was great, but like a front and honest man did abide by his promise made, and told him they should be most heartily welcome to his house. But another man casted Hipposthenidas, very honest otherwise, and one that loved his Countrey and the preservation thereof, and a good friend of those also that were banished : fainting straight upon the sudden report of these news, his maind was troubled, and his heart failed him so, as his nose fell a bleeding, to think upon the greatness of the instant danger he was like to fall into, having never cast before with himself, how by this enterprize they should put all the Empire of the LACEDEMONIANS in hazard of utter destruction, and lay a Plot besides to overthrow all their Communical and State: by laying all their hope upon a few banished men, hardly able to wade through with their enterprize. Whereupon to foon as he was come home, he secretly dispatched a Messenger, one of his familiar friends, unto Melon and Pelopidar, to will them they thould defer their enterprize for better opportunity, and so to return back again to ATHENS. Chliden was the man he sent of this meffage, who prefently went home to his house; and taking his Horse out of the stable, bad his Wife fetch him the Bridle quickly. The Bridle being not readily to be found, the told him, the had lent it out to one of their neighbours. Then they fell a chiding rogether about it, and at length and glory, by firiving who should exceed other in vertue and validationels. Now they were twelve Charon kept of them, who taking leave of the reft, sent a Foot-post before to Charon, to advertise him of danger of life. PELOPIDAS.

brake out to foul words, and lastly his Wife fell a curfing of him, and prayed the gods he might have ill luck in his journey, and those that fent him. Chliden having from the most part of the day chiding and brawling with his Wife about the Bridle, and furthermore milliking the tokens of his Wives curfing and banning of him: he determined not to go afoot out of the doors on that errand, and to went about fome other business. Thus had this noble enterprize in manner been altogether dashed before it was fully begun. Now those that were in Pelopidas company, changed apparell with the countrey men, because they would not be known, and did divide meth unto Theber difgui- themselves for that they would not come into the City all together, but at divers gates, being recer august the first time it was a marvellous wind and great frow, and the weather was fo boifterous, that every man got him within doors: which fell out happily for the Conspirators, that they were not known when they came into the City. So their Friends and Confederates within the City, received them as they came, and brought them to Charons house; where were assembled togegether, with those that were banished, eight and forty persons onely. Now for the Tyrants, thus flood the matter with them. Philidas their Secretary was of the confpiracy, as we have told you before, and he knew all the Practife. Wherefore he had long before foleranly bidden Archias and his company, to supper to his house, that very night, to be merry together, and had promised to entertain them with Women to accompany them withall: of purpose, that when they had in their full cups, and were in the midft of all their pleasure, the Conspirators might then use them as they would. So they being fet at table, before they were fped of their cups, one came to them, and told them truly of the Treason (not the particularities, neither as a thing certain, but of a rumour onely that ran abroad in the Town:) that the banished men were hidden in Charons house. Philidas would have passed the matter over. Howbeit Archias would needs send one of his Guard straight Pelopidas dan- for Charon, to command him: to come to him prefently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themselves to work their feat, being armed every man, and their Swords in their hands, when upon a studen they heard one knock at the gate. And one of the house running straight to the gate, came back again afraid, to tell them that it was one of Archias Guard that came for Charon, to come immediately to the Governours. Then were they in doubt that that came for Charon, to come innucuately to the Governours. After were they in doubt that their practife was difcovered, and that they were all caft away, before they could make any proof of their valiantness: norwithfranding, they were all of opinion, that Charon flouid obey the melage, and that he flouid prefent, himself before the Governours, to take away all suspicion from them. Charen of himfelf was a flout man, very constant and resolute in danger for his own perfon : yet it grieved him much at that time, for fear the Confederates should suspect him he had bewrayed them, if fo many honest Citizens whom he had lent his house unto, should unfortunately milearry. Therefore before he went out of his house, he went into his Wives chamber, to steh his Son, that was a goodly boy, but strong as any boy of his age could be: so he brought him to Pelopidas, and prayed him, if he understood he had betrayed them any way, or otherwise had fought their hurt, they should then use his Son as an enemy, without any compassion towards him. When the Confederates faw the good zeal and true noble mind of Charon, they all fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he should think any of them so faint hearted or timerous, for any danger could come to them, that they should suspect or accuse him for any thing; and therewithall they prayed him, not to leave the Boy with them, but rather to convey him into some place out of the Tyranis danger, where he might be brought up, that one day he might be revenged of the wrong and injury they had done to them, and to their Countrey. Charon answered them, he would not take him away, and that he faw no life nor health more happy for him, then to die with his Father without infamy, and with so many honest men his friends. So after he had belought the gods to prosper them, and had encouraged and embraced every one of the Consederators one after another: he went to the Gogernours, and studied by the way so to frame his words and countenance, as though he should feem to think of any thing elfe, than of that he purposed to do. When he came to Philidas door that made the Feaft, Archias and Philidas himself came unto him, and asked him, Charon, What are they (faid they) that are come into the City, and hidden in some house, with certain Citizens, that do accompany them? Charon was somewhat abashed at the first, and asked them again: What men be they? Who are they that hide them in the City? But when he perceived that Archias could tell nothing of certainty, then he thought straight that fome man had informed them that was not privy to the practife, but had heard something of it. Thereupon he willed them to take heed it was no false alarm, to make them afraid: nevertheles (faid he) I will enquire further of it; for at all adventure it is good to be circumfeed in fuch a cale to be fure. Philidas answered him, he said truly : and so he brought Archias back again into the Hall, where he made him drink deeper than before, still entertaining the company with hope of the Womens coming. Charon returning home again, found all the Confederates ready to attempt their enterprize, not as men that reckoned of their lives, nor that had hope to prevail: but as those that were determined to die valiantly, and to fell their lives dearly. Now he touly told unto Pelapidas onely, what was faid unto him : and the reft, he told that Archias had fent for him to fpeak Archiss Bishop with him of other matters. The florm of the former danger was scant blown over, but Forume of Albert, be- fent them another: for immediately upon talk had with Charon at the first, came a Messenger from ATHENS, that brought a Letter to the same Archias, written by the Bishop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias, also as himself, and was his old host and friend: wherein he wrote not of fimple conjecture, nor furmifed fulpition, but the plain confpiracy in every degree, as afterwards it fell out. So the Messenger was brought to Archias that was drunk, and delivering him the Letter, he faid unto him : Sir, he that fendeth you this Letter, ftraightly charged me to tell you, that you should presently read the contents thereof, because it is a matter of great importance. that you mount precently read to Weighty matters to morrow. So he took the Letter and put it Weighty maters to morrow. up, and then fell again to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But ever after, the GRECIANS, Weighty matmade this a common Proverb among them, Weighty matters to morrow. Now when the Con-Proverb spirators spied their time to go about their business, they divided themselves in two companies: Pelopidas and Damoclidas went with one company, to fet upon Leontidas and Hypates, because Pelopidas killthey dwelt near together : Charon and Melon with the reft went against Archias and Philip, be- eth the Tyrant ing difguised in Womens apparell they had put upon their privy coates, and wearing garlands of Pine apple and Fir-trees on their heads, they covered all their faces. So when they came to shew themselves at the Hall door where the banket was made, they that were in the Hall at the first fight, thinking they had been the Women they looked for, began to shout and make great noise for joy. But when the Conspirators cast their eyes round about the Hall to know those that were at the Table, they drew out their Swords, and fet upon Archias and Philip overthwart the Table: then they shewed themselves what they were. Then Philidas bad his guests he had bidden to the banket with them, that they should not stir, for they should have no hurt : fo some of them sate still. but the greatest number of them would needs from the board, to desend their Governours, Howbeit because they were drunk that they knew not what they did, they were soon slain with them. Now Pelopidas enterprize was not fo easie : For they went against Leontidas, that was a fober discreet man, and withall hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his doors were shut up, and they knocked long before any man came to the door. At the length one of his men that heard them rap so hard, with much ado came to open the door : but he had no sooner thrust back the bolt of the door, and began to open it, but they pushed it from them with such a force upon him altogether, that they laid him on the ground, and went straight to his Masters Chamber. Leontidas hearing the noise of them that ran up to him in such haste, presently mistrufed the matter: and leaping out of his bed, took his Sword in his hand, but did forget to put out the Lamps that burned in his chamber all night; for if they had been out, they might eafily have hurt one another in the dark. But the Lamps giving clear light in the Chamber, he went to the Chamber door, and gave Cephisodorus the first man that pressed to enterupon him, such a blow with his Sword, that he dropped down dead at his feet. Having flain the first man, he dealt with the fecond that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard between them two. both for that the Chamber door was very straight, as also for that Cephisodorus body lying on the ground, did choak the coming in at the Chamber. Notwithstanding, Pelopidas overcame him in the end, and flew him: and went from thence with his Company straight to Hypates house, where they got in, as they did unto Leontidas house before. But Hypates knew presently what in was, and thought to fave himself in his neighbours houses. Howbeit the Conspirators followed him fo hard, that they cut him off before he could recover their houses. Then they gathered together, and joyned with Melons company, and fent immediately with all possible speed to A-THENS, to the banished THEBANS there, and cryed through the City, Liberty, liberty, arming The Liberty of those Citizens that came to them with the armour and spoils of their Enemies, that were hanged the Thebane up in common vaults, and Armourers shops about Charons house, which they brake open, or cau-restored, fed to be opened by force. On the other fide, Epaminondas and Gorgidas, came to joyn with them, with a company of young men and honest old men well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon the whole City was straight in an uproar and tumult, and every house was full of lights, one running to another to know what the matter was. Nevertheless the people did not yet affemble together, but every one being amazed, musing at this stir, not understanding the troth, stayed till day came on, that they might call a Council. But truly herein methinks the Captains of the Garrison of the LACEDEMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not ftir betimes, and fet upon them incontinently: confidering there was fifteen hundred Souldiers, besides a great number of Citizens that would have come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noise they heard made them afraid, and to feelights in every mans house, and the people running up and down the streets in great multitudes too and fro: whereupon they stirred not, but onely kept them within the Castle of CADMEA. The next morning by break of day, came the other banished THEBANS from ATHENS, very well armed, and all the people of THEBES drew together in Counsell. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas and his conforts, and prefented them before the people, compassed about with Priests and the professed of the City, offering them Crowns to put upon their heads, and they prayed the assembly of the Citizens, that they would help their gods and their Countrey. All the people that were prefent when they faw them, arole up and stood on their feet, and with great shouts and clapping of hands received them, as their faviours, that had delivered their Countrey from bondage, and restored them again to Liberty: and thereupon before them all, even in the Market-place, by the whole voice and confent of the people, they chose Pelopidas, Melon and Charon, Governours and Captains of BOEOTIA. Pelopidas then immediately made them beliege the Castle of CADMEA about, with Pelopidas retrenches and force of Wood, doing all he could possible to win it, and to expulse the Laced. MONIANS, before any supply or aid came to them from SPARTA. So he did, and prevented by compositiit so suddenly, that the Garison being departed out of the Castle by composition, as they returned on.

they bickered very oft, and put them to the worst. But the Battell of TEGYRA, which was but a ceived two Enligns of Footmen of theirs to keep it. Pelopidas being advertised one day, that the

Garison of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the Countrey of the LOCRIDES, hoping he should find ORCHOMENE without Garison, he marched thither with his holy Band, and certain number of Horsemen. But when he drew near the City, he had intelligence there was another Garison coming from Sparta to supply the place of the Garison that was abroad: whereupon he returned back again by the City of TEGYRA, for he could have passed no other way, but to have turned down by the foot of the Mountain. For all the Valley that lay between both, was drowned with overflowing of the River of Melas, which even from his very head carrieth it hath. Not far from these Marishes standeth the Temple of Apollo TECIRIAN, where was an Oracle in old time, but left off arthis day, and had never long continuance, but onely untill the time of the Wars of the MEDES, when Echecrates was Master and chief Priest there. And some hold opinion, that Apollo was born there: for they call the next Mountain to it DELOS, at the foot whereof the Marishes of the River of MELAS do end, and behind the Temple are two goodly Springs, from whence cometh great abundance of good sweet water : whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palm, and the other the Olive. And some fay also, that the goddess Latona which so many grave and ancient Writers have left in Writing to us, touching so great and holy things.

The THEBANS returning back from ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDEMONIANS on the other fide returning also from LOCRIDE both at one time, they fortuned both Armies to meet about the City of TEGYRA. Now to foon as the THEBANS had discovered the LACEDE-MONIANS passing the straight, one of them ran suddenly to Pelopidas, and told him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACEDEMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, anfwered Pelopidas again? With these words he commanded his Horsemen that were in the Rereward, to come before, and fet upon them: and himself in the mean time put his Footmen immediately into a pretty Squadron close together, being in all not above three hundred men, hoping when he should come to give charge with his Battell, he should make a lane through the Enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACED.EMONIANS divided themselves in two Companies, and every Company, as Ephorus writeth, had five hundred men : and as Callistenes said, seven hundred. Polybius and divers other Authours fay, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and

Gorgoleon, the Captain of the LACEDEMONIANS, luftily marched against the THEBANS:

and it fell out so, that the first Charge was given, where the Chiestains or Generals were of either they faw Pelopidas meant not to take the passage they offered him, and that he came on still with his men to fet upon those that were yet in Battell ray, and slew all them that stood before him : then they turned tail, and took them to their legs. Howbeit the Thebans did not chase them far, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not far from them, and the new Garison besides, that were come from LACEDEMON not long before. And this was the cause they were content that they had overcome them by force, and had passed through their Army in despight of them, and broken and overthrown them. So when he had fet up marks of Triumph, and spoiled their slain

Enemies, they returned home again, glad men for their obtained Victory. For in all the Wars the LACEDEMONIANS ever made, as well with the GRECIANS as with the barbarous People also, there was never Chronicle mentioned at any time, that their Enemies being so few, did overcome them that were fo many, nor that they were overcome also by any number equall in Battell. Wereupon they grew so couragious and terrible, that no man durst once abide them:

towards LACEDEMONIA, they found Cleombrotus King of SPARTA in the Countrey of ME-GARA, coming towards them with a great Army to help them. Afterwards, of the three Captains which had charge of their Garrison that lay at THEBES, the SPARTANS condemned two of them to death: Hermippidus and Arciffus were prefently executed : and the third Captain Dyfacridas, they fet fo grievous a Fine on his head, that he went out of PELOPO NMESUS. This enterprize being attempted, and executed with the like valiantness, and the same danger and trouble, that Tirasibulus practife was, when he delivered ATHENS from the slavery of the thirty Governours and Tyrants; and having the like fortune and happy end, the GRECIANS termed it Coufin-german to Thrafibulus act. And indeed it were a hard matter to find two other fuch, befides them two, that with fo few men overcame their Enemies, being many mo in number than themselves, or that with so small help did overcome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprize with their onely valiance and wildom, and were cause besides of so great blefling and benefit to their Countrey, as Pelopidas and Thrasibulus attempt was. But the great change and alteration of the State afterwards, did make their acts far more noble and famous. For the War that overthrew the majefty of SPARTA, and that took away all the Seigniory and rule of the LACEDEMONIANS both by Sea and by Land, began the very fame night, when Pelopidas himself making the twelfth person, and entring into a private house, tarecopidas overthrew the king neither City nor Castle, nor strong hold (to tell truly by figurative speech) did break and cut in funder, the links and chains that linked straight together, and strengthened the LACED. Seigniory of the Lacedamo-MONIANS whole Empire and Monarchy over all GREECE: who untill that present time were thought fo strong, as no possibility could break or funder them. Now the LACEDE-MONIANS fortuning atterwards to invade the Countrey of BOEOTIA with a mighty Army, the ATHENIANS trembling for fear of their great power, did utterly leave to protect them, and renounced the League and alliance they had made before with them. And moreover they did straightly profecute Law against those, that were accused to take part with the BOEOTIANS: whereof fome of them were put to death, other were banished from ATHENS, and the rest condemned in great sums of Money. To be short, every man faid the THEBANS were but undone, confidering they had no help, and were beloved besides of none. At that present time it sell out Pelopidas and Gorgidas were Generals over all BOROTIA for that year, who deviling to throw Pelopilis poli. a bone betwirt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDEMONIANS again, to make them fquare, they Prioritis politured this policy. There was a Captain of the LACED & MONIANS called Sphodriae, a valiant man, cy to make the cy to make the distribution of the state of small capacity, and vainly given, having a certain fond ambition and humour, perdibentantall but else of small capacity, and vainly given, having a certain fond ambition and humour perdibentantal but else of small capacity, and vainly given, having a certain fond ambition and humour, perdibentantal but else of small capacity, and vainly given, having a certain fond ambition and humour, perdibentantal but else of small capacity, and vainly given, having a certain fond ambition and multiply and the state of t that had a mind to revolt from the THEBANS. Pelopidas of himself fent a Merchant (a very friend of his) unto Sphodrias with a great fum of Money from him, and certain perswa-fions withall, which prevailed more than the Money, wishing him to attempt some greater matter, and to feek to win the haven of PIREA; a thing foon won, if he came to affault it on the fudden; and the rather, for that the ATHENIANS miffrust nothing, neither keep watch nor ward there. Moreover that he might affure himself, nothing could be better welcome to the Lords of LACED. EMONIA, then to make them Lords of the City of ATHENS also. And again, that the THEBANS being at deadly feud with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betrayed and forfaken them in their need, would not aid nor fuccour them in any respect. Sphodrias giving too light ear to this vain perswasion, took the Souldiers he had with him, and marching away by night entred the Realm of ATTICA, and went on to the City of ELEUSIN: but when he came this ther, his Souldiers were afraid, and would go no further. So his purpose being discovered, he was forced to return back to Thespies, having raifed fuch a War to the LACEDEMONIANS, as fell out to be of no small importance to them, nor easie to be pacified. For after that time, the A-THENIANS fought League and amity again with the THEBANS, and did aid them very lovingly: and moreover, putting themselves to Sea, they failed up and down, procuring and drawing to their League all fuch as were willing to rebell against the LACEDEMONIANS; and the THE-EANS befides, had many pretty skirmishes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the mean time, in their own Countrey of BOEOTIA. It istrue they came to no great Battles, but yet it was such a great learning and continual training of them in martial discipline, as the THEBANS still encreased in courage and valianmels, and waxed stronger and better Souldiers, for by those skirmishs they grew not onely expert Souldiers, but waxed more skilfull in using their weapons, than before As we read, that Antalcidas a SPART AN faid one day to King Agefilans, coming home fore hurt sying to King from Boeotia: Surely the Thebans have given you a worthy reward, for teaching them to be Souldiers against their wills. But to say truly, Agesilaus was not their Master to teach them to make Wars, but they were the good and wife Leaders of the THEBANS, who like good Woodmen in chufing their Game, could kilfully chufe both time and place to give their Enemies Battle, and make them retire again with fafety, after they had been fleshed, giving them a little taste of the fruits and commodity of Victory: but among them, Pelopidas was he that deferved most honour. For fince the first time they gave him charge of men of War, they never failed, but chose him contisually every year, either Captain of the holy Band, or Governour of BOEOTIA to long as he lived : fo that Pelopidas onely did the most things in this War. The LACEDAMONIANS were overthrown in fundry journies, that they were diffressed by the Cities of PLATEES and of THES-for their onely Fame did so terrific their Enemies that came to fight against them, that they thought with no equal force to be able to perform as much as they had done. But this Battell of TEGYRA was the first that made both them and the other GRECIANS know, that it was not the River of EUROTAS alone, nor the Valley that lieth between the Rivers of CNACION, and of BABYCE, that breedeth the valiant and hardy fighting men : but that it is in all places else, where they learn young men to be afhamed of diffhonest and vile things, and to venture their lives for honest causes, fearing more dishonourable reproach, then honourable danger. These are the People most to be feared, and are most terrible also to their Enemies. And for the holy Band we mentioned before, it are most terrible and to be is faid Gorgidas was the first erector of the same. They were three hundred chosen men entertained rible and to be by the State, and they alwaies kept within the Castle of CADMEA, and the Band was called the Towns Band : for at that time, and specially in that part of GREECE, they called the Castles and great Holds in Cities, the Towns. Other fay it was a Band of Footmen that were in love one with another. And therefore Pammenes pleasant words are noted, saying, that Nestor could not skill to fet an Army in Battell ray, seeing he gave the GRECIANS counsell, in the lliades of Homer, that they should set them in Battell ray, every Countrey and Tribe by themselves:

gainft their Enemies.

Men loring For, faid he; one friend should rather be fet by another that loves together: because in danger, men together, light commonly do little regard their Countrevenen, or such as are of their Tribe. But men that do love commonly do little regard their Countreymen, or fuch as are of their Tribe. But men that do love one another, can never be broken nor overcome ; for the paffion of love that entertaineth each others affection, for affections fake, doth keep them from for faking one another. And those that are beloved, being ashamed to do any vile and dishonest thing before those that love them, for very love will flick one by another to the death. And fure the reason is good, if it be true that lovers do indeed more regard them they love, though they be absent, then other that be present. As appeareth by the example of him, that being striken down to the ground, his Enemy lifting up his Sword to kill him, he prayed him he would give him his deaths wound before, left his friend that loved him, feeing a wound on his back, should be ashamed of him. It is reported also, that Iolaus being beloved of Hercules, did help and accompany him in all his Labours and Quarrels. Whereupon Aristotle writeth, that unto his time, such as loved heartily together, became sworn Brethren one to another, upon Iolaus Tomb. And therefore methinks it is likely, that this Band was first called the holy Band, by the self-same reason that Plato calleth a lover, a divine friend by Godsappointment. It is written also, that this Band was never broken, nor overthrown before the Battell of CHERONEA. After that Battell, Philip taking view of the slain bodies, he stayed in that place where the four hundred men of that Band lay dead on the ground, one hard by another, and all of them flain and thruft through with Pikes on their breafts, whereat he wondred much: and being told him that it was the Lovers Band, he fell a weeping for pity, saying : Wo be to them that think these men did, or suffered any evil or dishonest thing. And to be short, the misfortune of Laim, that was flain by his own Brother O Edipm, was not the first original cause of this custom, that the Thebans began to be in love one with another, as the Poets write: but they were their first Law makers, who perceiving them to be a stout and fierce Nation on nature, they fought even from their youth to make them gentle and civil, and therefore in all their actions both of sport and earnest, they continually acquainted them with playing of the Flute, being highly efteemed of them in those days. They brought in the use also to make love in the midst of their youllfull Sports and Exercises of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a civil life. And therefore they had reason that gave the goddess Harmonia to the THEBANS, for Defendor and Patroness of their City, who was begotten (as they say) between Mars and Venus. For that giveth us to understand, that where force and warlike courage is joyned with grace, to win and perswade, all things by this union and accord are brought to a goodly, profitable, and most perfect Government. Now, to return again to the matter of this holy Band of the THEBANS, Gorgidas dividing it in the former Ranks, and placing it all along the Front of the Battell of the Footmen, it did not appear what they were able to do of themselves, for that he brought them not all into one Body: so as thereby they might see what service the whole Company could do being together, confidering that it was divided and mingled amongst many other, that were a great deal of lefs value then themselves. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantness before, when they fought about him of themselves, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would never after divide nor feparate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire Body that had all his Members, he would alwaies begin with them to give a Charge in his most dangerous Battels. For, as we see in running of Coaches at Games, that Horses being tied all together in a Front, do run saster and stronger then they do when they are loofe, and put to it alone: and not for that they being many together, do break through the air better, but for that the contention and envy between them to over-run one another, doth indeed fet their hearts and itomachs on fire. Even so he thought, that valiant men giving one another a defire and envy to do well, should have the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers fight. But the LACEDEMONIANS afterwards being at peace and league with all the other GRECIANS, proclaimed open Wars against the THEBANS onely : and King Cleombrotus went to invade them with an Army of ten thousand Footmen, and a thouland Horsemen. Whereupon the THEBANS were not onely in the like danger they stood in before to lose their liberty; but the LACEDEMONIANS did openly threaten they would utterly destroy them for ever : so that all the Countrey of BOBOTIA stood in greater fear then ever they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his House to go to the Wars, his Wife bringing him to the doors to take her leave of him, weeping, the prayed him heartily to look well to him-felf. But heanfwered her again: My good Wife, it is for private Souldiers to be carefull of them. Pelopidas felves. but not for Captains: for they must have an eye to fave others lives. And when he came to Princely Asithe Camp, he found the Captains and the Lieutenants of the Army, in fundry opinions : and he lwer. was the first that agreed with Epaminondas opinion, who thought it best they should give Battell to the Enemies. Pelopidas at that time was neither Governour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of the Army, but onely Captain of the holy Band : notwithstanding they had great affiance in him, and gave him great Authority in Counsell concerning their affairs : such as became a man that had made To good teltimony of his natural love and affection to his Countrey, as he had done. Now being determined in Counsell, that they should give the Enemies Battell, they all mustered together in the Valley of LEUCTRES, where he had a Vision in his Dream, that troubled him very much. In that Valley there are the Tombs of the Daughters of one Scedafus, which by reason of the place. they call the LEUCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had been defiled and ravilhed by certain Guests of the SPARTANS that lay in their House, travelling that way. This act being so horrible and wicked, the poor Father of these defiled Virgins, could neither have justice nor revenge of the LACEDEMONIANS, and therefore after he had banned and curfed the LACEDE-MONIANS with most horrible and execrable railings and curses as might be possible, he killed himfelf upon the Graves of his Daughters. The LACEDAMONIANS had many fundry Oracles, Pro- See what phecies, and Signs of the gods to warn them, to take heed of the wrath of the Leuctrides: low where ju howbeit every man understood not the fignification of this Prophecy, but were deceived by the equi-fice is denied. vocation of the name. For there was a little Town in the Countrey of LACONIA, standing upon the Sea fide, called LEUCTRUM : and in ARCADIA also by the City of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another Town called by the same name. This misfortune chanced long before the Battell of LEUCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming in his Tent, thought he faw in a Vision the Daughters of Scedafus weeping about their Graves, and curfing the LACEDEMONIANS ; and that he faw their Father also, commanding him to facrifice a red Maidento his Daughters, if they would obtain the Victory. This commandment at the first, seemed very cruel and wicked: whereupon when he arose, he went to the Prognosticators, and Generals of the Army, and told them his Dream. So Dream and fome of them faid, this was no matter to be lightly passed over, but to be considered of, alledging Vision in the many examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the Son of Creon in old time, and of Macarea Fields of Leuthe Daughter of Hercules. And yet of latter memory, the wife Pherecydes, whom the LACEDE. Hres. MONIANS flew, and whose skin their Kings do keep at this day, by commandment of an Oracle. And Leonidas, who following a Prophecy of the gods, did as it were facrifice himself, for the fafety of GREECE. And furthermore, the young boys which Themistocles did facrifice to Bacchus Omeftes (to fay, eating raw flesh) before the Battell of SALAMINA. And all these Sacrifices were acceptable to the gods, as the Victories following did plainly thew. In contrary manner also King Agefilans, coming from those very places, from whence King Agamemnon came in the time of the Agefilans Wars of Troin, and going also against the same Enemies, dreamed one night in the City of Au-Decam. LIDE, he saw the goddes Diana, asking him his Daughter for Sacrifice. But he tenderly loving her, would by no means perform it; and thereupon was compelled to break off his Journey before he had executed his Enterprize, and departed with small honour. Other to the contrary stood to it flourly, and faid, it was not to be done. For, fo cruell, abominable, and brutish a Sacrifice, could flourly, and faid, it was not to be done. For, to cruell, abominable, and pruting a sacrince, could not be acceptable to any of the gods, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: confidering that concerning the concerning that the sacring of the gods. they be no impressions in the air, nor Gianes that rule the World, but the onely mighty and eter-God. nall God, Father of gods and men. And to beleeve that either gods or demi-gods do delight in murder, or shedding of mans bloud, it is a meer mockery and folly. But admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that have no power at all : for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirit, when they have such damnable horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide fill with them. Now the Generals and Heads of the Army of the THEBANS being of fun-Gods providry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraid then before, by reason of their disagreement: a dence and sudyoung Mare-colt, or Filly, breaking by chance from other Mares, running and flinging through den aid the Camp, came to stay right against them. Then every man began to look upon her, and to mark what a fair Filly it was, and red coloured every where, and what a pride she took with her felf to hear her own neighing. Theocrains then the Soothsayer being amongst them, did behold her, and knew straight what the Filly meant, and so cried out forthwith : O happy Pelopidas, lo here is the Sacrifice thou lookest for, seek no other Virgin for thy Sacrifice, but take this that God himself doth send thee. When Theoristus had faid to, they took the Filly, and laid The Filly her upon the Tomb of Scedafus Daughters, and put Garlands of Flowers about her, as they han flat a and dled other Sacrifices : and then after the Prayers made to the gods , they did facrifice her with great tactificed. joy, and told Pelopidas Vision in his Dream the night before through all the Camp, and the Sacrifice they had made also according to the fignification thereof. Moreover when they came to joyn Battel F. Epaminondas being Generall, drew all his Army on the left hand, because he would bring the right Wing of the Enemies Army (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GRECIANS their Friends and Allies, that were fet in the other Wing of their Battell :

and running in great fury with his Squadron of three hundred men, he fet upon Cleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put forth the right Wing, and joyn them together again. And so he found the LACEDEMONIANS not yet fetled in their Ranks, and brake them in this difafter,

thrufting one in anothers place to put themselves again in order : notwithstanding the LACEDA-MONIANS of all other men were the onely Captains and most expert Souldiers in Martiall Discipline, as men to trained and practifed, that no fudden altering, of form or order in their Ranks, could either trouble or disorder them. For they were men so trained, that they could turn head or side upon any fudden occasion offered, and could fight and order themselves in Battell every way alike. So Epaninondas going to give the onset upon them alone, with the whole force of his Battell together, not tarrying for others: and Pelopidus also with an incredible courage and readiness, presenting himfelt in Battell before them, did put them into fuch a terrible fear, that they clean forgot their skill in fighting, and their wonted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backs, and there were more LACEDEMONIANS flain at that day, then ever were before in any former Battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither Governour of BOEOTIA, nor Generall of all the Army, but onely Captain of the holy Band : did notwithstanding win as much Honour and Glory of this Victory, as Epaminondas, that was Governour of BOEOTIA, and Generall of all the Army. Indeed alterwards they were both Governours of BOEOTIA together, when they invaded the Countrey of PELOPONNESUS: where they made most part of the Cities and People rebell against the LACEDEMONIANS, and take their part, as the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all AR-CADIA, and the best part of LACONIA felt: notwithstanding it was in the heart of Winter, and in the shortest days of the year, and towards the latter end also of the last Moneth of their years Authority and Rule, having not many days to continue in Office, being forced to leave at Theber, for their Authority, upon pain of death if they did reitife, unto other Officers new chosen, the beginning of the next Moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, and Governours also of the Countrey of BOEOTIA, what for fear to incur the danger of the Law, as also to avoid the trouble to lie in Camp in the sharpest of Winter: they did urge and perswade them to bring the Armyback again into their Countrey. But Pelopidas was the first that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, and wan the other THEBANES also to consent unto it, to be contented to be led by them, to give affault to the City felf of Sparta. So, through their perswasions they passed over the River of Eurotas, and took many little Towns of the LACEDEMONIANS, and wafted and destroyed all the Countrey to the Sea fide, leading under their Ensigns an Army of threefcore and ten thouland fighting men, and all GRECIANS, the THEBANES not making up the 70224 with 70 twelfth part of them. Now, the honour and great reputation of these two persons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought their friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any refolution of Counfell or publick order, and never opened their mouths againft them, but willingly marched under their conduction. And in my opinion, truly methinks it is the first and chiefest point in the Law of Nature, that he that is weak, not able to defend himfelf, should lean to one that is ftrong, and able to defend both. Even much like to fresh-water Souldiers, and raw Sea-men, that lying at Sea in calm weather, and in fafe Harbour, are as lufty and brag with the Mafters and Boat-Swains as may be : but let a little ftornt of weather come upon them fuddenly, and that they be in any danger, then they look on the Masters, hoping for no life but at their hands. And even in like manner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all Affemblies of Counfell they would ever jar and strive with the THEBANES, for Honour and Superiority in the Army : yet when any Battell came to be fought, wherein they faw there was danger, then their Peacocks bravery was gone, and they were glad to obey their Generalls commandment. In this Journey they brought all the Cities of the Province of ARCADIA to be in League with them, and took all the Countrey of MESSENIA from the LACEDEMONIANS, which they peaceably enjoyed : and called home again all the ancient Inhabitants of the fame, and reftored them to their Countrey, and replenished the City of ITHOME. Then returning afterwards into their Countrey by the City of CENCHREES, they overthrew the ATHENIANS that came to trouble them, in entring into the Straight of Peloponnesus, supposing to have stopped their passage. Thus was the valiantness of these two worthy men greatly commended and honoured of every body, for so many notable Exploits and Victories as they had won, and their marvellous good fuccels, greatly wondered at. But as their Glory and renown increased abroad, so did their Country mens malice and envy increase against them at home : who had prepared such a welcome home for them, as was to bad and vile for to honourable Service as they had done. For Epaminonau and Pelopidas both, at their return were accused of Treason. For there was a speciall Law at The-BES, that commanded all such as should happen to be Governours of BOEOTIA, to resign their Office immediately to the new Officers elect, at the beginning of the first Moneth of the year, which in BOEOTIA they call BOUGATION; and they had kept it four whole Moneths above their term appointed, in which time they had done all that we have spoken of before, as well in the Province of MESSENIA and of ARCADIA, as also in the Countrey of LACONIA. Pelopidae was the first of the two that was called in by Protes, therefore he stood in the greater danger:

The ingratitude of the Thebans towards Pelopidis and Ep4minontas The Law Bonhowbeit in the end, they were both discharged again. As for Epaminondas; he took his Accusation and the attempt of his Enemies (whereby they fought to have cast them both away) quietly Esaminendas enough: judging, that patience to those that deal in State and Government, is a great shew of patience. force and magnanimity. But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more cholerick, and fet on be-Pelopidas confides by some of his friends, did take this occasion to be revenged. Meneclidas the Orator was one democh Meof those that came into Charons house with Pelopidas and Melon: but notwithstanding the THE-naclilas a sedi-BAN'S did nothing honour him, as they did the reft. He taking this ill at their hands, being martious Onator vellous eloquent of speech, but vicioully given otherwaies, and a man of a vile and mischievous named accuser. ture : did fondly abuse his Eloquence, fallly accusing those that were his betters, in honesty and credit. And not being contented with this first accusation, he practised so commonly, that he put &paminondas one year from being Governour of BOEOTIA, which he fued for : and moreover, he was ever against him in all matters of State he took in hand. But he could never bring Pelopidas out of favour with the People: and therefore he fought to make debate betwixt him and Charon, For it is the common trick of all spightfull persons, who when they cannot be thought so honest The practice men, as those whom they envy, to go about to prove that they are not so honest and meet men, as of frightfull those whom they preser and commend. So, in all his Orations he made to the People, he continuement. ally extolled and commended Charons noble Acts and Victories, and specially that Victory above other, which the THEBANS won before the Journey of LEUCTRES, in a Skirmish of Horsemen, that was before the City of PLATERS, he having charge of the fame : of the which he would leave his memory. Androclides a Cyzicenian and Painter, was at a price with the THEBANS to paint them fome other Battel in a Table, and he did draw this Work in the City thersdid paint felf of Thebans to but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the Thebans fell out against and fee forth the LACEDEMONIANS, and War followed on the neck of that, whereupon the Painter for- their Battels, fook THEBES, leaving his Work in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANS kept this Table by them, and this Meneclidas moved the People they would hang it up in some Temple of publick place, with an Inscription upon it, saying thus: This was Charons Victory; of purpose to deface and obscure the Glory of Pelopidas and of Epaminondas. Too vain and fond was his ambition, to fet before so many noble Battels and Victories, one simple overthrow of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meanest Gentlemen of all SPARTA was slain, and forty other with him: and this was all he did. Pelopidas misliked Meneclidas motion, maintaining that it was directly against the Laws of THEBES, which did expresly forbid, that no private person should be honoured with the Title of common Victory, but willed the Glory thereof should be attributed to all the People generally. Indeed Pelopidas in his Orations did greatly praise and commend Charon, notwithstanding he made open proof, how Meneclidas was an envious and spightfull detractor, and a naughty wicked man, oftentimes asking the THEBANS, if they themselves were worthy of no honour? so as in the end he caused Menectidas to be condemned in a great sum of Money, But he finding himself unable to pay it, being so great a sum, practised afterwards to alter the whole State and Government. I thought good to dilate this at large, because methinks it doth fomewhat declare Pelopidas nature and manners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander Alexander the the Tyran: of PHERES, was at open Wars with many People of THESSALY, and did use all Tyrant of policy he could, to bring them all to his obedience. Whereupon the free Cities fent their Ambassa. Phores. dours unto THEBES, to pray them to fend them a Captain with an Army to aid them. Then Pelopidas seeing Epaminondas occupied about the Wars of Peloponnesus, did offer himself to the THESSALIAN Ambassadours, being loth to drown his experience and sufficiency in Wars, with unprofitable and tedious idleness, knowing that in those parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other Captain. Now when he came with his Army into THESSALY, the City of Larissa yeelded prefently unto him : where the Tyrant Alexander came to meet with Lariffa City. him, and to pray him to treat a Peace betwist him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attempting to bring it to pass, seeking instead of a Tyrant to make him a gentle, just, and lawfull, Governour of THESSALY. But when he faw no perswasions could take place with the Tyrant, and that he grew more stubborn and untractable, and would not hear reason : and moreover, that he heard many grievous complaints of his great cruclties, and how they accused him to be a marvellous diffolute and unruly person in all his doings, and extreamly covetous besides : then he began to speak roundly to him, and to handle them roughly. But the Tyrant thereupon stole away secretly from him, and sled with his Guard and Souldiers about him. So Pelopidas leaving the THESSALIANS out of all fear and danger of the Tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amity one with the other, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolomy made War at that time with Alexander, being King of MACEDON, they both having fent for him to hear and determine the quarrel betwixt them, and so to help him that had the right, against him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and restored the banished men of either side, to their Lands and Goods again. For affirrance of Peace, he took the Kings Brother Philip of Matein Hostage, whose name was Philip, and thirty other Children of the Noblest mens Sons of MA- don delivered in rounge, whose name was roung, and unity out cannot be Grecians see, that the Refer Heliag CEDON, whom he brought away with him to THIBES, to let the Grecians see, that the Refer Peloplas. putation of the THEBANS Power stretched far, and the Renown also of their manner of Government and Justice. It is the same Philip, that made War afterwards with the GRECIANS, to take their Liberty from them, howbeit being but a Boy at that time, he was brought up at THERES in Pammenes house. And this is the cause, why some thought Philip did follow Epaminondas manner:

and it might be peradventure, he did learn of him to be quick and ready in the Wars, which was indeed but a piece of Epaminondas vertue. But as for the continency, justice, magnanimity, and elemency, which were the speciall points that made Epaminondas of great same: Philip could neither by nature, education, or fludy, ever attain unto. The THESSALIANS having fent afterwards to Theres, to complain of Alexander the Tyrant of Pheres, that did again molest and trouble the free Cities of THESSALY, Pelopidas was fent thither Ambaffadour with Ismenias, carrying no Power with him from THEBES, little thinking he should have needed to have made Wars: whereupon he was compelled to take men of the Countrey felf, upon the inftant necessity offered. At the very fame time also, all MACEDON was up in Arms: for Prolomy had flain the King, and ulurped the Kingdom, and the servants and friends of the dead King called upon Pelopidas for aid, who defiring to come even upon the fact, and having brought no men of War out of his own Countrey with him, did prefently leavy certain men where he was, and fo marched forward with them against Ptolomy. Now Ptolomy when both their Powers mer, did corrupt the Souldiers Pelopidas had brought, with Money to take his part. But notwithstanding this policy he had practifed, yet he was afraid of the Name onely, and greatness of Pelopidas Reputation: wherefore he went neu, yet ne was an and the name of the nam ing of him, he made promife, and bound it by Oath, that he would keep the Realm for the Brethren of the dead King, and that he would take all those for his friends or Enemies, whom the THE-EANS did either love or hate. As for affurance of his promife, he gave him his Son Philoxenus in hoftage, and fifty other of his friends, all the which Pelopidus fent unto THEBES. But in the mean time, being marvelloufly offended with the Treason of the Souldiers against him, understanding the most part of their Goods, their Wives and Children, were in the City of PHARSALE, he thought if he could win that, it were a marvellous good way for him to be revenged of the treachery of the Souldiers against him : whereupon he leavied certain THESSALIANS, and went to that City. Pelopidas was no sooner come thither, but Alexander the Tyrant arrived also with his Army. Pelopidas supposing he had come to justifie himself, clearing the complaints of the Thes-SALIANS made against him: went to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delighted in murder and shedding of bloud. Nevertheless, he hoped he durst not have attempted any thing against him, for the Authority and Seigniories sake of THEBES, by whom he was Pelopidatishen fent thither, as also for his own Reputation. But the Tyrant seeing him slenderly accompanied, and Pelopidatishen without Train of Souldiers, took him Prisoner, and wan the City of Pharsale at that prethe Tyrant A- fent time. But this act of his put his Subjects in a great fear, who feeing him commit fo shamefull a deed againft all equity, did think straight he meant to spareno man, but would use men, and all things else that came in his hands, like a desperate man, and one that reckoned himself cast away. lexan.ler at But when the THEBANS understood this news, they were marvellous forry, and straight sent an Pharfale. Army thither, appointing other Captains then Epaminondas: because then they had some misliking of him. Alexander the Tyrant having brought Pelopidas in the mean time to PHERES, did suffer any man that would at the first to come to fee him, and speak with him : supposing his imprisonment had killed his heart, and had made him very humble. But when he was told the contrary, how Pelopidas did comfort the Citizens of PHERES, and willed them to be of good chear, telling them the hour was now come, that the Tyrant should smart for all the mischiefs he had done; and that he Pelopidas fent him word to his face, he had no reason to hang and put his poor Citizens daily to death as he did, with fundry kinds of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him; and did let him alone, knowing that if ever he got out of his hands, he would be revenged of him. The Tyrant wondring ar this great flomack of his, and at his marvellous conflancy, fearing nothing: asked what he meant to long for hasty death? Pelopidas being told what he faid, answered him again : Marry, said he, because thou shouldst die the sooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. Aster this answer, the Tyrant would never suffer any man to come and speak with him again. But Thebe the Wife Thebe, that was the Daughter of the Tyrant Jason deceased, and Wife at that time of Alexander of Alexander, the Tyrant, hearing report of Pelopidus noble mind and courage by his Keepers: she had a marvellous desire to see him, and to speak with him. Bur when she came to see him, like a Woman she could not at the first discern the greatness of his noble heart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in such misery : yer conjecturing by exterior shew, noting his simple Apparell, his hairs and beard grown very long, and how poorly he was ferved, and worfe enterrained: the thought with her self his case was to be pitted, and that he was in no state meet for the glory of his Name; wherewith she fell a weeping for compassion. Pelopidas, that knew not what she was, began to muse at the first, but when it was told him she was Jasons Daughter, then he courteously shuted her for her Father Jasons sake, who while he lived was his very good friend. So Thebe said unto him : My Lord Pelopidas, I pity thy poor Lady and Wife. Truly 10 do I pity thee, quoth Pelopidas again to her: that thou being no Priloner, canst abide such a wicked Alexander. This answer tickled Thebe at the heart, who with great impatience did bear the cruelry, violence, and villany of the Tyrant her Husband : that befides all other infamous acts of his deteftable life, committed Sodomy with her youngest Brother. So she oft visiting Pelopidas, and boldly making her moan to him, telling him closely all the injuries her Husband offered her : through Pelopidas talk with her , by little and little the grew to abbor him, and to conceive a hate in heart against him, defiring revenge on him.

But now the Captains of the THEBANS that were fent to deliver Pelopidas, being entred into

THESSALY with their Army: whether it was through default of ignorance, or their milhap: they returned home with shame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANES at their return home condemned them every man in the sum of ten thousand Drachmes, and sent Epaminondas thither again with another Army: at whose coming, all Thessaly rose incontinently for the reputation Epiminonlas of fo great a (aptain. And his fortune was fo good, that he had in a manner utterly overthrown fent into Thefthe whole State of the Tyrant: his friends and Captains were so much afraid, and his Subjects on the fally with an other fide fo well disposed to rebell, and marvellous glad for the hope they had, quickly to see the Ty-Aimy. rant have his deferved hire, for all his former wicked deeds he had committed. Notwithstanding, Epaminondas preferring the delivery and fafety of Pelopidas, before the confideration of his own Honour and Glory, and fearing lest Alexander feeing himself in danger to be turned out of all he had, falling into despair like a bedlem Beast, would bend all his desperation and fury against Pelopidas; he drew these Wars out in length, compassing him round about, but not fiercely setting upon him. with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying still, thereby to soften the cruel mind of this Tyrant, going on in this gentle fort, and partly to cut his comb and extream pride, but specially to preferve Pelopidas from the danger and cruelly of his beaftly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruel man, and one that never regarded reason, nor justice in any fort, confidering how he made fome men to be buried alive, and others to be put in the skins of Bears and wild Bores, and then to The brutish fet Hounds upon them to tear them in pieces, or else himself for his pastime would kill them, with cruelty of Ashooting or throwing of Darts at them, And in the Cities of MELIBEA and of Scotusa, both lexander the of them being in league and friendship with him, he spying time one day when the Citizens were as-Tyrant. fembled in Council together, fuddenly compaffed them in with his Guard and Souldiers, and put them every one to the Sword, even the little Children. And he confecrated the Dart also wherewith he had slain his own Uncle Polyphron, and having put Garlands upon it, he did facrifice to it, as to a god, and called it Tychon, as one would fay, happy killer. And another time being in a Theatre, where the Tragedy of Troades in Euripides was played, he went out of the Theatre, and fent word to the Players notwithstanding, that they should go on with their Play, as if he had been still among them: faying that he came not away for any milliking he had of them or of the Play, but because he was ashamed his People should see him weep, to see the miseries of Hecuba and Andromacha played: and that they never faw him pity the death of any one man, of so many of the Citizens as he had caufed to be flain. The guilty conscience therefore of this cruel and Heathen Tyrant, did make him tremble at the onely name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common Proverb faith:

So he sent straight unto Epaminondas to excuse himself. But Epaminondas would in no wise suffer the THEBANS, through his means, to make League with fuch an Helhound : onely he yeelded to abstinence of Arms for thirty days, upon delivery of Pelopidas and Ismenias into his hands, with Epiminondas whom he straight returned into THEBES. Now the THEBANS being advertised that the LA- delivered Pelo-CEDEMONIANS and the ATHENIANS did fend Ambassadours to Arraxerxes the mighty King pidas out of of PERSIA, to make League with him: they fent to him Pelopidas for them also, being wisely con- Artiscrees sidered of them to send a man of such Fame and Reputation. For Pelopidas passing first through King of Persia, Countries subject to the King of Persia, his Fame was such where he came, that the Peoples talk Pelopidas sent was onely of him. For the report of the famous Battels he had won of the LACEDAMONIANS, Ambuffadour was not onely carried into the next Regions and Countreys of Asia: but fince the first news of the Persa. Journey of LEUCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas having after that won Victory upon Victory, his estimation grew so great, as it was blown abroad through the World, even to the highest and furthest parts of the East Countreys. And when he came to the King of PERSIA'S Court, the Princes, great Lords, and Captains of Persia that faw him, had him in great admiration, faying : Lo this is he that conquered the LACED. EMONIANS, and took all their Seigniory and Authority from them, both by Sea and by Land, and drave the SPARTANS beyond the River of EUROTAS, and from Mount TAUGETUM, who not long before made Wars with the great King of Persia, being led under their King Agesilans, even in the midst of Asia, for the Realms of Suse, and of ECBATANE. So King Artaxerxes felf was very glad of his coming, and prai- Pelopidas of Suse, and of ECBATANE. So King Artaxerxes lelt was very giau or ins coming, and praifed him above them all, and made his estimation greater then it was before, by his great and honourared of the King ble entertaining of him, meaning thereby to return the honour to himfelf again : because men of Perfix. should think that the most famous men of the World came to honour him, and to fee his Court, as estreeming both him and his greatness, the onely happiness of the World. But when he had seen his face, and heard him speak, and perceived that his words were much greater then the ATHENI-ANS, and plainer then the LACED EMONIANS: he then was further in love with him then before, and without difguifing, he did honour and favour him above all the other Ambaffadours, who found that he made more estimation of him, then of them all. Notwithstanding, he seemed to bear greater good will unto Antalcidas LACEDEMONIAN, then to any other of the GRECIANS : for that one day being at the Table, he took a Garland of Flowers from his own head, and washed it in perfuming water, and fent it unto him. Indeed he did not use Pelopidas with that open familiarity, yet did he fend him the goodlieft and richeft Prefents he could devife, and granted him besides all his requests he made unto him : which were, that all the People of GREECE should be free : that the City and Countrey of MESSINA should be inhabited again : and that the Citizens of THEBES by their Succeffours should be taken, as ancient friends and Allies of the Kings of Persia. So when he had received these Answers, he returned home again, and would by no means accept any

feth the great halfadour for the Athenians, put to death for taking great gifs of the King of

of the great Presents the King had offered him : which caused the other Ambassadours of the Gre-Pelapidas refu- CIANS to be fo ill welcome home to their Cities. For among other, Timagoras was accused to the ATHENIANS, and condemned to die, and was executed: which if they did in respect of the great Presents he had taken of the King, truly they had reason, and it was worthily done of them. For he Attaxers:. took not onely Gold and Silver enough, as much as they would give him: but received a very rich Bed also, and Persian Chamberlains to make and dress it up, as if no Grecian Servants of his could have ferved that turn. Moreover, he received fourfcore milch Kine to the Pail, and Neatheards to keep them, having need of Cowes Milke belike, to heal a Difease that fell upon him : and would needs be carried in a Litter upon mens arms from the Kings Court, unto the Mediserraneum Sea, the King rewarded them for their pains that carried him, with four Talents. Yet it feemed the Gifts he took did not offend the ATHENIANS fo much, confidering that Epicrates (a Drudge or Tankerd-bearer) did not onely confess before the People, how he had taken Gifts of the King of Persia : but faid furthermore, that he would have a Law made, that in flead of the nine Officers they did yearly choose to rule the whole City, they should choose nine of the poorest and meaneft Citizens, and fend them Ambassadours unto the King of Persia, that they might return home rich men with Gifts. The People laughed to hear him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they had demanded : and confidering that Pelopidas elimation and worthiness did more prevail and take better effect, then all the Orations the other could make, and specially to a Prince that fought always to entertain those GRECIANS, which were of greatest force and power in the Wars. This Ambassage did greatly increase every mans love and good will unto Pelopidas, because of the replenishing again of Messina with Inhabitants, and infranchizing and fetting at liberty of all the other Grecians. But the Tyrant Alexander of PHERE'S, returning again to his old accustomed cruelty, and having destroyed many Cities of THESSALY, and placed his Garifons through all the Countrey of the PHTHIOTES, ACHAI-ANS, and MAGNESIANS: the Cities being advertised of Pelopidas return again to Thebes, they fent Ambassadours immediately to THEBES, to pray them to fend them an Army, and namely Pelopidas for Captain, to deliver them from the milerable bondage of the Tyrant. The The-BANES willingly granted them, and put all things in readiness very suddenly. But Pelopidas being ready to fet forward in his journey, there fell a fudden Eclipse of the Sun, so as at noon day it was very dark in Thebbs. Pelopidas feeing every man afraid of this Eclipfe above, he would not compell the People to depart with this fear, nor with fo ill hope to hazard the loss of seven thoufand THEBANS, being all billed to go this journey : but notwithstanding, he put himself alone cond Journey into the Thessalians hands, with three hundred Horlemen of ftrangers that were glad to ferve Tyrant Alexwith him, with whom he took his Journey against the Soothsayers minds, and against the good will ander of Pheof all his Crizens, who thought this Eclipse did threaten the death of some great person like himfelf. But Pelopidas though he needed no four to be revenged upon the Tyrant Alexander, being The Eclipse of by nature hot, and defirous of himfelf to revenge the spight and villany he had offered him : yet he the Sun made had a further hope to find the Tyrantshoule divided against himself, by the former talk he had with the Thebans his Wife Thebe, in time of his imprisonment there. Nevertheless, the Fame and Reputation of the Journey undertaken, did wonderfully increase his noble courage, and the rather because he was desirous (all he could) the GRECIANS should see, that at the very same time when the LACEDA-MONIANS did fend Governours and Captains to Dionysius the Tyrant of SICILE, to ferve and aid him, and that the ATHENIANS as hirelings took pay of the Tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whole honour they had fet up a Statue of Brals in their City, as unto their Saviour : the The-BANS onely at the felf-fame time took Arms against them, to deliver those whom the Tyrants oppressed, and sought to root out all tyrannicall Government over the GRECIANS. So when he came to the City of PHARSALE, and had gathered his Army together, he went prefently to the Field to meet with the Tyrant. Alexander perceiving Pelopidas had very few THEBANS about him, and that he had twice fo many THESSALIANS with him, then the other had: hewent unio the Temple of THETIS, to meet with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was coming against him with a great Power, Pelopidas answered him straight, All the better, we shall kill by the People of Thebes, unto the more. Now in the midft of the Valley, there are certain round Hills of a pretty height, which the Tyrant A- they commonly call the Dogs head : they both strived which of their Footmen should first get those Hills. Pelopidas having a great number of Horfemen, and good men at Arms in the Field, fent them before to give charge upon the Enemies, that prefied to win the vantage of the place : and having overthrown them, they followed the chase all the Valley over. But in the mean time Alexander having his Footmen by, marched forwards and got the Hills, because the THESSALIANS that were further off, came too late : notwithstanding when they came to the Hills, they fought forcibly to climbe them up, being very high and fleep: but Alexander coming down the Hill, gave charge upon them to their disadvantage, and slew the first that gave the attempt to get up against the Hill: and the refidue being fore hurt, retired again without their purpofe. Pelopidas feeing that, founded the Retreat for the Horsemen that followed the chase, to repair to the Standard, and commanded them they should set upon the Footmen of the Enemies that were in Battel ray : and he himfelf ran to help those that fought to win the Hills. So he took his Target on his arm, and passing through the Rereward, he got to the foremost Ranks: to whom, the fight of his person did luftily to fet again upon them. And yet they did abide two or three onfets. Howbeit in the end perceiving those men did still more fiercely force to get up the Hill, and moreover, how their Horsemen were come in from the chase : they gave way, and left them the place, retiring back by little and little. Then Pelopidan having won the Hills, flayed on the top of them, viewing the Army of his Enemies, which were not yet returned from their flying, but waved up and down in great diforder. And there he looked all about, to fee if he could spie out Alexander: and at the length he found him out amongst others, in the right Wing of his Battel, fetting his men again in order, and incouraging of them. After he had fet eye on him, it was no holding of him back, his heart fo rose against him upon fight of him, that giving place to wrath, he neither regarded his person, nor the intent of his Tourney, but returning far before his men, he cryed with a loud voice to the Tyrant, and challenged the Combate of him. The Tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight with him, but fled, and hid himfelf amongst his Souldiers. But for his Souldiers, the first that thought to set upon Pelopidas, was slain by him, and many left dead in the Field. The residue standing fourly to it, and close together, did pass his Curaces through with their long Pikes, and thrust him into the breaft. The THESSALIANS feeing him thus fore handled and diffrested, for pity sake came running from the top of those Hills, to the place where Pelopidas was, to help him. But even canner tunning from the top of the territory people as they came, he tell down dead before them. Then did they together with their Horiemen fo fiercely people. fer upon them, that they made the whole Battel of the Enemies to flie; and following them in chale flain, a great way from that place, they covered the Valley with dead bodies, for they flew above three thousand men. It is no marvell, if the Thebans that were at Pelopidas death, took it very heavily, and lamented bitterly : calling him their Father, their Saviour and Mafter, as one that had taught them the worthiest things that might be learned of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other friends and Confederates also of the City of THEBES, besides their exceeding in setting out . their common Proclamations and Edicts in praise of his memory, and doing him all the honour that could be due to the most rare and excellent person that ever was : they did yet more shew their love and affection towards him, by their passing great forrow and mourning they made for him. For it is The great lafaid, that they that were at the Battel, did not put off their Armour, nor unbridle their Horfes, nor mentation and would dress their wounds, hearing tell of his death, before they went first and saw his body, not yet mourning for cold with fighting, laying great heaps of the Enemies Spoils about it, as if he could have told what Pelopidas death they had done : nor before they had clipped off their own hairs, and the hairs of their Horfes, in token of forrow. And many of them also, when they were come into their Tents and Pavillions, would neither have fire, eat, nor drink : and all in the Camp were full of forrow and mourning, as if they had not won a notable Victory, but had been overthrown and made subject by the Tyrant. Afterwards when the news of his death was spread through all the Countrey, the Magifrates of every City through which Pelopidas body was conveyed, went to receive it very honourably, accompanied with all the young men, the Priests and children carrying Tokens and Crowns of Triumph, and other Ornaments of Gold; and when his Funerall day was come, and that his body should be carried to be buried, the oldest and the noblest persons of the THESSALIANS went unto the THEBANS, and prayed them that they might have the burying of him: and one among them being the mouth of the reft, spake in this manner to the THEBANS. "My Lords of THEBES, The Otation "our good beloved Friends and Confederates, we onely crave this good furn at your hands, where of the The flat-"in you shall much honour us, and in our great calamity somewhat also comfort us. For we shall and to the The-" never more accompany. Pelopidas alive, nor require his honourable deferts to us, that he shall ever bane. "know them. But if it please you to let us handle his body with our hands, and that we may bury "him, and fet forth his Obsequies, we will imagine then at the least, that you do think that which "we our felves do certainly beleeve : That we THESSALIANS, not you THEBANS, have re-"ceived the greater loss of both. For you have lost indeed a worthy Captain, and we have not "onely received the like lofs with you, but the hope also of recovering our Liberty. For how dare "we again fend to you for another Captain, when we cannot redeliver you Pelopidas? The THE-BANS hearing their Petition, granted their defire: and in mine opinion, no Funerals could be done with greater Pomp and Honour, then the THESSALIANS performed his, being men that reckon not Dignity, Magnificence, and Pomp, to confift in Ornaments of Ivory, nor of Purple : as Philistin doth serit out, who praiseth to the Moon the burying of Dionysins the Tyrant of MYRACUSA, which was the end of his Tyranny, as a fumptuous conclusion of a stately | ragedy. And Alexander the Great, at the death of Ephessian, did not onely cliphis Horse hairs and Mules, but plucked down manner of also the Battlements of the Walls of the City: because it should appear, that the very Walls them- forow of Afelves did mourn for his death, shewing that deformity in stead of their former beauty. But all such lexander the things are done onely by force and compulsion, upon the Lords commandments, which do but rattle Great, for the up envy against their memory for whom they are done, and harred of them that are against their with death of E-conftrained to do the thing they milliked: and are no just proofs of honour nor good will, but rabegins. ther vain shews of barbarous pomp and pride in him, that disposeth his Authority and plenty of Goods, in trifling toys not to be defired. Where contrariwife it plainly appeareth, that a private man dying in a foraign Countrey, by reason should be accounted most happy of all other creatures, Pelogidas hapthat having neither his Wife, Kin, nor his Children by him, he should be conveyed to his Funerals, pinels. accompanied with fuch multitudes of crowned People and number of Cities, envying one another, who should most honour the Funerals, as being unrequested, and least of all compelled. doings to happiness, and leaveth Fortune to her fickle change, and sporting pleasure. But in my judgement a LACEDEMONIAN spake better, when he said to Diagorns an old man, that had himfelf in old time gotten victory in the Games Olympicall, and had feen belides his own Children, and his Childrens Children (both Sons and Daughters) crowned with Victories also in the felffame Games : O Diagoras, die presently, else thou shalt never come to Heaven, But these Victo-Alexander the ries of the Olympicall and Pythian Games, who over should put them all together, are not to be compared with one of the Battels onely, that Pelopidas had fought and won: having spent the most part of his time in great Calling and Dignity, and laftly ended the fame, being Governour of Bos-OTIA the third time (which was the highest Office of State in all his Countrey) when he had destroyed the Tyrants that kept the THEBANS in bondage, and was also slain himself, valiantly fighting for the recovery of the THESSALIANS Liberty. But as Pelopidas death was grievous to the Thebans Friends and Confederates: fo fell it out very profitable for them. For the Therevenged Pelsenan hearing of Pelopidas death, did not delay revenge, but fent an Army forthwith of feven pidas death.

thouland Footmen, and feven hundred Horfemen, under the conduct of Maleiras and of Diagnos. They finding Alexanders Army overthrown, and that he had loft the most part of his strength, did compell him to give up the THESSALIANS Towns he kept by force against them, and to fet the MAGNETIANS, the PHTHIOTES, and the ACHAIANS at liberty, withdrawing his Garifons he had placed in their strong Holds: and therewithall to swear, that from thenceforth he would march under the Thebans, against any Enemy they should lead him, or command him to go against. So the Thebans were pacified upon these Conditions. Now will I tell you how the gods plagued him soon after for Pelopidas death, who (as we have told you before) had pretily inftructed Thebe his Wife, that the should not fear the outward appearance nor power of his Tyranny, although she were environed with Souldiers of banished men, whom the Tyrant entertained to guard his person. Her self on the other side, fearing his salshood, as also hating his cruelty, conspired her Husbands death with her three Brethren, Tifiphonus, Pytholaus, and Lycophron, and executed her Conspiracy after this sort. The Tyrans Palace where he lay, was straightly guarded every where with Souldiers, who nightly watched his person: but their Bed-chamber which they commonly used with southerrs, who ingury watered its person; southern been handed with they commonly one to lie in, was in the op of all his Palace, where they kept a Dog tied at the Chamber door, to give warning, which was a terrible Dog, and knew nome but the Tyrant and his Wife, and his Keeper that gave him meat. Now when Thebe purposed to work her seat, she locked up her three Brethren a whole day near unto their Bed-chamber. So when night was come, and being bed time, the went her felf alone according to her manner, into Alexanders Chamber : and finding him afterp, the ftole out ftraight again, and bade the Keeper of the Dog to carry the Dog away, for her Husband was dispoled to take rest, and would have no noise. There was no way to get up to this Chamber but by a Ladder, which she let down : and fearing left her Brethren should make a noife, the had covered the Ladder-staves with wooll before the let it fall down. When the had gotten them up with their Swords, and had fer them before the door, she went first her felf into the Chamber, and took away the Tyrans Sword that hung at his Beds head, and shewed it them as a token given them that he was afteep. When it came to the pinch to do the deed, these young men were a fixed, and their hearts began to fail them. But she took on with them, and called them cowardly Boys, that would not fland to it when it came to the point; and withall fware in her rage, that the would go wake the Tyrant, and open all the Treason to him. So partly for shame, and partly for sear, the compelled them to come in, and to frep to the Bed, her felf holding a Lamp to light them. The one of them took him by the feet, and bound them hard: another caught him by the hair of his head, and pulled him backward : and the third thrust him through with his Sword. So by chance he died sooner then he should have done, and otherwife then his wicked life deserved, for the manner of his death, So Alexander was the first Tyrant that was ever slain by the Treason of his Wife, whose body was most villanoully and despightfully used after his death. For when the Townsmen of PHERES had drawn him through the City in the mire and dirt, they cast him out at the length to the Doge to devour.

THELIFEOF MARCELLUS.

Arcus Claudius that was five times Confull at ROME, was the Son (as Marcellus they fay) of another Marcus : and as Posidonius writeth, he was the first Kinted. of his House surnamed Marcellus, as who would say, a martiall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at Weapons, skilfull in Wars, strong and lufty of body, hardy, and naturally given to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor shewed his great courage, but in Wars against the Enemy : otherwise he Marcellus conwas very gentle, and fair conditioned. He loved Learning, and delighted in the ditions, Greek Tongue, and much efteemed them that could speak it. For he himself was so troubled in matters of State, that he could not study and follow it, as he defired to have done. For if God (as Homer faith) did ever make men

To use their youth in Wars, and Battels sierce and fell, Till crooked age came creeping on, such feats for to expell.

They were the nobleft and chiefeft men of ROME at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in Sicile : in their middle age, against the Gauls, to keep them from the winning of all ITALY : and again in their old age , against Hannibal and the CARTHA-GINIANS. For their age was no priviledge for them to be dispensed with, in the service of their The Romans Wars, as it was elfe for common Citizens: but they were both for their Nobility, as also for their troubled with valiantness and experience in Wars. driven to take charge of the Armies delivered them by the Se. Wars. valiantness and experience in Wars, driven to take charge of the Armies delivered them by the Senate and People. Now for Marcellus, there was no Battell could make him give ground being prachied in all Fights : but yet he was more valiant in private Combate man for man , then in any other Fight. Therefore he never refused Enemy that did challenge him, but slew all those in the Field that called him to combate. In Siglie he faved his Brother Offacilism life, being overthrown in a Skir-Missellist faved mith: for with his Shield he covered his Brothers body, and flew them that came to kill him. These his Brother ovaliant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the Generals under whom he served, dadition. with many (rowns, and warlike honours, ufually bestowed upon valiant Souldiers. Marcellus in-Marcellus chocreasing full his valiantness and good service, was by the People chosen Ædylis, as of the number sen Ædslis and of those that were the worthiest men, and most honourable : and the Priests did create him Augure, Augure, which is a kind of Priefthood at ROME', having Authority by Law, to confider and observe the flying of Birds, to divine and prognosticate things thereupon. But in the year of his Office of Ædile, he was forced against his will to accuse Capitolinus, his Brother in Citics with him. For he being a rash and dissolute man of life, sell in dishonest love with his Collegues Son Marcellus, that Marcellus accubare his own name: who being a goodly young Gentleman, and newly come to mans state, was as sethe aptivitinate well thought of, and taken of every man for his manhood and good qualities, as any way for his beauty and personage. The first time Capitolinus moved this dishonesty to him, he did of himself peauty and periodage.

The without any other privity: but when he faw he came again to tempt repulse his shamelels offer, without any other privity: him the fecond time, he straight revealed it to his Father. Marcellus his Father being marvellously offended withall (as he had good cause) went and accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus one nature without (as he many exceptions and feigned excuses, to keep him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the People : but they declared plainly they would not receive his Appeal, nortake any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to answer the matter before the Senate, and denied flatly that he attempted ever any fuch thing, because there were no Witneffes to prove it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to fend for young Marcellus, who coming before them, both bluthed and wept together. The Senate feeing fhametaftnels in him, mingled with tears, and a malice that could not be pacified: without feeking other proof, they took it a clear case, and so condemned Capitolinus presently in a great sum of Money, which Marcelis a ciear case, and to consenion, to lerve at Sacrifices, and to did confectate them to the fervice of the gods. Now when the ROMANS had ended their first War against the CARTHAGINIand Wars with ANS, which held them fully the space of two and twenty years: immediately after that, they began a new War against the Gauls. For the Insuerians, being a People derived from gan a new war against the Got of the Mountains of the Alpes on Italy fide, being the Galls, and dwelling at the foot of the Mountains of the Alpes on Italy fide, being able to make a good Power of themselves, did notwithstanding pray aid of the other GAULS inhabiting on the other fide of the Mountains : and they caused the Gessates, mercenary People and hirelings to them that would give Pay, to bring great numbers with them. Truly methinks it was a marvellous matter, and wonderfull good hap for the ROMANS, that this War of the Gauls came not upon them, while they were at wars with the CARTHAGINIANS : and that the Gaus alfo had lien quiet all that while (as if they had purpofely fworn to fet upon the Conquerors) expe-Ring fill an end between them, and then to fet upon the Conquerors, when they had nothing to fay to any other. Yet the fituation of their Countrey did trouble the ROMANS much, because they were lo near Neighbours unto them, and had Wars as it were at their own doors. And so did the ancient reputation of the Gauls somewhat appaul the ROMANS, whom, as it should seen, they did fear more then any other Nation whatfoever : because Rome had been taken before by the GAULS. Since which time a Law was made, that Priefts and Ecclefiasticall persons should be difpenced with from going to the Wars, unless the Gauls did rife against them. The preparation they made for this War at that time, did plainly shew the fear they had then of the GAUIS. For it is thought, that never before nor fince, there were fo many naturall ROMANS affembled aftical persons together in Field, as were then at that present. Moreover, the new-come cruelty they used in their from the Wars. Sacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before they never used any strange manner in their Sacrifice, or barbarous fashion, but were favourable in their opinions about the Ceremonies of Religion, and agreeable to the GRECIANS touching the fervice of the gods. But then they were compelled to obey certain Oracles and ancient Prophecies they found written in Sibyls Books: and they buried two Grecians alive in the Ox-Market, a Man and a Woman, and likewife two Gauls, a Man and a Woman. Unto them they do yet continue certain fecret Anniverfaries in November, that are not to be feen of every body. The ROMANS in their first Battels of this War, were of ten overcome, and did overcome : but these Battels , were to little purpose for ending of the Wars. In the year that C. Quintim Flaminim, and P. Furim Philowere Confuls, and fent with great Armies to make War upon the Insubrians, People subject to the State of MILLANE, news were brought to ROME, there was a River feen in the Countrey of ROMANIA, red as bloud, and three Moons also at the very same time in the City of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Priests and Soothfayers that had observed and confidered the tokens and fignifications of Birds on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls: they told plainly there was errour in their election, and that they were directly chosen against all figns and tokens of the Birds. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediately to the Camp to them, and willed them to come home to depose themselves of their Consulship, before they did attempt any thing as Confuls against the Enemies. The Confull Flaminium received the Letters in time : but because he was ready to give Battel, he would not open them, before he had first overthrown his Enemies, and spoiled their Countrey, as indeed he did. But when he was come back to ROME again, and had brought marvellous great Spoils with him, the People for all that would not go out to meet him, because he did not presently obey the Letters they wrote unto him, nor returned upon it as they commanded him, but contemptiously, without any regard of their pleasure, followed his own tantalie : whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honour of Triumph. For his Triumph was no fooner ended, but they compelled him to give over his Confulfhip, and made him The great Re- a private man with his companion. The ROMANS therein were fo religiously bent, as they would all things should be referred unto the gods good grace and pleasure, and would suffer none to contemn the observations and prognosticating of the Sooth-sayers, nor their ancient uses and customs, for any prosperity and selicity that could happen. For they thought it more necessary and profitable, for benefit of the Common-weal, that the Senate and Magistrates should reverence the Ceremonis and Service of the gods, then that they should overcome their Enemies in Battel. As for example, Tiberius Sympronius, a man as much honoured and efteemed of the ROMANS for his justice and valiantness, as any other of his time, being one year Confull, did nominate and elect two other for Confuls the year following, Scipio Nafica, and Caim Martim. Thefe two being entred into their Confulfhip, and lent from HOME also to their severall Provinces appointed them by lot: Semproniss by chance took certain little Books in his hand, where were briefly written the rules apperraining to the Ceremonies of publick facrifice : and reading in them, he found a certain ordinance he never An ordinance heard before. And this it was: That if a Magistrate were set in any Tent or hired House without the for publick is City, to behold and observe the Prognostications of Birds, and that upon any sudden occasion he crifice, were driven to come again into the City, before the Birds had given any certain figns : the fecond sime when he returned again to end his observations, there was no remedy, but he must leave his Tent or first hired House, and rake another, and begin new observations again. Tiberius unterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his observations twice in one self House, and had chosen there Nafica and Martins, Confuls to fuceted him. But when he knew he had offended, he told the Senate of it : who would not let flip fo little a fault, but wrote to the new Confuls, and they straight left their Provinces, and returned again to ROME, willingly refigning up their Offices. That was a prety while after. Again also, about the very present time we write of now, there were two Priests of Noble Houses (and Noble persons also), the one called Cornelius, and the other Cetheus, both which were degraded of their Priefshood; because they had not given the intrails of the facrificed Beast in order as they should have done ... Quintus Sulpitius in like manner, was degraded of his Bishopprick, because his Mitter which the FLAMINS do wear, fell off his Head in his facrificing. Minutius being Dictator also, and having chosen Caiu Flaminiu Generall of the Horsemen: because they heard the noise of a Rat at the Election of Flaminius; they were both put out of their authority and other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise even in trifles, it was not by reafon of any superfition mingled with their Religion : but because they would not break any jot of the Ancient Institutions and Ceremonies of their Countrey. But to our story again. Flaminius being deprived of his Confulship, Marcellus was created Conful in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges, Marcellus being inflitted in his Office, choic Comes Cornelius for his companion : Marcellus and and they say, that the GAULS being inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME also willing to Greux Cornetihearken to peace, Marcellus did ftir upthe People, and made them defire war. Notwithfranding, they concluded peace at that time : but the Gauls Gessates immediately after renewed the Wars The Gauls again. For there came over the mountains of the Alpes, thirty thousand of them, and they Gessure make again. For there came over the mountains may more in number then themselves. Now, they was with joyned with the Insubrians, which were many more in number then themselves. Now, they was with Rome, and joyned whitthe Insuperior went incontinently to lay fiege to the City of Acernes, that stan came over the ded upon the River of Po : and during the fiege; King Britomarki taking Ten thousand Gessa- Alper. TES with him, went and destroyed all the Countrey above the Po. Marcellus hearing that, lest Accres, a City with his companion Cneus Cornelius; all the Armed Footmen, and the third part of the Horfemen, upon the Riin his Camp by ACERRES : and he himself with the residue of the Horsemen, and fix hundred verof Pe. Footmen light Armed, marched towards the Enemy, travelling night and day, until he met with Ten thousand Gessates, near unto a village of Gaul on this fide the mountains, called CLA- Clafidium, a STIDIUM, which was subject not long before to the ROMANS. So he had no leasure to take village on rest, nor to restress his men a little : for the Barbarous People knew straight he was come, and took this side the him for no better then by and by overcome, because he had so sew Footmen. And sor his Horse-mountains, men the GAULS made no reckoning of them : for besides themselves are very good men at Arms, and excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of Horsemen far above Marcellus. Therefore they straight marched towards him in a marvellous fury, and with thundring shouts, as if they would have devoured them at their coming, Britomarus their King advanced himself before all his company. Marcellus fearing to be compaffed in behind, being fo final! a number : he put out the wings of his Horsemen as much as he could, to have the Countrey at large, so that his two wings were very slender, untill he came near his Enemies. And being ready to gallop towards the Enemy, it fortuned his Horse being asraid with the noise of his Enemies, turned about, and carried Marcellus back again in spite of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMANS superstition, in taking this for an evil token, and that they would take a conceit upon the same : plucking the bridle with his left hand, turned his Horse head again upon the Enemy, and then he worshipped the Sun, as though he had not turned his Horse by chance, but purposely for that cause. For it is the ROMAN'S manner to turn The manner of about fo, when they do honour their gods. So when they began to joyn Battell he made a vow to the Romans Jupiter Ferencian, to offer him up the goodlieft spoils of the Enemies, if he did overcome. The King when they of the GAULS feeing him at that inftant, imagined by the marks and tokens he faw, that he should worship. be the Generall of his Enemies : So he fet spurs to his Horse , and gallopped towards him from all his company, giving him defiance, and challenged him, shaking his staff in his hand. godhead will vouchfase to grant us the like good fortune in all this War besides. His prayer gouncau will routine to be the ROMANS ran in among the Horfemen and Footmen of the Gauls, one being unparted from another : and Fortune did fo favour them; that they wan a paffing Victory, in fuch a strange and wonderfull manner, as was incredible. For it was never seen paning victory, in activations and the state of the Horsemen did overthrow so great a number of men of Arms and Pootmen ranged together. Now when Marcellan had fain the greater number of them, and roomen rangen together. I had gotten their fpoils and all their baggage, he returned again to his Companion Cnew Cornelsus, whom he found making Wars unfortunately with the Gaules, before the greatest and most populous City they had, called MILLAINE, which the Gauls on this side the Mountains take for their chief City, and from whence all other had their first originall. Whereupon they did all their possible endeavour to defend it, and did as ftraightly besiege the Consul Cornelim, as he did them. Now when Marcellus was come to the Camp again, the GESSATES understanding that their King Britomarus was slain in the bastell, returned back again into their countrey, and the City of MILLAINE was taken. After that all the other Cities thereabouts yeelded of themfelves, without force of fiege, and the Gauls wholly fublished themselves and all that they had to the mercy of the ROMANS, who granted them Peace upon easie conditions. For these famous Victories, the Senate of ROME gave all the honour of Triumph unto Marcellus onely, and that was as wonderfull and worthy a fight, as any that ever past before him : what for the infinite that was as wonderful and worthy a light, as any that was as also for the exceeding fumptuoulnes fpoils, and the number of great men taken Prifoners, as also for the exceeding fumptuoulnes and fattely flew thereof. But the goodlieft fight of all for the retrenes, was to behold Mariellas and fattely flew thereof. But the goodlieft fight of all for the retrenes, was to behold Mariellas and fattely flew thereof. But the goodlieft fight of the barbarous King, to offer up to Jupiter Ferefelf, carrying on his fhoulders the whole food of the Manuscian Assistance and the united by tert, carrying on ins mountain the whole from of the balactors amig, to oner up to Japher Fert-trian. For he had cut down a goodly young Oke of the Mountain, fitraight; and shortup very long, which he had trimmed up in form of Triumph, hanging all the armed pieces he had won of the King, very orderly round about it. Then when all the shew of his Triumph was past, he himself took the Oke upon his shoulders, and got up upon his Triumphant Chariot, and so marched thorow the City, carrying thele figns thereupon: which was the nobleft, and honourableft flew of the whole Triumph. His Army followed after the Chariot, finging Verfes and Songs of Victory, in praise of the gods and their Captain : and when he had passed through the whole City, and was come to the Temple of Jupiter called Feretrian, there he fet up this young Oke and token of Triumph. This Marcellus is the third and last ROMAN Captain, to whom happened this honour Murchunofter in our age. For the first man that ever offered up to Jupicor the spoils of the Generall of their Enemies, was King Romulus, who wan the like spoils of Acran King of the CENINIANS. The second rich spoils.

And the third was Mar-Ine three per- cellus, who flew with his own hands Britomarus King of the GAULS: and after him, no man ed up Spolis 0- ever fince could obtain the like good fortune. The god to whom these manner of spoils are con-Pint in Rome: fecrated thus, is called Jupiter Feretrian, fo termed as some write, because they do carry this token of Triumph to him, following the derivation of this Greek word, Fetin, which fignifieth to carry: Collus.

Marcellus, Fu- for in those former times, many Greek words were mingled with the Latin. Other affirm it is piter Fereirian one of the furnames of Jupiter, fignifying as much as lightning : for Ferire in the Latin tongue figwhy to called niffeth to strike. And some say also, in Wars it is properly to hurt or kill with his own hands : for the ROMANS do use at this day when they give a charge upon their Enemies in battell, or that they have them in chace flying, to cry, incouraging one another, Feri, Feri, which is as much as, kill, kill. And the spoils taken from the Enemies also, are generally called Spolia : but those which Lieuce nant generall, or Generals, do take from the Generalls of their Enemies, when they have flain them, they are called particularly, Spolia opima. Yet fome hold opinion that King Nama Pompilius mentioning the rich spoils, or Spolia Opima, in his Commentaries, speaketh of the first, the fecond, and the third : and commandeth that the first spoils which are won, should be consecrated to Jupiter Fererrian : the second unto Mars : and the third unto Quirinus. And that they should give to him that had won the first spoils, three hundred * Asses, the second, two hundred : and the third a hundred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion, and usuall taking of Spolia Opima, referreth them to be the first spoils won in a foughten field, and those which the Lieutenant of an Army, or a Generall doth take from the Generall of the Enemies, after he hath flain him with his own hands. And thus much for the declaration of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMANS were to joyfull of this Victory, and of their good success in this war, that they caused a massile cup of Gold to be made of the spoil they had gotten, weighing a hundred Pound weight, which they fent to offer up in the Temple of Apullo Pythias, in the City of DELPHOS in token of thanks: and they made liberall division besides of the spoils unto their friends and confederates, and fent a great part of it unto Hieron King of SYRACUSA, who was their confederates. rate. Not long after Hammbal being entred ITALY. Marcellus was fent with an Army by fea, into SICILE. And after the great overthrow was given at the battell of CANNES, wherein there with an Army, died to many thousand ROMANS, and that very few of them faved themselves by flying into the City of CANNUSIUM: they looked that Hannibal having overcome the flower of all the ROMANS youth, and their greatest force, would not fail to come straight to ROME. Wherefore Marcellus furft fent fifteen hundred of his men by fea, to help to defend ROME : and having afterwards received commandment from the Senate, he came to Cannusium, where he took fuch as were fled thither for fuccour after the battell, and so brought them out of the field, to defend the Countrey. Now the ROMAN'S having lost the most part of all their best Captains, in divers fundry Battells before : of all those that remained, Fabius Maximus was the onely able and reputed man for commendation of his honesty and wisdom, yet they misliked of him notwithftanding, for a timerous man, and of no courage, as a man too full of doubts and confiderations, and loth to put any thing in hazard : faying, he was a good Captain to defend, but not to offend the Fnemy. Whereupon they thought good to joyn Marcellus lively youth and courage, with Fabius feminine fear and wildom : and therefore fome years they chose them both Consulls together, or else they sent one of them as Consull, and the other as Proconsull, each in his turn, to the Countrey where they had Wars. And for proof hereof Posidonius writeth, that the ROMANS at that Posidonius time called Fabius Maximus their Target, and Marcellus their Sword. Therefore Hannibal himself words of Fafaid, he feared Fabius Maximus as his Governour, and Marcellus as his Enemy : because the one kept bius and Marhim from hurting of others, and the other did hurt to himself. Immediately after this great Victory cellur. at CANNES, Hannibals Souldiers became so bold, so careless and disordered, that they kept the Field without fear of any thing, and dispersed themselves far from their Camp: wherefore Marcellus fetting upon those straglers, he slew them every man, and so by little and little did still lessen the power and strength of his Enemy. Afterwards he aided the Cities of BIZANTIUM and of NOLA, and stablished the true devotion and love of the BIZANTINES towards the ROMANS : from thence he went to NOLA, and found great fedition there betwirt the Senate and the People, because the Senate could not keep the People in obedience, but they would needs take Hannibals part. The Cause nate could not keep the People in obedience, but they would needs take Irannibats part. The Came of the Peoples flubborness grew, by occasion of a Gentleman of the City called Bandius, a noble Lucius Bandius, a noble of Nola, a vili-Gentleman to the People, and a valiant man of his hands. This Bandius having fought valiantly at ant man. the Battell of CANNES, after he had flain many a CARTHAGINIAN, was himself in the end ftricken down, and found lying among the dead bodies, fore wounded and mangled : whereupon Hannibal greatly commending his valiantness, did not onely let him go without Ransom, but also gave him rich Gifts, and made him his Host and Friend. Hereupon Bandius at his coming home, to require Hannibals honour and courtefie, became one of those that most favoured Hannihome, to require rannows moved and content, some part. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus gen-bal, and most perswaded the people of NoLA to take his part. Notwithstanding this, Marcellus genthinking it too great a fin against the gods, to put a man to death that had made so great proof tleness. of his valiantness, and had served with the ROMANS in their greatest Wars and extremest danger, and who besides the goodness of his nature, had a marvellous gift also to win mens good wills by his great courtefie : when this Bandius came one day to do his duty to him, Marcellus of purpose asked him what he was, though he had known him long before, onely to take occasion to talk with him. The other answered him, his Name was Lucius Bandius. Then Marcellus feeming to be marvellous glad, and to wonder at him faid: And art thou that Bandius they speak so much of at ROME, whom they say did so notable service in person at the Battell of CAN-NES, and never forfook Paulus Amylius the Confull, but received fo many wounds upon his body in defence of him? Bandius answered, that he was the man, and therewith shewed him many wounds he had upon his body. Marcellus then replied: Alas, thou that carrieft fuch notable marks of thy unfeigned love towards us, what didft thou mean, that thou cameft not straight again unto us? art thou perswaded we are so miserable and unthankfull, that we will not worthily reward the vertue and valiantness of our friends, whom our Enemies selves do honour? After Marcellus had used this courteous speech unto him, and had embraced him, he gave him a goodly Horse for service in the Wars, and five hundred Drachnues of silver besides. So after that time Bandius did ever take Marcellus part, and always followed him, being very faithfull to him, and Reward made shewed himself very severe and earnest to accuse them that took Hannibals part in the City: Banding a true which were many in number, and had conspired among themselves, that the first time the Ro- subject. MANS should go into the Field to skirmish with the Enemies, they would shut the gates after them, and take the spoil of all their Carriages. Marcellus being informed of this Treason, did set his Men in battell ray within the City, hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the Sumpters and Carriage in good order : besides that, he made proclamation by Trumpet, that no Citizen upon pain of death should approach the Walls. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the City, feeing no watch upon the Walls, and made him the bolder to come in dijorder, imagining there had been some Mutiny or sedition within, between the Noble men and the People. But in the mean time, Marcellus fet open the gate being hard by, and fallying out upon the fudden with the best men of Arms he had, he gave a charge upon Hannibal in the vaward. Immediately Marcellus after came out his Footmen at another gate, running straight upon Hannibal, with a wonderfull Victory of cry and shour: so as Hannibal to withstand them, was driven to divide his men into two Companies. Hannibal at But as he was dividing of them, fuddenly a third gate opened upon them, from whence all the re- Nota. fidue of the ROMANS issued out, who fet upon the CARTHAGINIANS on every side, they being marvelloufly amazed to be fo fuddenly fet on, which they looked not for : fo having their hands full with those that came first upon them, being scant able to defend themselves against them, and feeing this new and last charge also, they were forced to retire. This was the first time, that ever Hannibals Souldiers began to give place to the ROMANS, who drave them back unto their Camp; and flew a great number of them, and did hurt divers of them befides. For some write there were flain of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, above five thousand, and of the ROMANS there died not past five hundred men. But Titus Livius doth not set out the overthrow To great, and yet confesseth that Marcellus wan great honour by it, and that it made the ROMANS marvellous valiant again; after so many and sundry Battels as they had lost one after another: for then they were perfuaded that they fought not with an Enemy altogether invincible, but that he might fometime also, as well as themselves, receive both loss and hurt. Therefore, one of the Confulls dying about that time, the people caufed Marcellast to be fent for, and placed him in his room: and in spite of the Senate they deferred all deputation untill his return from the Camp. Marcellus came no fooner to ROME, but he was chosen Consull in the dead mans room, by all the voices of the People. Norwithstanding, when they went to choose him, it thundered marvellously: which the Priests and Augures took for an ill roken, but yet they, durft not openly speak against his election, because they seared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of himself did willingly give up his Confulfhip, and yet was it no exception to him for his fervice in the Wars; for they created Marcellar pro- him Proconfull, and fent him again to the Camp at Nola, where he did feverely punish such as took Hannibals part : who being advertised thereof, came thither with all possible speed to help them : and even at his first coming he offered Marcellus Battell, which he refused at that time, Nevertheless he took his time, when Hannibal had sent the best part of his Army to forage, as meaning to fight no more Battells : and then he fet upon him, having given his Footmen long Pikes, such as they use in fight upon the Sea, and taught them also, how to hurt the Enemy afar off , keeping them fill in their hands. But the CARTHAGINIANS having no skill of their Pikes, and fighting with short Javelins in their hands, did strike down right blowes: which was the cause, that they being set upon by the ROMANS, were driven to turn their backs, and flie Certain Spani- before them. So there were five thousand of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field, four certain spans - Elephants flain, and two taken alive: and furthermore, three days after the Battell, there came militari twol- three hundred Horsemen, some of them SPANIARDS, and other Numidians, that submitted themselves to the ROMANS. Never came there such a missortune before to Hannibal: who had of long time kept together in love and amity, an Army affembled of fundry barbarous Nations and people. Howbeit these three hundred continued ever after faithfull to the end, both to Marcellin, and to all other Lieutenants and Generals of the ROMANS. Shortly after, Marcellus being again chofen Confull the third time, went into SICILE. For Hannibals profeerous fuccefs and Victories, had fo incouraged the CARTHAGINIANS, as they fought again to conquer this Illand: and specially because that after the death of Hieronimus the Tyrant, there rose some tumult at Sy-RAGUSA. Upon which occasion the ROMANS had fent an Army thither before, and a Prator called Appres : at whose hands Marcellus having received the Army, a great number of the Ro-MANS became humble futers to him, to pray him to aid them in their calamity, which was this: Of those that scaped from the Battell of CANNES, some saved themselves by flying, other were taken Prisoners, of which there was such a number, as it appeared that ROME had not people enough left onely to keep the walls. Nevertheless those few that remained, their hearts were fo great, that they would never redeem the Prifoners, which Hannibal was contented to deliver them upon fmall ransom, but made a Decree they should not be redeemed; and so suffered some of them to be killed, others to be fold for flaves out of ITALY. And moreover, those that faved themselves by flying, they sent straight into SICILE : commanding they should not set a foot again in ITALY, whileft they had Wars with Hannibal. These were the men that came altogether, and sell down at Marcellus feet, fo foon as he arrived in SIGILE, and humbly belought him, to appoint them to serve under some Ensign, that they might fight to do their Countrey honour and service: promifing him with tears running down their cheeks, that their faithfull fervice then should witness for them, that the overthrow they had at CANNES, fell upon them rather by misfortune, then through lack of courage. Whereupon Marcellus having compassion on them, wrote to the Senate in their favour, and prayed them that they would grant him licence to supply the bands of his Army, as they diminished, with those poor Romans his Countreymen. Many reafons passed too and fro, against this sute : nevertheless it was concluded in the end by the Senate, that the Commonwealth made no reckoning of the service of faint-hearted men like Women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their service, yet it should not be lawfull for him to give them any Crowns or rewards of Honour, for any notable fervice foever they did, as all Generals are wont to give to honeft men that ferve valiantly. This Order of the Senate milliked Marcellus very much, who at his return home out of Sicile, made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifest wrong, to deny him that favour, that having done the Commonwealth such faithfull service divers times, as he had done, he might not restore so many poor ROMANS to their Honour again. Now when Marcellus was in SICILE, he received great hurts and injuries by Hippocrates General of the SYRACUSIANS : who, to pleasure the CARTHAGINIANS, and by their means to make himself chief Lord of SYRACUSA, did put many ROMAN Citizens to death. Whereupon Marcellus went and laid fiege to the City of the LEONTINES, and when he had taken it by affault, he hurt never a Townsman, nor naturall Citzen of the same : but such Traitors as he found there, who had fled from his Camp, and yeelded to the Enemies, them he caused to be whipped, and then hanged. But noswithstanding, Hippecrates had caused it to be bruited at Syracusa, that Marcellus had put all the LEONTINES to the fword, not sparing little Children: and afterwards Hippocrates coming thither on the fudden, in the fear and garboil of this false bruit, he easily took the City. Marcellus hearing Hippocrates had taken SYRACUSA, left forthwith the LEONTINES, and went with his whole Army and camped hard by Syracusa: and fent his Ambaffadours to tell the Syracu-SIANS truly, what he had done in the City of the LEONTINES, and quite contrary to that they were informed of. Howbeit that prevailed not, for they beleeved not Marcellus, because Hippocra-Marcellus beses being thestronger, had won the City. Whereupon he began then to approach the Walls, and fiegeth Syrato affault in every quarter, as well by Sea as by Land. Appin took charge of them that gave affault by Land. Marcellus himself with threescore Gallies of five Oars at every bank, well armed, and full of all forts of Artillery and Fire-works, did affault by Sea, and rowed hard to the Wall, having made a great Engine, and device of Battery, upon eight Gallies chained together, to batter the Wall: trufting in the great multitude of his Engines of Battery, and to all fuch necessary provision as he had for Wars, as also in his own reputation. But Archimedes made light account of all his de-Archimedes a vices, as indeed they were nothing comparable to the Engines himself had invented : and yet notable Mawere not his own such, as himself did reckon of, to shew singularity of work and device. For thematician, those he had made, were but his recreations of Geometry, and things done to pass the time with, at the request of King Hieron : who had prayed him to call to mind a little his Geometricall speculation, and to apply it to things corporall and sensible, and to make the reason of it demonstrative and plain, to the understanding of the common people by experiment, and to the benefit and commodity of use. For this inventive art to frame Instruments and Engines (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, fo highly commended and effeemed of all forts of people) were first fet forth by Architai and by Endoxin, partly to beautifie a little the science of Geometry by this fineness, and partly to prove and confirm by materiall examples and fensible inftruments, Endoxus, facertain Geometricall conclusions, whereof a man cannot find out the conceivable demonstrations whose tions, by enforced reasons and proofs. As that conclusion which instructeth one to search out maticians. two lines mean proportionall, which cannot be proved by reason demonstrative : and yet notwithstanding is a principle and an accepted ground, for many things which are contained in the art of portraiture. Both of them have fashioned it to the workmanship of certain Instruments, called Mefolabes or Mefographes, which serve to find these mean lines proportionall, by draw- Why Plato reing certain curve lines, and overthwart and oblike sections. But after that, Plato was offended proved Eudoxwith them, and maintained against them, that they did utterly corrupt and disgrace the worthi. It and Archive nels and excellency of Geometry, making it to descend from things not comprehensible, and without body, unto things fensible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable substance, where the vile and base handy-work of man is to be employed : since that time I say, handy crast, or the art of Engines, came to be separated from Geometry, and being long time disposed by the Philosophers, it came to be one of the warlike arts. But Archimedes having told King Hieron, his Kinfman and very Friend, that it was possible to remove as great a weight as he would, with as little strength as he lifted to put to it : and boasting himself thus (as they report of him) and trusting to the force of his reasons, wherewith he proved this conclusion, that if there were another Globe of earth, he was able to remove this of ours, and pass it over to the other : King Hieron wondring to hear him, required him to put this device in execution, and to make him fee by experience, some great and heavy weight removed by little force. So Archimedes caught hold with a Hook of fome great and heavy weight removed by little force. So Arthumeaes taught flow with a riook of one of the greatest Carects of Hulkes of the King, (that to draw it to the shore out of the water, rewish an Enquired a marvellous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done so) and put a gine drew one great number of men more into her, then her ordinary burthen : and he himself fitting alone at of the greatest his ease afar off, without any straining at all, drawing the end of an Engine with many wheels and hulks Hieron pullies, fair and foftly with his hand, made it come as gently and smoothly to him, as it had flo- the King had, ted in the Sea. The King wondring to fee that fight, and knowing by proof the greatness of his art : he prayed him to make him some Engines , both to affault and defend in all manner of sieges and affaults. So Archimedes made him many Engines, but King Hieron never occupied any of them, because he raigned the most part of his time in peace, without any Wars. But this provision and munition of Engines, ferved the Syracusians turn marvelloully at that time : and not onely the provision of the Engines ready made, but also the Engineer and Workmaster himself that had invented them. Now the Syracustan's feeing themselves affaulted by the Romans, both by Sea and by Land, were marvellously perplexed, and could not tell what to fay, they were so afraid: imagining it was impossible for them to withstand so great an Army. But when Archimedes The wenderfell to handlehis Engines, and to fet them at Liberty, there flew in the air infinite kinds of fhot, and full force of marvellous great stones, with an incredible noise and force on the sudden, upon the Footmen Archimedes that gave affault by Sea, some were sunk with long pieces of Timber like unto the Yards of ships, whereto they fasten their fayls, which were fuddenly blown over the Walls with force of these Engines into their Gallies, and so sunk them by their over great weight. Other being hoised up by the Proces with hands of Iron, and Hooks made like Cranes bills, plunged their Poups into the Sea. Other being taken up with certain Engines fastened within, one contrary to the other, made them turn in the air like a Whirlegig, and so cast them upon the Rocks by the Town walls, and splitted them all to fitters, to the great spoil and murther of the Persons that were within them.

And fometines the Ships and Gallies were lift clean out of the Water, that it was a fearfull thing to fee them hang and turn in the air as they did : untill that casting their Men within them over the Hatches, some here, some there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be empty, and to break against the Walls, or else to fall into the Sea again, when their Engines lest their hold. Now for Marcellu Engine, which he brought against the Walls, upon a Bridge made of Gallies joyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reason of the fashion ir had like to an instrument of mulick of the fame name, which is a Harp. The fame being yet a good pretty way off from the Walls, there fell a great stone upon it sent from the Walls, weighing ten Talents: then a fecond after that, and a third one after that, the which falling all into this Engine with fuch a thunder and terrible tempest, brake the foundation of the Engine, and tore all the Bridge of the Gallies joyned together in pieces, that fuftained it. So that Marcellus being amazed withall, not knowing well what it meant, was glad to retire quickly, and fent to make his Trumpet found to retreat to those that gave affault by Land. Hereupon they fate in counsell to determine what was to be done, and they refolved, that the next morning before day they should approach the Walls if it were polfible : because that Archimedes Engines , which were very fitting and hard wound up , should by this means fend all the force and fury of their stones and shot over their heads, and that near hand also he could do no good with them, for that they had not the scope of their levell and carriage they should have. But Archimedes had prevented this device by long preparation before, having made provision of Engines for far and near, the levell and carriage whereof was proportioned for all distances : their shot short, their Arrows not very long, many holes and arches in the Walls one hard by another, where there were store of Crosbows to kill near at hand, fer in fuch places, as the Enemies could not fee them without. Wherefore, when the ROMANS thought to approach, thinking they had been fafe and clofe, and no man faw them: it amazed them all when they were received again with infinite shor, and stricken to the ground with stones that fell upon their heads like lead : (for there was no part of all the Walls, from whence they had not the like shot.) Whereupon they were forced again to retire from the Walls. And yet when they were further off from them, the Arrows, stones, and other kind of shor, that flew in every place among them, killed a great number of them, scattered far from thence: so that many of them were flain and fore wounded, and divers of their Ships splitted, and they not once able to be revenged, nor to hurt their Entmies, because Archimedes had placed his Engines very closely behind the Walls, and not upon the Walls in fight of the Enemy. So that it appeared the gods fought against the ROMANS, they were to slain and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstanding, Marcellus escaped with life, fafe from hurt, and mocking his Mercellus won- Workmasters and Engineers he had in his Camp, he said unto them : What shall we not leave to other country with this Briarian Engineer and Geometrician here? who fitting still upon the Wharle dred at Archi. medici Engines. in sporting manner hath with shame overthrown our Navy, and exceeded all the sabulous humdred hands of the Giants, discharging at one instant so many shot among us? For indeed, all the relidue of the Syracusians, were as the body and members of Archimedes preparation : and he himself was the onely creature that moved and did all, all Weapons else being quiet, and his Engines onely occupied, to affault and defend. At the length Marcellus feeing his men thus afraid, as if they did but fee the end of a Rope, or any piece of Timber upon the Wall, they ran away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting loofe fome of his Engines upon them : he would no more approach the Walls, nor give affault, determining to fee if he could win it by long fiege. Not-withstanding, Archimedes had such a great mind, and was so profoundly learned, having hidden in him the onely treasure and secrets of Geometricall inventions, as he would never fer forth any Book how to make all these warlike Engines, which wan him at that time the same and glory, not of mans knowledge . but rather of divine wisdom. But he esteeming all kind of handicraft and invention to make Engines, and generally all manner of Sciences bringing common commodity by the use of them, to be but vile, beggery, and mercenary dross: employed his wit and study onely to write things, the beauty and subtilty whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with necessity. For all that he bath written, are Geometricall propositions, which are without comparison of any other writings whatsoever : because the subject whereof they treat, doth appear by demonstration, the matter giving them the grace and the greatness, and the demonftration proving it to exquifitely, with wonderfull reason and facility, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written, in more plain and simple tearms, and by more easie principles, then those which he hath invented. Now fome do impute this, to the sharpness of his wit and understanding, which was a natural gut in him: other do refer it to the extream pains he took, which made these things come so eafily from him, that they feemed as if they had been no trouble to him at all. For no man living of himself can devise the demonstration of his Propositions, what pains soever he take to seek it : and yet straight so soon as he cometh to declare and open it, every man then imagineth with himself he could have found it out well enough, he can then so plainly make demonstration of the thing he meaneth to shew. And therefore that methinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him : that he was so ravished and drunk with the sweet enticements of this Syren, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgot his meat and drink, and was careless otherwise of himself, that oftentimes his servants got him against his will to the Baths, to wash and annoint him : and yet being there , he would ever be drawing out of the Geometrical figures , even in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annointing of him with Oyls and fweet favours, with his finger he did draw lines upon his naked body : to far was he taken from himfelf, and brought into an extaine or trance, with the delight he had in the fludy of Geometry, being gavified with the love of the Mufes. But among many notable things he devased, it appeareth,

Achimedes

that they most esteemed the demonstration of the proportion between the Cylinder (to wit, the Archimelerderound column) and the sphere or globe contained in the same : for he prayed his Kinsmen and monitration Friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder upon his Tomb, containing a maffie of the Cylinsphere, with an inscription of the proportion, whereof the continent exceedeth the thing conrained. So Archimedes being as you have heard, did as much as lay in him, both to fave himself and Syracus A from taking. But now again to Marcellus. Marcellus during the fiege at Syra- Marcellus Vi-CUSA, wan the City of MEGARES in SICILE, one of the ancienteft Cities in all the Illand : and he Gories in took besides, the Camp of Hoppocrases, lying by ACILES, where he slew above 8000 men, surpri- State. fing them upon the sudden, even as they were preparing to lodge, and to fortific their Camp. Then he overcame a great part of the Champion Countrey of SICILE, and made the Cities to rebell that took the CARTHAGINIANS part : and in all the Battels he fought, he ever overcame them that durft bid him Battell. It chanced afterwards, that he took a LACEDEMONIAN Captain pri- Danippus & Lafoner, called Danippus: even as he came out of Syracusa by Sea. The Syracus I and definous columnian to redeem him, sehr to him to pray he might be ransomed. They made many parlies about his Capain tarantom, and drew out this practife to divers meetings : untill Marcellus had taken good marks kengiloner. of a certain Tower, that had no great watch fet upon it, and into the which he might fecretly convey a certain number of men, the Wall of the City in that place being no very hard thing to scale. Therefore when he had given good guess by estimation at the height of that Tower, by often approaching to it, having parlied many a time hard by it : he provided skaling Ladders, and took the opportunity of a Feast which the Syracusians solemnized in the honour of Diana, on which day they gave themselves to all feasting, sporting and plays. So he took not onely the Tower, Marcellus winbut filled all the Walls round about with armed men before day, and brake open the main gate and neth Syracufa. entry of the City called Hexapile. And as the SYRACUSIANS began to ftir, perceiving the RO-MANS on the Walls, Marcellus made his men found their Trumpets on every fide. Whereupon the Syracusians were so afraid and amazed, that they began to fly, thinking all the City besides had been taken, where indeed the greatest and strongest part of the City called ACRADINA, Acraliac, was not yet touched: because it is walled in round about, and separated from the rest of the City, which is divided into two other parts, the one called the new City, and the other Fortune. The two parts whereof being won, Marcellus by the break of the day forced in by the gate or entry of the Hexapile. And when his Captains told him he was happy, to win fo goodly a City fo eafily: they fay that he (looking about him, and confidering the greatness and frateliness of the same) wept for very pity, forefeeing whereto it should come, thinking with himself what a sudden change it should have, when his Army came to spoil and sack the same. For there was not a Captain that durft cleny the Souldiers when they demanded the spoil, and yet were there many that would meeds have it burnt and rafed to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any cafe; Marcellus gen and besides, it was fore against his mind to grant them the spoil of the goods and slaves : straight-tienes, ly commanding them notwithstanding, not to lay hands on any free-man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any Syracusian flave. Wherein, though he shewed great favour and mercy, yet it grieved him to fee fo famous a City, brought to that miserable state; and in the midst of all the joy he had for his Victory, he could not refrain from weeping for pity, to fee to rish and wealthy a City, in the turning of a hand, spoiled and brought to nought. For it is faid, that the riches and Rich spoils at goods taken away at the fack of Syracusa, were nothing inferiour to the spoils of Carsyracusa

THAGE, which was also sacked not long after that: for the other part of the City of Syracusa called ACRADINA, was foon after also taken by treason, and spoiled against the Captains wills, faving the Kings Treasure, which was reserved to be carried to the common Treasure of ROME, SY-RACUSA being taken, nothing grieved Marcellus more, then the loss of Archimedes : who being in his study when the City was taken , bufily feeking our by himself the demonstration of some Archimeter in his study which the City was tanch, bound in figure, and so earnestly occupied therein, as Mathematibe never faw nor heard any noise of Enemies that ran up and down the City, and much less his fludy. knew it was taken : he wondred when he faw a Souldier by him , that bade him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithstanding, he spake to the Souldier, and bade him tarry untill he had done his conclusion, and brought it to demonstration : but the Souldier being angry with his answer, drew out his Sword and killed him. Other fay, that the ROMAN Souldier when he came, offered the Diversopi-Swords point to him to kill him: and that Archimedes when he saw him, prayed him to hold his nions of hand a little, that he might not leave the matter he looked for unperfect, without demonstration, chimedes death But the Souldier making no reckoning of his speculation, killed him presently. It is reported a third way also, saying, that certain Souldiers met him in the streets going to Marcellus, carrying certain Mathematicali inftruments in a little prety coffer, as Dials for the Sun, Spheres and Angles, wherewith they measure the greatness of the body of the Sun by view : and they supposing he had caried some Gold or Silver, or other precious Jewels in that little coffer, slew him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was marvellous forry for his death, and ever after hated the villain that flew him, as a curied and execrable person: and how he made also marvellous much afterwards of Archimedes Kinimen for his fake. The ROMANS were efteened of at that time by all Nations, for marvellous expert Souldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be dealt with : but they never thewed any example of their elemency and courtefie, and left of all of any civill manner to any strangers, untill Marcellus taught the way, whose acts did shew the GRECIANS Marcelluselethen , that the ROMANS were more gracious and mercifull then they. For he did so courte-mency.

oully intreat those that had to do with him, and shewed such favour to private persons, and also to whole Cities: that if there were any cruelty shewed in the Cities of Enna, or at Medares, or against the Syracusians, it was rather through their own fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for proof hereof, I will recite you one example onely among many. There is a City in SICILE called ENGYDM, it is no great thing, but a very ancient City of Name, by reason of the traffick thither, for that there are certain goddesses to be seen, whom they worship, called the Mothers. Some say the CRETANS were the first builders and founders of the Temple there, where you shall fee Spears and Helmets of Copper, and upon them are graven the Name of Meriones : and upon others, Ulyffes Name also, which are confecrated to these goddeffes. This City frood altogether at the devotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias being the chiefest man of the same, was all he might against it, and perswaded them openly in all their councils to take part with the ROMANS, proving it by many reasons, that his Enemies counfelling the contrary, were unprofitable members of the Commonwealth. Whereupon Niciae Enemies fearing his greatness and authority, they did conspire among themselves to apprehend him, and to deliver him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nician hearing of fuch a matter, and finding that they lay in wait to take him, used this policy to prevent their treason. He gave out openly very ill speeches against the goddesses, and did many things in derogation of their honour: and faid the fight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but a device, and that there was no credit to be given to them. These words tickled his Enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the mifchief they pretended against him, to himself, as the onely cauler of his own hurt. So they having appointed a day to apprehend him, by chance a common Counfell was kept that day they had determined of : where Nician speaking to the people about matters of counfell, in the midst of his Oration he felt to the ground, to the great wonder of the whole affembly, as every man may conjecture. Howbeit, never a man frirred, and a pretty while after he began to lift up his head a little, and to look gaftly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he still gathered higher and lowder by little and little, until he saw all the people wondroufly afraid and amazed, that not one of them durft speak. Then throwing his Gown from him, and renting his Coat, he got upon his feet half naked, and ran towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddeffes Mothers did torment him: and not a man durft once come near him, nor offer to ftop him, they were fo superstitious and foolishly afraid of the goddeffes, imagining it was some divine punishment. But by this means he easily got to the gates of the City, and fled from them all, and he was never feen after that time, to do or speak like a mad man in any thing. His Wife that was made privy to his device, and furthered his intent, went first and fell down on her knees before the goddesses mothers in the Temple, as if she had heartily prayed unto them : and faining afterwards the would go feek her Husband, that ran up and down the fields like a mad man, the went out of the City with her little Children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they escape without danger, and went unto Marcellus to Syra cusa. The Engis-NIANS afterwards played fuch insolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and caused them all to be taken and bound, as though he would have put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with tears in his eyes, and embracing his knees, and kiffing his hands, befought him to take pity upon his poor Citizens, beginning first with those that were his greatest Enemies. This good nature of Nissan to pacified Marcellan wrath, that he pardoned them all, and did no hurt to the Ciry, and gave Nicias certain Land, befides many other rich gifts he bestowed upon him. Thus it is reported in the History of Postdomiss the Philosopher. Now Marcellus being sent for home by the ROMANS, because they had Wars in their own Countrey, and even at ROME gates : he departed out of SICILE returning towards ROME, and carried the goodlieft Tables, Pictures, and nnenets and carious Tables Statues, and other fuch Ornaments as were in Syracus A, meaning first to beautifie his Triumph with them, and to leave them afterwards for an Ornament of ROME, which before that time, never knew what fuch curious works meant. For, this finences, and curious Tables and imagery, never came into ROME before, but was throughly fet out with Armour and Weapons of barbarous people, and with bloudy spoils, and was also crowned with monuments of Victories and Triumphs of divers Enemies, which were no pleasant, but rather fearfull fights to look upon, far unfit for leminine eyes. But even as Epaminondas called the plain of BOBOTIA, Mars his fcaffold, where he kept his Games : and Xenophon also called the City of EPHESUS, the Armourers shop : even so me thinks (as Pandaru faid) they might rightly have termed Rome, the Temple of Mars fighting. And this wan the peoples good wills much more to Marcellus, because he did so passingly set forth ROME with fuch excellent fine toys of GREECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other fide, was better beloved of the old men; because he brought no such toys with him from the City of TARENTUM, when he wan it. Indeed ho brought away Gold and ready Coin, and much other goods that were profitable; but for Images and Tables, he left them standing in their places, speaking a thing of great note; Let us leave the TARENTINE 5 their gods offended with them. And furthermore the Noblemen were angry with Marcellus, faying , that by this act he had purchased Rome great malice and hate. First, because he did not onely lead men Prisoners in his Triumph, but the gods also : and secondly, because he had filled the people full of prittle prattle, and idle curiofity, spending the whole day in gazing, and wondring at the excellency of the Workmen, and of the Works; where before they would fall to their labour, or elfe they went to the Wars, not being acquainted with curiofity, nor idle life, as Exripides faid, speaking of Hercules:

In wicked practifes he simple was to fee.

But he exceld in vertuous deeds, and feats that worthy be. Notwithstanding, Marcellus did glory among the GRECIANS themselves: faying that he had taught the ROMANS to esteem the wonderfull works of GREECE, which they knew not before. But at his return out of SICILE, his Enemies procured, that his honour of Triumph was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to do in Sicile, and that the War was not altogether ended, and fearing besides lest a third Triumph would make him too much envied : he was contented with good will to have the honour of the great Triumoh in the Mountain of Alba onely : and of the little Triumph, in the City of Rome. This manner of Marcellus enin the Mountain of Alba onery: and or the natue arrumpn, in the City of Rome. And this difference there with Ovation. And this difference there with Ovation is between them : that in the Ovation Triumph, the party to whom it is granted, doth not enter triumph, into the City upon a triumphing Chariot drawn with four Horfes, nor doth carry any Laurell Wherthe Oupon his head in token of Triumph, nor hath any Trumpets or horns blown before him, but doth vation trimarch on foot with a pair of flippers on his feet, having Flutes and Howbowes playing before umph is. him, and wearing a Garland of Fir-tree upon his head : to as this manner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasant then fearfull sight. Whereby it plainly appeareth, that these two kinds of entries they granted to the Captains, returning from the Wars with Victory, were distinguished in the old time, rather by the manner, then by the greatness of their doings. For such as had overcome their Enemies by great flaughter and bloudy Battells, they did make their entry with pomp of Triumph, that was altogether martiall and terrible, followed with their Souldiers armed, and crowned with Laurell Garlands, as their cuftom was in mustering their Camp in the Wars. But they on the contrary fide, that without any exploit of arms returned home with Victory, either by peaceable means, or by force of their eloquence; the Law granted them the honour of Ovation Triumph, which was quiet, and full of all joy and Ovation mirth. For the Flute is an inftrument of pleasure belonging to Peace, and the Fir-tree is a tree whereof it is confecrated to Venus, which goddess, above all gods and goddesses doth most detest Wars, called. This second kind of entry was called Ovation, not as many GRECIANS have taken it, coming of this word Evan, which is a voice and Song of joy, although they did use also to accompany the Captains making their entry in this fort, crying, and finging Evan: but there were certain GRECIANS that would have fetched the derivation of this word, from an old common cufrom they had : and were of opinion besides, that part of this honour did appertain to god Bacchiu, whose surname we call Evin, and sometimes Triambiu; Howbeit this is not the true derivation of the name, but after this fort. At the great Triumph and entry made, the Captain or Generall that triumpheth as a Conquerour, did offer the Sacrifice (by the old Orders and ancient The facrifices Cuftoms of Rome) one or divers Oxen: where at the fecond Triumph called the Ovation, he of the great onely facrificed a Mutton, which the ROMANS call in their tongue Ovem, and thereof it was cal-triumph led Ovation. And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwirt the Law-maker of the The lacrifices ROMAN Laws and cuftoms, and the Law-maker of the LACED. MONIANS: how each of them of the little triwas contrary to the other, in appointing the facrifices for Victory. For at Sparta, the Captain tion, or Generall that had done his feat by policy or friendship, the Sacrifice he did offer up to the gods. The difference was an Ox : and he that by force, and bloudy Battell had obtained Victory, onely offered up a Cock betwitt the for facrifice. For though they were very good Souldiers, yet they thought better of his fervice. Sparing on that by his wildom and wife perfwasions obtained Victory, then of his, that wan it by valiantness. Roman in and force of arms.

This you may be which of these two Laurenders had belt reasons by his these two Laurenders had belt reasons by his these two Laurenders had belt reasons by his these successions. and force of arms. Thus you may see which of these two Law-makers had best reason by his Or- for victory. dinances. But now to Marcellus again. He being chosen Consult the fourth time, his Enemies and evil willers did ftir up the Syracusians against him, and persweded them to complain to The Syracuthe Senate of him, that he had cruelly and uncourteoully used them, contrary to the ancient state of him, that he had cruelly and uncourteoully used them, contrary to the ancient state of him, League and alliances made long before with the ROMANS. Marcellus being facrificing one day Marcellus. in the Capitoll , while the Senate were set in counsell , the Syracusians Deputies came before them, and kneeling down befought them to give them audience, and that they would do them justice. The other Consult that was present rebuked them: being angry that they had so maliciously spied the occasion of Marcellus absence. But when Marcellus heard of it, he straight leit off all, and came to the Senate, and first sate him down in his Consulls chair, where he gave audience as Confull, and dispatched divers Causes: when he had so done, he rose out of his chair and came down among them, standing as a private person to answer at the Barr, as other offendors and men accused, suffering the EYRACUSIANS to alledge and say against him what they would. Then were the Syracusians blank, when they faw the majerly of Marcellus, and his stated countenance in all things: and as they had found him before a very valiant man in Wars, and unconquerable, they found him then a man no less dreadfull in his Confulls robe : so that they hung down their heads, and durst not look him in the face. Notwithstanding they being suborned by his Enemies, began at the length boldly to accuse him, and yet with forrow and lamentation, the effect whereof was this: That they being the ROMANS friends and confederates, had abidden fuch injuries at Marcellus hands, as all other Generalls never offered their very Enemies. Whereto Marcellus straight answered again to the contrary: That for many injuries the ROMANS had received of them, they suffered nothing but that which was unpossible they should not suffer, that refifted untill they were taken by force : and yet they might thank themfelves for any thing they fuffered, because they would not obey nor consent to reasonable capitulations and Articles of Peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And again, they could not alledge for their excuse, that the Tyrants had compelled them to make Wars : when they to the contrary because they would enter into Wars, were contented to be subject to a Tyrant. So, when both parties had spoken their minds, the Syracusians (as the manner is) went out of the Senate house, and Marcellin also lea-Marcellus con. ving his fellow Confull in his place in the Senate; and tarried without the door, attending the senate tence of the Senate, never altering his countenance nor wonted look, neither for fear of fentence, nor for malice nor anger against the Syracustan's, quietly looking for his judgement. Afterwards when the Senatours voices were gathered together, and that Marcellus was cleared by most voices: then the Syracusians fell down at his feet weeping, and befought him not to wreak his anger upon them that were prefent, and moreover that he would have compassion on the residue of the Citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and favour extended to them, and confessed themfelves bound to him for ever. Marcellus moved with pity by their intreaty, he pardoned them , and ever after did to the Syracusians what pleasure he could possibly. For through his intreaty and requeft, the Senate did confirm and ratifie this Grant unto them, which was, that they might use the liberty and benefit of their own Laws, and quietly enjoy their goods also which were left them. To requite the speciall grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACUSIANS gave him many honours, and among others they made a Law, that ever after as oft as any of Marcellus Name or House came into SICILE, the SYRACUSIANS thould keep a folemn Feaft, with Garlands on their heads, and should also facrifice unto the gods. After this, Marcelus went against Hannibal: and where all the other Confulls almost, and Generalls, after the overthrow at CANNES, had used this onely policy with him, not to come to Battell : he took a contrary course to them all , thinking that tract of time against Hanni-bal in his fouth (whereby they thought to eat out Hannibals force) was rather a direct consuming and destroying of all ITALY : and that Fabius Maximus standing too much upon safety, took not the way to cure the disease and weakness of the Commonweal of ROME, looking to end this War, consuming by little and little the ftrength and power of ROME, committing a fearfull Phyfitians fault and error, being afraid to heal the patient fuddenly, imagining that to bring them low, doth leffen the dieafe. So first of all he went to besiege certain great Cities of the SAMNITES, which were revolted from obedience of the ROMANS: and those he wan again with a great provision of Corn and Money, he found in them, befides three thousand Souldiers Hannibal had in garifon there, whom he took pri-CREW Falvius foners. Hannibal after that, having flain the Viceconfull Cnews Fulvius in Apulia, with eleven Tribuni Militum (to wit, Colonels) every one having the charge of a thousand Footmen, and overflain in Apulis thrown the greateft part of his Army : Marcellus wrote Letters to Rome, hoping to comfort the Senate and people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant them he would drive Hamibal out of A-PULIA. When the ROMANS had read his Letters, they were nothing the more comforted, but rather (35 Livy writeth) more afraid and discouraged : because they doubted the danger to come would be greater then the lofs paft , taking Marcelliu to be a far greater and better Generall , then ever was Fulvine. Nevertheles, Marcellus performing the contents of his Letters written to ROME, drave Hannibal out of Apulia, and made him retire into Lucania. And Marcellus finding him in fought a battell that countrey, by a City called Num I S TRON, lodged upon hills, and in place of ftrength and advanwith Hannibal tage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the first that presented his Enemy Battell. Hannibal on the other fide, came down into the valley, and they joyned Battell: which was fo cruelly fought, and fo long time, as it could not be different who had the better. For the Battell being begun at nine of the Clock in the morning, 'twas dark night ere they gave over, The next morning by peep of day, Marcellus fet his men again in battell ray, in the midft of all the dead bodies that lay flain in the Field, and challenged Hamibal, to prove who should have the field, but Hannibal refused, and marched his way thence : fo as Marcellus thereby had good leifure left him to ftrip his flain Enemies , and also to bury his own Souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his Enemy by the foot, who laid many ambushes for him, but he could never trap him in any : and in every incounter or skirmish they had togsther Marcellus had ever the better, which wan him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to chuse new Consults, the Senate thought good to fend rather for the other Consult that was in SICILE, then to remove Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hannibal. So when the other Conful was come to Rome, the Senate commanded him to name Quintus Fulvius Dictator, because the Dictator was neither chosen by the People, nor by the Senate: but one of the Confulls or Prætors, in open affembly of the people, nameth fuch a one Dictator ashe liketh cnoten by the Conful orPrz. of. Wherefore it feemeth, that this word Dictator, came upon that word, naming : for, Dicere in tor, not by the the ROMAN tongue, fignifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dictator, because he commandeth of himself what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, and the voices of the people : and this feemeth to be true, because the commandments of the Senate of ROME are called Editta, which the GRECIANS call Diatagnata. Now the other Confull and companion of Marcellus being come out of SICILE, he would need name another Dictator than him whom the Senate offered him: and because he would not be compelled to do that he was unwilling to do, he stole away one night, and returned again into SICILE. Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fulusus Dictator, and the Senate wrote their Letters to Marcellus, to confirm him; which Marcellus did, and authorized the Peoples election. So he himself was chofen again Proconfull for the next year following : in the which he having conferred with Fabius Maximus about the Wars, they were agreed that Fabius should prove if he could win the City of TARENTUM again; and that Marcellus in the mean time should keep Hannibal occupied, that Quintus Falhe might not come to aid it. This refolution being taken between them, Marcellas went to meet wing choice Hannibat by the City of CANNUSIUM: who as he still changed and shifted lodging, because he Distance by would not come to the Battell against his will, found Marcellus ever in his eye before him. Info-the people.

Marcellus Promuch as Hannibal removing thus his Camp, Marcellus plied him so one day with continual ala-confull. rums and skirmilhes, that he brought him to a Battell that held all day long till night; and compelled them both to leave off till the next morning : where Marcellus shewed again in field by break of the day, in Bartell ray. Whereat Hannibal being in a marvellous rage, he called his fouldiers together and made an Oration to them, earneftly moving them once again to fight with Marcellus, if ever they Hannibals Ohad heretofore fought for his fake. You fee, faid he, that having fought formany Battells, and gotten ration to his fuch Victories as we have done, we cannot yet take breath as we would, nor be quiet, how much fouldiers. foever we win; if we drive not away yonder fellow Marcellus. When Hannibal had ended his Oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, he led them on to the Battell : where Marcellus, to no purpose and our of time, would needs shew Hannibal a stratagem of war, that turned to himself the worst. For Marcellus perceiving the right wing of his Army diffressed, made one of his Legions that was fer in ray in the rereward of his hoaft, to march to the front of his Battell, to help those that needed aid. But this removing of the Legion, troubled them that fought, and gave the Enemies the Victory : who flew that day two thouland feven hundred of the ROMANS. So, when Marcellus was Marcellus overcome again into his Camp, he ftraight called his fouldiers before him, to whom he spake in this thrown in Bremanner. That he faw a great deal of armour, and bodies of men, but he could fee no ROMANS, tell by Hami-The ROMAN'S hearing him fay fo, belought him to pardon the fault they had committed below Marcellus answered, he would never pardon them, so long as they were overcome: but when they Marcellus hard overcome again. he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to hims the words age to he next morning he agreed to hims the words age to he next morning he agreed to he had been agreed to have a support to he had been agreed to he overcome again, he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to bring them again fouldiers to fight with the Enemy, that fuch as were at Rome should rather hear news of their Victory, then of their running away. When he had faid, he appointed they should give those bands that first turned their backs to Hannibal, Barly for Wheat. So as though many of them were in great danger of their lives, for the fore wounds they had received in the Battell : yet there was not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieve them then the grievous wounds they had. The man or mixing betimes was fet out of the Generals tents, the Coar armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary fign of Battell: and the bands that had received difhonour the day before, were placed at their own request in the front of the Battell. The other Captains besides, that were not overthrown, did lead their bands also to the field, and did fer them in Bartell ray. Hannibal hearing thrown; and read their balls and is this, that cannot be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the onely odd man, that never giveth rest to his Enemies, when he hath overcome words of Marhim, nor taketh any for himfelf when he is overcome. We shall never have done with him, for cellus, any thing that I fee, fith shame, whether he win or lose, doth still provoke him to be bolder and valianter. After Orations made of both fides, both Armies marched forwards to joyn Battell. Battellbevalianter: After Orations made of doublines, both Amints martined forwards to joyn datten. Batteilbe-The ROMANS being as fitrong as the CARTHAGINIANS, Hannibal put his Elephants in the twix Hannibal vaward and front of his Battell, and commanded his men to drive them upon the ROMANS: and fo The worthy the did. Which indeed did fomewhat trouble and diforder the first ranks of the ROMANS: after flaving the first part of the foundairs took an Englan in his bands, and martined untill fuch time as Flavius Tribune of the fouldiers, took an Enfign in his hands, and marched Tribunas Mile. before the beafts, and gave the first of them such a thrust with the point of his Ensign, that he was. made her turn back. The first beast being turned back thus, ran upon the second that followed her; and the second made the third go back also, and so from one to another, until they all turned. Marcellas perceiving that, commanded his Horfmen to fer upon the Enemies with all the fury they could; in that place where he saw them somewhat troubled with these beasts that turand back again upon them : and that they should drive them sturther in amongst them. Which Marcellus Vithey did, and gave to hot a Charge upon the CARTHAGINIANS, that they made them turn their cloy of Hanbacks and run away, and they purfued them still, killing them down right, even to their Camp nibal, fide : where was the greatest slaughter of all, by reason their Elephants that were wounded, fell down flark dead within the Gate of their Camp, And they fay, of the CARTHAGINIANS, there were flain at this Battell, about eight thousand, and of the ROMANS onely three thousand: howbeit all the reft of them for the most part were very fore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hannibal, that he might march away at his pleasure, as he did that night, and got him away far off from Marcellus, as knowing he was not in state to follow him over suddenly, because of the great number of hurr men in his Camp : and so by small journies he went into CAMPANIA, where he lay in Hanniballay garifon all the Summer, in the City of SINUESSE, to heal the wounds of his fore mangled Souldiers: Hannibal having now gotten himself at the length out of Marcellus hands, and having his the City of Si-Army free to ferve him as he thought good: he burned and destroyed all ITALY where he went, mustife in Camand frood no more in fear of any thing. This made Marcellus ill spoken of at ROME, and caused Pania. his Enemies to take hold of such a matter against him : for they straight raised Publing Bibulus Tri- P. Bibulus Tribune to accuse him, who was a hot harebrain man, but very eloquent, and could deliver his bune of the mind very well. So this Bibulus called the people of to counsell, and told them there, that they must people accuse the most bune of the most needs call home Marcellus, and appoint some other to take the charge of the Army : for as for him, seth Marcellus. faid he, because he hath fought a little with Hannibal (and as a man might fay, wreftled a little with him) he is now gotten to the Bathesto folace himself. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenams in the Camp, and went himself to Rome, to answer to the untrue accurations laid against him, and there he perceived at his coming, how they intended to profecture the matter against him and there we percent against him the parties came beupon unere unormanous. So anny that the great lift or shew place, called Circiu Flaminius, to give rore the reopic antinonana Bibulus the Tribune, fitting in his chair, laid open his acculation with great circumftance : and Marcelline, when Bibulne had told his tale, answered him in a few words, great cucumntaine; and arrangement bis purgation. But the Noble and chief men of the City, and very discreetly, onely touching his purgation. role up and spake on Marcellus behalf, telling the People plainly that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worse of his valiantness, then their Enemy did : and to judge of him as a coward, constdering Hannibal onely fled from him, of all other Captains, and would by no means fight with uering rannoan oner to high with any other whatfoever. These perswassions took such effect, as where Marcellus accufer looked for his condemnation, Marcellus to the contrary, was not onely cleared of his acculation, but furthermore, they chose him Confull again the fift time. So being entred into his Office he went first into Thus CAN: where visiting the good Cities one after another, and quieting them, he pacified a great fedition in the Countrey, when they were all ready to rife and Marcellus rebell. Afterwards at his return, he thought to confecrate the Temple of Honour and Vertue, which chofen Confull the fift he had built with the fpoils he got in the wars of SICILE. But the Priests were against it, saying, of honour and two gods might not be in one Church. Thereupon he built another Temple, and joyned it to the first, being very angry the Priests denied so his consecration : and he did take it for an evil token, befides divers other figns in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him nuch. there were many Temples let on fire with lightning at one time : and the Rats and Mice did gnaw the Gold that was in the Chappell of Jupiter Capitoline. And it is reported allo, that an Ox did fock; and a Child came out of the Head of an Elephant, and that the Child was alive. Furthermore, the Priess and Soothayers, sacrificing to the gods, to withdraw the evil from them these finisher tokens did threaten: they could never find any favourable figns in their facrifices. Whereupon they fought to keep Marcellus ftill at ROME, who had a marvellous earnest defire to be gone with fpeed to the wars : for never man longed for any thing to much, as Marcelin did, to fight with Hannibal. Infomuch as he never dreamed other thing in the night, nor spake of any matter elle in the day to his friends and companions, nor prayed to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hannibal in the Field: and I think he would willingly have fought a private combate with him in forne walled City or inclosed lifts for the combate. And had it not been that he had already won himfelf a great fame, and shewed himfelf to the world (by fundry great proofs and experience of his doings) a grave, skilfull, and valiant Captain as any man of his time: I would have faid it had been a pang of youth, and a more ambitious defire, then became a man of his age, who was threefcore years old at that time, when they made him Confull again the fift time, Nevertheless, after he had ended all his propitiatory facrifices and purifications, such as the Southfayers had appointed, he departed from Rome with his fellow Confull Quintus Chrispinus to the wars. He found Hannibal lying between the Cities of BANCIA, and VENOUSA, and fought all the means be could to procure him to fight, but he could never get him to it. Howbeit Hannihal being advertifed by spials, That the Consuls sent an Army to befiege the City of the LOCKIANS between the Cities of Ban- furnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS (as you would fay) the occidentalls, because the GRECIANS in cia and Venue: respect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals: he laid an ambush for them that went, under the Hill of Petellum, which was directly in their way, where he flew above two thousand five hundred ROMANS. That overthrow did fet Marcellus on fire, and make him more defirous of Banell: whereupon he removed his Camp from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his Enemy. Between their two Camps there was a prety little Hill, ftrong of fituation, a wild thing overgrown with Wood : and there was high hillocks, from whence they might difeern a great way, both the one and the others Camps, and at the foot of the fame ran pretty forings: Infomuch as the Ro-MANS wondred that Hammbal coming thither first, did not take that place, but had left it to laid by Hanni- his Enemie. Howbeit Hannibal was crafty enough, leaving it of purpole: For as it was commodious to lodge his Camp, fo it served his turn better for an ambush. So he filled the Wood, the hollow places, and the vallies thereabout, with flore of shot and spear-men, assuring himself that the place would intice the ROMANS thither: and indeed he geffed rightly, for fo it fell out. Straight there flue a rumour abroad in the ROMANS Camp, that there was a passing place to lodge in , and every man took upon him like a skilfuli Souldier , to tell what vantage they should have upon their Enemies by taking that place, and specially if they did lodge there, or otherwise built a fort upon it. Whereupon Marcelus determined to go fee the place himself, taking a few Horsemen with him. Norwithstanding, before he would take Horse, he called for his Soothsyer to facrifice to the gods. The first beast that was facrificed, the Soothfayer shewed Marcellus the liver of it without a Head. The second beaft facrificed, had a fair great Head of a Liver, and all the other parts were also found, and very new: that by them it appeared all the fear of the first figns and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothsayers on the other side said, it did make them worst afraid then before : for these so favourable and lucky tokens of the facrifice , sollowing immediately after the first soul and naughty signs , made them doubt them much , by reason of so strange and sudden an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus saith:

Nor force of burning fire, nor wall of steel nor stone, Nor what soever other thing, is here this earth upon.

Cas

Nor yet refift the due decrees, which come from Heaven on high So Marcellus took his Horse, with Quintus Crifpinus his tellow Confull, and his Son one of the Tri- Quintus Crif bunes of the Souldiers, having onely two hundred and twenty Horfemen with him, or the which there pinus tellow was not one ROMAN among them, but all were Thus CANS, faving forty FREGELLANIANS, who Consulwith from the beginning of these Wars, had alwaies shewed themselves very faithfull and loving to Mar-Marcellus. cellus. The hill we spake of before, being thick covered with Wood and Bushes, the Enemies had set a Scout to watch on the top of it, to give warning if they faw any coming towards it. The ROMANS could not fee him, and he on the other fide might fee even into their Camp, and perceive what was done : as he did advertise those at that time that lay in ambush for Marcellus coming : and they suffered him to passon, until he came directly against them. Then they shewed upon the sudden, and compassing in Marcellan, they both thot and strake at him, some following them that fled, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which onely fluck to it : who came roundly in together (notwithstanding the Thus CAN's were fled) upon the first cry they heard, to defend the two Confuls. untill fuch time as the Conful Crifpina having two wounds on his body with a dart, did turn his Horfe to fly. And with that, one of the Enemies gave Marcallus such a fore blow with a Spear having a broad Iron head, that he ran him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left alive, being but a few in number, feeing Marcellus flain, left him lying on the ground, and took his Son away with them, Marcellus flain that was very foreburt, and by the swiftness of their Horses recovered their Camp, and saved them- in an ambush felves. At this overthrow, there were not flain above forty men, and five and twenty taken Prisoners, at the hi of which five of them were the Confuls Sergeant, and their Officers that carried Axes before them. and the other were all Horsemen. Within few days after, the other Consul Crispinus ded also of his The Consul hurts, which was such a misfortune, as never came before to the Romans, that both their Confuls Grifpinus flain, were flain at one Battle. Now Hannibal made no great reckoning of all that were flain or taken at this Field: but when he heard that Marcellus felf was flain at this overthrow, he went himself straight to the place to fee him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, standing hard by it, and considering his strength, his stature, and countenance, having taken full view of all the parts of him, he spake no proud words againft him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as some other would have done, that had slain so valiant and dangerous an Enemy: but wondring how he came to be slain so strengely there, he took off his Ring from one of his fingers that fealed his Letters, and giving his body buriall according to his estate, made it to be honourably burnt, and then put all his bones and ashes into a filver poton which he himself put a Crown of Gold, and fent it unto Marcellus Son. It fortuned to, that cer Marcellus Futain light Horsemen of the Numidians met with them that carried this Silver pot, and would have neral honour taken it from them by force, but they stood to it, and would not part withall, and so fighting and stri- ed by Hannibal ving together for it, the bones and alhes were scattered all about. Hannibal hearing this, said to them that were about him : See, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So be punished the Numi-DIANS, and cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perfuaded himself it was the will of their gods he should die so strangely, and that his body should have no buriall. Cornelius Nepos, and Walerius Maximus write it thus: but Livy and Augustus (2 far fay, that the pot was carried unto his Son, and honourably buried: Marcellus did confectate many Monuments in divers places, besides those at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for young men to exercise themselves in. In numerous the Isle of SAMOTHRACIA, in the Temples of the Gods called Cabires : many Images and Tables he brought from SYRA CUSA. And in the Isle of LINDOS, in the Temple of Minerya, where among other, there is a flatue of his, and this Epigram graven under it, as Posidonius the Philosopher writeth:

O showmy friend (Isay) which passes forth by me,

Of Claudius Marcellus here, the Image mayst thousee:

Whose Family at Rome, was of the noblest Name. Seven times be Conful chofen was, in which he overcame Great numbers infinite, (in open Field and Fight) Of fuch as fought his Countreys fool, and put them all to flight.

The Authour of this Epigram reckoneth the two times of his being Vice-Conful, for two whole Confulfhips : but his Posterity continued alwaies in great honour, unto Marcellus the Son of Octavia Marcellus po-(Augustus Casars Sifter) and of Cains Marcellus. He died a young man, being Ædilis of Rome, sterity. and married unto Julia, Augustus Daughter, with whom he lived no long time. But to honour the memory of him, Octavia his Mother built the Library, and Augustus Cefar the Theatre, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theatre and Library.

THE COMPARISON OF

Relopidas and Marcellus acts in Wars.

PHefe are the greateft things and beft worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings: and for their manners and natural conditions otherwife, they were all one, because they were both valiant, painfull, and no-ble minded: faving that this difference onely was between them, that Marcellus in many Cities he took by affault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much blood: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did never put any to the Sword they overcame, neither did they take away the liberty from any City they took : as it is thought the THEBANS would not have handled the OR-CHAMENIANS fo cruelly as they did, if one, or both of them had been prefent. Now for their acts, Marcellus and Pelopidas deeds.

Marcellus made the Romans couragi-it was a noble and wonderfull piece of fervice that Marcellus did, with fo fmall a company of Horsemen as he took with him, to overthrow fo great a company of Horfemen and Footmen both, of the preserved Defore Pelopides. GAULS: a thing that never General but himfelf did, and specially that slew with his own hands in the Field, the General of his Enemies: which Pelapidas could never attain unto; for he feeking to kill Alexander the Tyrant of PHERES, was flain first himself, and suffered that, which he defired to have done to another. And yet for that Service may be objected, the Battles of LEUCTRES, and of TEGY-RA, which were both famous and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambush or secret practise done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his return from exile, when he flew the Tyrants that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and sudden an enterprize stoln upon, as none was ever greater, or more famous. It is true, Marcellus was yoaked with Hannibal, who was a dreadfull and a violent Enemy: fo were the THE-Pelopidas, at the Battles of TEGYRA, and of LEUCTRES. Whereas Marcellus did never to much s once overcome Hannibal, as Polybius writeth, but remained unconquered always, untill that Scipio overcame him in Battle. Notwithflanding, we do give best credit to the reports of Cafar, Livie, Corne lius, Nopos, and of King Juba among the GRECIANS: who write that Marcellus other while did overthrow certain of Hannibal; Companies, howbeit they were never no great overthrows to speak of, and it feemeth rather, it was through fome mockery or deceit of that African then otherwise. Yes fure it was a great matter, and worthy much commendation, that the ROMANS were brought to that conrage, as they durft abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, after fo many great overthrows, and having so many Generals of their Armies slain in battle, and the whole Empire of Rome being in so great danger of utter destruction. For it was Marcellus onely of all other Generals, that put the Ro-MANS in heart again, after fo great and long a fear throughly rooted in them : and incouraged the Souldiers also to long to fight with their Enemy, and not onely to hope, but to affure themselves of Vi-ctory. For, where by reason of their continual losses and fearfull overthrows they had, they thought themselves happy men to escape Hannibals hands by running away: he taught them to be ashamed to By like cowards, to confess they were in distress, to retire, and leave the Field, before they had overcome their Enemies. And where Pelopidae was never overcome in Battle being General, and Marsellus did overcome more than any General in his time : it might feem therefore that the great number of the Victories of the one, should compare with the good hap of the other, that was never overcome. It is true that Marcellus took the City of SYRACUSA, and Pelopidas failed of taking the City of SPARTA: but yet do I think that it was more valiantly done of Pelopidas to come to near SPARTA as he did, and that he was the first that passed the River of EUROTAS with an Army, which never Enemy did before him, then it was of Marcelling to win all SICILE. Unless some peradventure will fay again, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas att, as also in the Victory of Leuc-TRES: whereas no man living can challenge any part of Glory in the doings of Marcellus: for he took Syracusa, being onely General alone, and did overthrow the Galits without his fellow Conful, and fought with Hannibal, without any mans help or encouragement (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrary) and he was the first that altered the manner of Wars the ROMANS used then, and that trained his Souldiers that they durft fight with the Enemy. For their death, I neither Raffines in commend the one nor the other, and the strangeness of either of their deaths doth grieve me marvellouf- Captain dely : as I do greatly wonder also, how Hannibal in so many Battles as he fought (which are innume-ferveth blame! ly: as I dogreatly wonder and, now trammers in 10 many datties as he lought (which are immune-rable) could always (case unburt. I cannot but greatly commend also the valiantities of one Chryfan-nets and obe-tes, whom Xenophon speaketh of in his Books of the institution of Cyrns, saving: that he having lift dience of Chryup his Sword in his hand ready to kill one of his Enemies, and hearing the Trumpet found the Retreat, fantas a Soulhe foftly retired, and would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused : for dier. befide that he was very hot and defirous of Battle, his anger was honourable and just, and moved him to feek revenge. For as the Poet Euripides faith :

> The best that may betide, is when a Captain lives, And doth survive the Viltories, which he with force atchieves : But if he needs must fall, then let him valiantly Even thrust amid the thickest throng, and there with honour die.

For so becometh his death famous, and not dishonourable. But now, besides Pelapidas just cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his Victory ended, in the death of the Tyrant : otherwise he hardly should have found so noble an occafion to have shewed his valiantness, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necesfity, and having no cause or heat of choler (which putteth all men valiant in Fight besides themselves; that they know not what they do) did rashly and unadvisedly, thrust himself into the middest of the danger, where he died not as a General, but as a Light-horseman and Scout (abandoning his three Triumphs, his five Confulships, and his Spoils and tokens of Triumph, which he had gotten of Kings with his own hands) among venurous SPANIARDS and NUMIDIANS, that fold their blood and lives for pay unto the CARTHAGINIANS: fo that I imagine they were angry with themselves (as a man would fay) for fo great and happy Victory, to have flain amongst FREGELLANIAN Scouts. and Light-horfemen, the nobleft and worthieft person of the ROMANS. I would no man should think I speak this in reproach of the memory of these two famous men, but as a grief onely of them and their set his free feth his free valiantnels, which they employed to, as they blemished all their other values, by undifferent hazard-feeth his free ing of their persons and lives without cause, as if they would and should have died for themselves, and judgement of ing of their persons and tives without cause, as it they would aim thoughout the persons are important of not rather for their Country and friends. And also when they were dead, Pelopidae was buried by the their timous Allies and Confederates of the City of THERES, for whole cause he was slain; and Marcellus in like men.

Pelopidae and manner, by the Enemies selves that had slain him. And sure the one is a happy thing, and to be with

THELIFEOF ARISTIDES.

Am. Mand. 3461,

Ant. Christ.

RISTIDES the Son of Lyfimachus, was certainly of the Tribe of Aminchides, and of the Town of ALOPBETA. But for his Goods and Wealth they diverly write of him. For fome fay, he lived poorly all the days of his life, and that he left two Daughters, which by reason of their poverty, lived unmarried many years after their Fathers death. And many of the older Writers do confirm that for troth. Yet Demerriss Phaleriss, in his Book intituled Secrates, writeth the contrary, that he knew certain Lands Ariffide; had in the Village of Paterthe Lerals, which did yet bear the name of Ariffides Lands, in the which his body is buried. And Furthermore, to thew that he was well to live, and that his houle was rich and weal, thy, he bringeth forth these proofs. First, that he was one year Mayor or Provost of ATHENS, whom they called Archon Eponymu, because the year took the name of him that had it yearly. And they say, they called Archon Eponymu, because the year took the name of him that had it yearly. And they say, they called Archon Eponymu, because to it by drawing of the Bean, according to the ancient use of the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their Election of the faid Office: in which Election none were admitted to draw the Bean, but such as were highest set in their Subsidy-books, according to the value and rate of their Goods, whom they called at ATHENS, Pentacostomedimnes, as you would say, those that might difpend five hundred bushels of Wheat by the year, and upwards. Secondly, he alledgeth he was banished by the Ofracismon, which banisheth the Nobility and great rich men onely, whom the common People envy because of their greatness, and never dealeth with poor men. The third and last reason he makes, is, that he left of his gift, three-footed Stools in the Temple of Bacchus, which those do commonly offer up, as have won the victory in Comedies, Tragedies, or other fuch like paftimes, where they them-felves had born the charge. And those three-footed Stools remain there yet, which they say were given by Aristides, and have this Inscription upon them: The Tribe of Antiochides wan the Victory, Aristides defrayed the charges of the Games, and Archestratus the Poet taught them to play their Comedies. The last reason, though it seem likeliest of them all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whom every man knoweth was poor even from his birth, and always lived in great poverty) and Plato the Philosopher, took upon them to defray the charges of the Games that were of no small expence: the one having born the charges of Flute-players at THEBES, and the other the Dance of the Children which danced in a round at ATHEMS: towards the furnishing of which charges, Dion the Sydren which danced in a round at ATHEMS: RACUSIAN gave Plato Money, and Pelopidus also gave Epamisnondus Money. Now, this is not spoken that vertuous menshould always refuse the gifts of their friends, and that they might not in fome fort accept their friends courtesse offered them: but because they should think it uncomemay take guts, but after a fort. Iy and dishonourable for them, to take any thing to enrich themselves, or to spare and hoordup.

Howbeit where there is an honourable Act to be done, or any publick flew to be made, not rendaing to their private benefit: in fuch a case they should not refuse their friends loving offer and good will towards them. And where Demetrius faith, the three-footed Stool was offered up in the Temple of Bacchus, Panatius declareth plainly, that Demetrius was deceived by the semblance of the name. For fince the time of the Wars of the MEDES, unto the beginning of the War of PELOPONNESUS, in all the Registers and Records kept of the defrayers of the charges of common Plays, there were found but two men bearing name of Ariftides that obtained Victory: and neither of them both was Son unto Lysimachus, whom we write of at this present. For the one is expresly named the Son of Xenophilus, and the other was long after the same Aristides we now speak of: as appeareth eafily by the writing and Orthography, which is according to the Grammar Rules, we have used in GREECE ever fince Euclides time. Moreover it is easie to be known, by the name of the Poet Archistratus that is adjoining to it : for there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all the Wars of the MEDES: but in the time of the Wars of Pelo-PONNESUS, many do put him in for an Authour and maker of Rimes and Songs that were fung in common Dances. Yet for all Panatius objections, the matter is to be better looked into. and considered of. But for the Oftracismon banishment, it is true, that such as were great men in estimation above the common People, either in Fame, Nobility, or Eloquence, they onely were subject unto this banishment. For Damon himself, being Pericles School-master, was banished, onely Damon banish. because the common People thought him too wise. Moreover, Idomeness writeth, that Ariftides ed because he was their Provost for a year, not by lot of Beans, but by voice of the ATHENIANS that chose was too wife. him. And if he were Provost fince the Journey of PLATEES, as Demetrius writeth, it is likely enough that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable fervice, which other were wont to obtain for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not onely defend Arifides, but also Socrates poverty, as if it were a foul vice and reproach to be poor. For he writeth, that he had Socrates was not onely a house of his own, but also threescore and ten Minas at usury, which Criton gave him not poor. Interest for. But now to our Story again. Aristides was Clesthenes very friend, he that restored the Government at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty Tyrants, and did reverence Lycurgus the Law-maker of the LACEDEMONIANS for his Laws, above all the men in his time : and therefore he ever favoured the state of Aristocratia, that is, where the Noble men rule and have the Soveraignty. Howbeit he ever had Themistocles (Neocles Son) his continual adversary, as taking part Aristocratia, with the contrary, and defending the Popular state of Government. Some say, that being Scholars, what it signifiand brought up together, they were ever contrary one to another in all their actions and doings, were eth. and brought up together, they were ever contrary one to another in an interfactions and doings, were Ariffiles and it in sport, or in matter of earnest: and ever after, men began to see the natural inclination of them Themistodes both, by their contrary affections. For Themistocles was quick, nimble, adventurous, and subtil, Enemies in the and would venture upon any thing on light occasion. Aristides contrariwise was very quiet, tempe- Commonrate, confiant and marvellous well stayed, who would for no respect be drawn away from equity wealth, and justice, neither would lie, flatter, nor abuse any body, though it were but in sport. Norwith disposition. flanding Ariffus of CHIO writeth, that their malice began first of light love, and that it grew to Ariftides nagreatness by process of time between them: For (faith he) both the one and the other of them fell ture in love with Steffleus, born in the Isle of CAOS. This fond light love of theirs, fell not easily from them, nor the envy they conceived one against another, but continued against each other in matters of State: fuch was their malice towards one another. In which calling, Themistocles fought the way to win friends, by whose means he came to great preferment in short time, and had made himself very strong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told him one day, he was worthy to govern the City of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he were indifferent, and not partiall: The gods forbid (quoth he) I should ever occupy the place of a Governour, where my friends Themistocles should not find more favour then strangers, that do me no pleasure. But Aristides taking another saying for parcourse by himself, would not stand upon his friends in Government. First, because he would do driftiles manno man wrong with pleasuring his friends: nor yet would anger them, by denying their requests. ner of dealing Secondly, because he saw many Rulers and men of Authority bold to do injustice and manifest in the Comwrong, bearing themselves upon their friends: but he carried this Opinion, that no honest man or monwealth: good Citizen, should trust to any bolstering of friends, but to his own just and upright doings. Notwithstanding, Aristides perceiving that Themistocles did rashly alter many things, and ever encountred all his ways, and hindered his doings, he was enforced fometime to cross Themi-Stocles again, and to speak against that he preserved, partly to be even with him, but most to hinder his Credit and Authority, which encreased still through the Peoples favour and good wills towards him: thinking it better by contrarying him a little to disappoint sometime a thing that might have fallen out well for the Commonwealth, rather then by giving him the head, to fulfer him to grow too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time, that Themistocles having preferred a matter very profitable for the Commonwealth, Ariftides was so much against it, as Themistocles purpose took no place. Moreover, Aristides was so earnest against him, that when the Council brake up after Themistocles motion was rejected, he spake it openly before them all: that the Commonwealth of ATHENS would never prosper untill they both were laid in Barathrum, Buruhrum, a which was a Prison or hole, wherein they put all Thieves and condemned men. Another time, Arisia- Prison or des moved a matter to the People, which divers were against, but yet it went with him. And when Dungconthe Judge or President of the Council did put it to the People, to know their allowance of it:

to the Commonwealth, he gave it over, and would not have it pass. Many times also Aristides spake by other men, when he would have a thing go forward, for fear left Themisfockes spight towards Arifides con- him, would hinder the benefit of the Commonwealth. They found him very conftant and resolute in matters of State, whatfoever happened: which wan him great commendation. For he was never the matters of state, within over the prouder for any honour they gave him, nor thought himfelf differed for any overthrow he received: being always of this mind, that it was the duty of an honeft Citizen, to be ever ready to offer his body and life to do his Countrey fervice, without respect and hope of reward of Money, or for Honour and Glory. Therefore when certain Verses were repeated in the Theatre, of one of the Tragedies of Affihilus, made in commendation of the ancient Soothfayer Amphiavam, to this

He will not onely seem, a just man by his face, But just indeed he will be found, and vertue still embrace with all his thought and foul, from whence there may proceed Grave counsell, for to beautifie his Countries Crown indeed. All the People straight cast their eyes upon Aristides, as upon him, that in truth above all other most deferved the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so shout and resolute, not onely to resist savour and friendfhip, but to reject hate and anger also. For in case of justice, neither could friendfhip make him go awry for his friends sake: nor envy could move him to do injustice, to his very enemy. For proof hereof it is written, that he had an enemy of his infuit of Law, and did profecute it to Judgement: infomuch as after the Plaint was read, the Judges were fo angry with the offendor, that without any more hearing of him, they would have given Sentence against him. But Aristides rising from his place, went and kneeled at the Judges feet with the offendor his enemy, and befought them to give him leave to speak, to justifie and defend his Cause, according to the course of Law. Another time he being Judge between two private men that pleaded before him, one of them faid unto him: Ariftides, Arifiiles wife this fellow mine adverfary here, hath done you great injury. My friend (quoth Arifiides again) I pray thee tell me onely the injury he hath done thee, for I am Judge here to do thee right, and not my felf. Moreover, he being chofen high Treasurer of all the Revenues of ATHENS, did declare that all Officers before him, and other his late Predeceffors, had greatly robbed and spoiled the common Treafure, but specially Themistocles: who was a wise man, and of great judgement, but yet somewhat Arifiller cho. light-fingered. Therefore when Arifildes was to give up his account, Themisfoeles and many other for Treasurer fuborned by him, were against him, and accused him for abusing his Office, and followed him to hard, that through their practife they condemned him, as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the noblest Citizens seeing what injury they offered Ariffides, took his cause inhand, and found means to procure the People Themistocles Arifilles accu- not onely to release the Fine imposed upon him, but to restore him again to his Office of high Treasurer for the year following: in the which he feemed to repent his former straightness in Government the year before, and dealt more favourably with those he had to do with, and would not examine every fed and conthing to straightly as he did before. Whereupon such as were thieves and stealers of the Treasure of the demned, for Omee.

Ariffides Fine Common-wealth, did marvellously praise and like him, and became suters for him to continue in the releated, and Office. But when the day of election came, that the ATHENIANS would chuse him again, Aristihe made Trea des felf reproved them, and faid: When I faithfully discharged the duty of mine Office committed to penlyreproveth feeming to fee the thefts and robberies done upon your Treafure, ye claw me, and fay I am an honest close Thieves man, and a good Citizen. But I would you know it and I tell you delete. me by you, I then received shame and reproach at your hands: and now that I have diffembled, not honour you do me now, than I was of the Fine you did fet upon me, when you condemned me the last year : and I am forry to speak it, that you should think it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, in the Comthan to preferve the Commonwealth. After he had spoken these words, and had bewrayed the commonwealth. mon thefis the Officers of the City did commit, he flopped the Thieves mouths that to highly praifed and deteffeth and commended him for fo honeft a man: but yet of the noble and honeft Citizens he was much comtheir praise. mended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathu Lieutenant to Darius King of Persia, was come with all his Navy to go aland about MARATHON, in the Countrey of ATTICA, upon pretence (15 he faid) to be revenged onely of the ATHENIANS, that had burnt the City of SARDIS, but indeed of mind to conquer all GREECE, and to destroy the whole Countrey before him: the ATHENIANS chofe ten Captains to go to the Wars, among whom Miltiade; was the chiefest man of Authority. But Aristides drew very near him in reputation and credit, because he did very good service in obtaining the Victory, specially when he agreed with Miltiades in counsell, to give Battle upon the barbarous People: and also when he willingly gave Militades the whole rule and order of the Army. For every one of the ten Captains did by turns lead the whole Army for one whole day: and when Ariffides turn came about, he gave his preferment thereof unto Militades, teaching his other companions, that it was no fhame, but honour for them to be ruled by the wifeft. Thus by his example he appealed all first that might have grown among them, and perfwaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counsel, that had best experience in the War. And so he did much advance Miltiades honour.

For after that Ariftides had once yielded his Authority unto him, every one of the reft did the like when it came to their turn: and fo they all fubmitted themselves unto the rule and leading. But on the day of the Battle, the place where the ATHENIANS were most cumbred, was in the midft of the Battle, where they had fet the Tribes of the Leomides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous

People did bend all their force, and made their greatest Fight in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles and Aristides fighting one hard by another, for that the one was of the Tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides, they valiantly fought it out with the Enemies, envying one another: so as the barbarous People at the last being overthrown, they made them fly, and drave them to their Ships But when they were embarqued and gone, the Captains of the ATHENIANS perceiving they made Militades Vinot towards the Isles, which was their direct course to return into Asia, but that they were dri- Ctory of the ven back by fform of wind and Pyrries of the Sea, towards the Coast of ATTICA and the City Persians. of ATHENS, fearing left they might find ATHENS unfurnished for defence, and might fet upon it: they thereupon sent away presently nine Tribes that marched thither with such speed, as they came to Athens the very fame day, and lest Aristides in the Campat MARATHON, with his Tribe and Countreymen, to look to the Priloners and Spoil they had won of the barbarous People. Who nothing deceived the opinion they had of his wifdom. For notwithstanding there was great store of Gold and Silver, much Apparell, Moveables, and other infinite Goods and Riches in all their Tents and Pavillions, and in the Ships also they had taken of theirs: he was not so covetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any other to meddle with them, unless by stealth some provided for themselves. As amongst other, there was one Callias, one of Ceres Priests, called Dadouchos, as you would fay, the Torch-bearer, (for in the secret Sacrifices of Ceres, his Office The wicked was to hold the Torch) whom when one of the barbarous People faw, and how he wore a band part of Callian was to hold the Total whom when the state of the took him for forme King, and falling on his knees at his feet, the Total should be state of the sta kissed his hand, and shewed him great store of Gold he had hidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a most cruel and cowardly wretch of all other on the Earth, took away the Gold, and killed the poor foul that had shewed him the place, because he should not tell it to others. Hereof it cometh, that the Comical Poets do call those that came of him in mockery, Laccoplutes, as made rich by a Ditch : because of the Gold that Callias found in it. Immediately after this Battle, A- Arifiiles choristides was chosen Provost of Athens for the year : albeit Demetrius Phalerius Writeth, that it fen Provost of was a little before his death, after the Journey of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they fet in order their Provosts of ATHENS for the year, fince Xanthippides time, there appeared no one name of Arifides in that year that Mardonius the King of PERSIA'S Lieutenant was overthrown by PLATEES, which was many years after : but contrariwife , they find Ariftides enrolled among the Provofts immediately after Phanippus, in the year the Battle was fought at MARATHON. Now the People did most commend Ariffides justice, before all his other vertues and qualities : because that vertue is most common and in use in our life, and delivereth most benefit to men. Hereof it came, that he being a mean man, obtained the worthiest name that one could have, to be called by the whole City, a just man. This furname was never defired of Kings, Princes, nor of Tyrants, but they alwaies delighted to be furnamed, some Poliorcetes, to say, Conquerors of Cities: other Cerauni, to say, lightning or terrible: other Nicanores, to say, Subduers: and some other, Ati and Hieracles, to say, Eagles or Faulcons, or such like Birds that prey: defiring rather (as it should appear by those Surnames) the praise and reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that rifeth by vertue and goodness. Yet notwithstanding, God whom they defire most to be likened to, doth excell all humane Nature in three several things: in Immortality, in Power, and in Vertue, of which three, Vertue is the most honourable and precious thing. For as the Natural Philosophers reason, all the four Elements and Vacuum, are immortal and uncorruptible, and fo are Force and Power, Earth-quakes, Lightning, terrible Storms. running Rivers, and Inundations of Waters: but as for Justice and Equity, no man is partaker of them, fave onely God, by means of reason and understanding. Therefore, because men commonly The praise of have three fundry affections of the gods : the first, that they think them blessed : the second, that Justice, they fear them: the third, that they reverence them: it appeareth then that they think them bleffed, for the Eternity and Immortality of their godhead: that they fear them, because of their Omnipotency and Power: and that they love and worship them, for their Justice and Equity. And yet notwithstanding, of those three, men do covet Immortality, which no flesh can attain unto: and also Power: which dependeth most upon Fortune: and in the mean time they leave Vertue alone, whereof the gods of their goodness have made us capable. But here they shew themselves Authority fools. For Justice maketh the life of a Noble man, and of one in great Authority, seem Divine would be withand Celeftial: where without Justice, and dealing unjustly, his life is most beastly, and odious to the our corruption. World. But now again to Ariftides. This Surname of a just man at the beginning, made him beloved of all the People : but afterwards it turned him to great ill will, and specially by Themistocles Themistocles practife: who gave it out every where, that Aristides had overthrown all Justice, because by confent of the parties he was ever chosen Arbitrator to end all controversies: and that by this means stides Justice, he fecretly had procured the absolute Power of a King, not needing any Guard or Souldiers about him. The People moreover being grown very diffolute and licentious, by reason of the Victory of MARATHON, and feeking to have all things pass by them, and their Authority, began now to mislike, and to be greatly offended, that any private man should go before the rest in good Fame and Reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all Shires of ATTICA into the City of ATHENS, and so banished Aristides with the Offracismon: disguising the envy they bare to his Glory with Aristides basis the Name of fear of Tyranny. For this manner of banishment called Oftracismon, or Exostra- shed with the cifmon, was no ordinary punishment for any fault or offence committed: but to give it an honest cloak, Oftracifmon, they faid it was onely a pulling down and wing thou of the nature of they faid it was onely a pulling down and tying short of too much Greatness and Authority, excee-the Oftracifmon ARISTIDES. ding far the matter and countenance of a Popular State. But to tell you truly, it was none otherwise, then a gentle mean to qualific the Peoples envy against fome private person : which envy bred no malice to him whose greatness did offend them, but onely tended to the banishing of him for ten years. But afterwards when by practile, this Oftracismon banishment was laid upon mean men, and Male-Hyperbolus the factors, as upon Hyperbolus that was the last man so banished, they never after used it any more at latt man banis Athens. And by the way it shall not be amissto tell you here, why and wherefore this Hyperbolus was banished. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefest men of ATHENS at that time, and Official mon.

The cause of they both were ever at square together, a common thing amongst great men. They perceiving now they both were ever at square together, a common thing amongst great men. The came of the young were affembling, that they went about to execute the Offracismon, were marvellous afraid it was meant to banish one of them: wherefore they spake together, and made both their followers friends with each other, and joined them in one Tribe together, infomuch, when the most voices of the People were gathered to condemn him that should be banished, they found it was Hyperbolus. The People therewith were much offended, to fee the Oftracismon so embased and scorned, that they A description never after would use it again, and so left it off for ever. But briefly to let you understand what A description of the Ofricacifmon was, and after what fort they used it: ye are to know, that at a certain day appoint ted, every Citizen carried a great shell in his hand, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would have banished, and brought it into a certain place railed about with wooden bars in the Market-place, Then, when every man had brought in his shell, the Magistrates and Officers of the City did count and tell the number of them: for if there were less then fix thouland Citizens, that had thus brought thele shells together, the Oftracismon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid apart every mans name written in these shells: and whose name they found written by most Citizens, they proclaimed him by found of Trumpet, a banished man for ten years, during which time notwithstanding, the party A Tale of 2 plain man that plain man that banished; it is reported there was a plain man of the Country (very fimple) that could neither banished; it is reported there was a plain man of the Country (very fimple) that could neither write nor read, who came to Arifides (being the first man he met with) and gave him his shell; praying him to write Aristides name upon it. He being abashed withall, did ask the Countrey man, il Arsstides had ever done him any displeasure. No, said the Countrey man, he never did me hurt, pray nim to write Ariffides nor I know him not: but it grieves me to hear every man call him a just man. Ariffides hearing him write Ariffides nor I know him not: fay fo, gave no answer, but wrote his own name upon the shell; and delivered it again to the Countrey man. But as he went his way out of the City, he lift up his hands to heaven, and made a Prayer contrary to that of Achilles in Homer, befeeching the gods that the ATHENIANS might never have such troubles in hand, as they should be compelled to call for Aristides again. Notwithstanding, within three years after, when Xerxes King of Persia came with his Army through the Countries of THESSALY and BOEOTIA, and entred into the heart of the Countrey of Ar-Arifilites call-TICA, the ATHENIANS revoking the Law of their Offracifmon, called home again all those they had banished, and specially, because they were airaid Aristides would take part with the barbarous People, and that his example should move many other to do the like; wherein they were greatly deceived in the nature of the man: for before that he was called home, he continually travelled up and down, perfeading and encouraging the GRECIANS to maintain and defend their Liberty. After that Law was repealed by Proclamation, and that Themisfocles was chosen the onely Lieutenant General of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aid and affift him in all things, as well with his travel, as also with his counsel: and thereby wan his Enemies great honour, because it stood upon the fafety and preservation of his Countrey. For when Euribiades, General of the Army of the GRE-CIANS, had determined to forfake the Isle of SALAMINA, and that the Galleys of the barbarous People were come into the midft of the Seas, and had environed the Isles all about, and the mouth of the arm of the Straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were thus inclosed in : A. ristides departing out of the Isle of Agina with a marvellous boldness, ventured through the middest of all the barbarous Ships and Fleet, and by goodhap got in the night into Themssfooles Ten, and calling him out, spake with him there in this fort: Themisfocles, if we be both wise, it is high time we should now leave off this vain envy and spight we have long time born each other, and that we should enter into another fort of envy more honourable and profitable for us both: I mean, which of us two should do his best endeavour to fave GREECE: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant Generall: and I, by counfelling you the beft, and executing your commandments considering you are theman alone that will roundliest come unto the point that is best: which is in my opinion, that we should hazard Battle by Sea within the Straight of SALAMINA, and that as foon as might be possible. But if our Friends and Consederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you your Enemies do help it forward. For it is said, the Sea both before and behind us, and round about us, is covered all over with their Ships, so as they that would not before, shall now be compelled of force, and in spight of their hearts, to fight and bestir them like men: because they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to scape, nor to fly. Whereunto Themistocles answered : I am forry, Aristides, that herein your honesty appear reth greater then mine: but fince it is fo, that you have deserved the honour in beginning, and procuring fuch an honourable and commendable strife between us, I will henceforth endeayour my felf to exceed you in continuing this your defire, After which Answer, he told Arishides, how he purposed to mock the barbarous King, and prayed him to entreat Euribiades to yield to his device, and to perfuade him that there was no other way to fave GREECE, but to fight by Sea: for Euribiades gave more credit to Aristides perswasions, than he did to Themistocles words: for when all the Captains were called to Council, to determine whether they should give Battle, or not: one Cleorring Corinthian faid to Themistocles, that his counfell did not like Aristides at all as it feemed, because he spake never a word to it being present. Arifides answered him straight, that he utterly miftook him. For (quoth he) if I did not think his counfell good, I would not hold my Arifillet peace as I do : but now I am mute, not for any good will I bear him, but because I find his counsels words of Thewife and found. While the Captains of the GRECIANS were reasoning in this sort, Aristides militotles, feeing PSYTTALEA (a little Island before SALAMINA within the Straight) full of men of War of their Enemies: imbarqued immediately the valiantest and lustiest Souldiers he had of all his Countrey men, into the leaft Foysts or Pinnaces he had among all his Galleys: and went with them, Arifiider vi. and landed in that Ide, and overthrew all the barbarous People he found there, and put them to the droy of Pfir-Sword every man, taking the chiefest of them onely Prisoners: among which were three Sons of talea. Sandauce, the Kings Siller, whom he fent unto Themifucles. These three Lords were all slain by the commandment of Euphrantidas the Soothsayer, and sacrificed to Bacchus Omestes, as to say, the cruel Bacchus, and eater of raw flesh, and all upon an Oracle they had received. That done, Aristides dispersed his Souldiers about the Isle, to receive all such as were by fortune of War, or of the Sea, cast into the Island: to the end that no Enemy of theirs should scape their hands, nor any of his friends fhould perish. For the greatest Fleet of all their Ships, and the sharpest encounter of the whole Battle, was about this little Island : and therefore the Tokens of Triumph were fer there. After the Battle was won, Themissoeles to feel Aristides opinion, said unto him: We have done a good piece of service, but yet there is another behind of greater importance, and that is this: We must bring all ASIA into EUROPE, which we may easily do, if we sail with all speed to the Straight of HELLES PONT, and go break the Bridge the King hath made there. Then Arigides cried out, Stay there, never speak of that: but I pray you let us rather feek all the ways we can, how Arigides wife to drive this barbarous King out of Greece, left if we keep him in ftill with so great an Army Xerxer thying Straight of HELLESPONT, and go break the Bridge the King hath made there. Then Arifides Cri-(and he shall see no way before him to escape out) we drive him then to sight like a desperate man, out of Greece. and perill our felves, we cannot tell to what. When Themisfecles had heard his opinion, he fecretly fent the Eunuth Arnaces his Priloner, unto King Xerxes, to advertise him from him, that he had al- A ftrategem of tered the GRECIANS purpole, which was fully bear to have broken up the Bridge he had made at Themifficier. the Straight of Hallespont, to passover his Army: and that he was the willinger to let him underftand it, that he might the better provide for the fafety of his Person. King Xerxes being neded Xerxes lefe with this advertisement, took straight his journey, and with all speed went to recover the Straight of Mardonius his Wind this advertiseins, took pleases the Lieutenant Generall in Greece, with three bundred thous Lieutenant in Greece with the Comment of the fand of the best Souldiers of his Army. This Mardonius was marvellouly dreaded of all the GRE- three bundred CIANS, for the wonderfull great Army he had by Land, and he did threaten them also by his Let-thouland men. ters he wrote unto them : You have (faid he) with your Ships by Sea, overcome men acquainted to fight by Land, and that never handled Oar: but now, the Plains of THESSALY, or the Fields of BO FOTIA, are very fair and large for Horsemen and Footmen to make proof of their valiantness, if you will come to the Battle in the Field. He wrote Letters to the ATHENIANS, by the King his Mafters commandment, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build up their City again, to give them a great Pension, and furthermore to make them Lords of all GREECE, so they would give over, and leave off these Wars. The LACEDEMONIANS being forthwith advertised of his Letters written to the ATHENIAMS, and fearing left they would have been perfinaded by them: fent their Ambassadors with all speed to ATHEMS, to pray them to send their Wives and Children unto Spania, and alfa to offer them Victuals, to relieve their poor old People, because of the great starcity that was at Anhens, for that their City was burnt and razed, and all their Countrey belides defleroyed by the barbarous People. The ATHENIANS having heard the offers of the Ambaffadors of LACEDAMON, made them a marvellous answer through Arifides counsell, and this The noble it was : That they bare with the barbarous People, though they thought all things were to be fold mind of the for Gold and Silver, because they esteemed nothing more precious nor better in this World, than to Atheniani be rich and wealthy: but on the other fide, they were greatly offended with the LACEDEMONI-Ans, that they onely regarded the prefent poverty, and necessity of the Athenians, and did forger their vertue and noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the prefervation of GREECE, by offering them Victuals to live withall. The People approving this Answer, Arifides then caused the Ambassadors of SPARTA to come to the Assembly, and commanded them to tell the LACEDEMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the Gold above, or under the ground, could not corrupt the ATMENIANS, to make them take any fum of Money or reward, to leave the defence of the Liberty of GREECE. And to the Herauld that came from Mardonius, he shewed the Sun, and said unto him: So long as yonder Sun keepeth his course about the World, so long will the ATHENIANS be mortal Enemies unto the Perslams, because they have spoiled and destroyed all their Countrey, and have desiled and burnt the Temples of their gods. Besides, he willed that the Priests, by commandment of the People, should excommunicate and curse him that would procure them to fend unto the Persians to make peace with them, and to break their League and Alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came again the fecond time to over-tunthe Country of ATTICA, the ATHENIANS got them again into the Me of SALAMINA, and then they fent Arifides Ambaffador unto the LACEDEMONIANS. He sharply took them up, and reproved their sloth and negligence, because they had again forfaken ATHANS, and left it to the spoil of the barbarous People : and prayed them yet they would within the City of SPARTA) when they had heard Ariftides perswasions, straight took order for aid, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good chear, keeping that day one of their folemn Feafts they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they fent out five thousand Citizens born in Sparta, into the Field, all proper men and valiant Souldiers, every one of them carrying with him feven llotes (which are the Countrey men and Slaves in the Countrey of LACEDAMONIA) not making the Ambassadors of Athens privy to it at all. Wherefore Ariflides came again another time into their Council, to complain of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and faid he dreamed, or elfe he mocked them: for their Army which they had fear against the strangers (for so they called the Persians) was already at the City of Orestion in ARCADIA. Arifides hearing this answer, replyed, that they were to blame to mock them in that fort, to fend away their men to ferretly, that they might not know of it : and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceive their friends, but their Enemies rather. Idomeneus in his Story reporteth the matter thus in every point: notwithflanding, in the Decree that was made to fend Ambassadors to Sparta, Aristides is not named for Ambassador, but there are other appointed: as Cimon, Xanthippus, and Mironides. Afterwards Ariffides was chosen by voices of the People, Lieutenant General of the Army of ATHENS, in this War against the PERSIANS, and went unto the Camp of the GRECIANS by the City of PLATES, with eight thouland Footmen well armed and appointed. There he found King Paufanias the onely General of all the whole Power and Army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and PaulanissKing there came daily into his Camp one after another, a marvellous great multitude of other GRECI-ANS. Now touching the Army of the barbarous People, they encamped all along the River of Aso pus: but because their Camp Aretched out a marvellous way in length, they were not entrenched at all, but had onely fortified a piece of ground four-fquare with a Wall about, which was ten General of all furlongs on every fide, to place all their carriage and chiefer things in. And for the GRECIANS again, the Soothfayer Tifamensus, born in the City of ELIDE, had told Paufanias, and all the GRECIANS together, that they should have the Victory, so they did not affault at all, but onely Oracles of the defend. And Arifides, that had fent to the Oracle of Apollo at DELPHOS, in the name of the A-THENIANS, had answer: They should overcome their Enemies, so they did facrifice and make special Prayers unto Jupiter and June of Mount CITHERON, unto Pan, and unto the Nymplis Spinagistides, and also unto the demy-gods, Androcrates, Leacon, Pifander, Damocrates, Hypfon, Altean, and Polyidus: and so that they did hazard Battle also within their own Territories, and in the Plain of Ceres Eleufinian, and of Proferpina. This Oracle troubled Ariftides marvelloully, because the demy-gods whom they had commandment to do Sacrifice unto, were the Founders and Ancestors of the PLATEIANS: and the Cave of the Nymphs Sphragitides, is one of the tops of the Mount CITHERON, booking towards the West, where the Sun setteth in Summer. They say there was an Oracle there in old time, whole spirit possessed many Inhabitants thereabouts, and bestraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepis, as who would say, taken with the Nymphs. And again, to tell the ATHENIANS they should have the Victory, so they did hazard Battle in the Plain of Ceres Eleusinian, and within their own Territory : it was even to fend them back again into the Countrey of ATTICA. Arifides being thus perplexed, Arimnestu Captain of the PLATÆIANS, had such a Vision in the night in his sleep. He thought, that Jupiter the Saviour did appear unto him, and asked him what the GRECIANS intended to do? and that he answered: My Lord, we must to morrow remove our Camp into the Territories of Elsu-Arimneftas 51N, and there we will fight with the barbarous People, according to the commandment the Oracle of Apollo hath given us. Then that Jupiter replied, that they were greatly deceived: for all that Apollo had declared by his Oracle was meant within the Territories of the PLATEIANS, and that they should find it true, if they considered it well. Arimnestus having plainly seen this Vision in his sleep, when he did awake in the morning, he straight sent for the oldest Citizens, and considering with them where this place should be, he found at the length, that at the foot of Mount CITHERON, by the City of Nysia, there was an old Temple they called the Temple of Ceres Elenstinian, and of her Daughter Proferpina. When he heard them fay so, he went straight and told Aristides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to fet an Army in Battle ray, that had but few Horfemen; for that the foot of Mount CITHERON did let the Horfemen, they could not go to the place where the Temple ftood, and where the Plain and Valley did end: befides also, that the Chappel of Asdrocrates was even in that place, which was all hidden with thick Wood round about it. And because they should lack nothing to hinder the express commandment of the Oracle for hope of Victory, the PLATEIANS (through Arimnestus counsell and advice) made a common Decree, that the Confines of the City of PLATEES should be taken away towards ATHENS fide, and that the Land The magnanist thereof should be given clearly unto the ATHENIANS, because they should fight with the barbarous People in their own Land, for the defence and prefervation of GREECE, according to the command-PLEASANT the ment of the Oracle. This noble gift and Present of the PLATEIANS Was so samous, as many years Great doth ho. after, King Alexander the Great having conquered the Empire of Asia, built up the Walls again of nour the Plate the City of PLATERS, and when he had done, made a Herauld openly proclaim it at the Games tains for their Olympicall, that Alexander haddone the PLATEIANS that honour and dignity, for a memorial noble minds. and honour of their magnanimity; because in the War against the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally given away their Land unto the ATHENIANS, for the safety of the GRECIANS; and hath shewed themselves of a noble courage also, and very willing to defend the state of Greece. Now when the Army of the GRECIANS came to be fet in order of Battle, there fell a strife be- Strife between tween the Athenians and the Tegeates, because the Athenians would needs (ac- the Athenians cording to their old custom) have the left Wing of the Battle, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had and Tegester. the right Wing: and the TEGEATES on the contrary part, would have the preheminence before driffication the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous Acts and notable Service of their Ancestors in some by pacified the the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous Acts and notable Service of their Ancestors in former mutiny, Wars, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutiny. But Ariftides stept between them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their Nobility and Valiantnels: and as for you, my Lords of Sparta (laid he) and you also my Masters of Greece; we tell you, that the place neither giveth nor taketh vertue away; and we do affure you, that wherefoever you place us, we will so defend and keep it, as we will not impair nor blemish the honour we have won in former foughten Battles and gotten Victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common Enemies, nor to brag of our Ancestors doings, but to shew our selves valiant in desence of all GREECE. For this Battle will make good proof of all the GRECIANS, how much estimation every City, every Captain, and particular person will deserve for his part. When Aristides had spoken, the Captains and all other of the Council concluded in favour of the ATHENIANS, that they should have one of the Wings of the Battle. But by this means all GREECE stood in marvellous garboil at that time, and the State of the ATHENIANS specially in great danger. For a number of the noblest Citizens of ATHENS, and that brought great substance with them to the Wars, being now at low state, and in poverty, their Goods being spent and gone, and seeing themselves discountenanced, not bearing that Rule and Authority in the Commonwealth they were wont to do, because other were called to Authority, and preferred to the Offices of the City: they gathered together, and met at a house in the City of PLA- The conspira-TAES, and there conspired to overthrow the Authority of the People at ATHENS: and if they cy of the rich could not obtain their purpose, then that they would rather lose all, and betray their Countrey unto Noblemen of the barbarous People. While these things were practised in the Camp, many being of the Conspi. Athens. racy. Ariftides came to an inckling of it, and was marvelloully afraid, because of the time : wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter, being of fuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to understand the whole Conspiracy, little knowing what a number might be drawn into this Treason, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather respected that which was just, then what was profitable for the time. So he caused eight persons onely of the great number to be apprehended, and of these eight, the two first whom they would have indicted as Principals, and were most to be burdened for the Conspiracy, Afchines of the Town of LAMPRA, and Egestas of the Town of ACHARNA, they found means to fly out of the Camp, and to fave themselves. And for the other, Arifides fet them at liberty, and gave them occasion that were not discovered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: faying, that the Battle should be their Judge, where they should purge themselves of all accusations said against them, and shew the World also, that they never had any other intention but honest and good, towards their Countrey. Mardonius, to prove the courage of the GRECIANS, had fent all his Horsemen (wherein he was far stronger then the GRE-CIANS) to skirmish with them. Who were lodged at the foot of Mount CITHERON, in strong places and full of stones, saving the three thousand MEGARIANS, that camped in the Plain; by Mount Cibbs reason whereof, they were sore troubled and hurt, by the Horsemen of the barbarous People that set ron. upon them on every fide, for they might charge them where they would. Infomuch, in the end, perceiving they alone could no longer relift the force of so great a multitude of the barbarous People, they fent with all speed possible to Pausanias, to pray him to fend them present aid. Pausanias hearing this news, and feeing in his own fight the Camp of the MEGARIANS almost covered with Shot and Darts which the barbarous People threw at them, and that they were compelled to fland close together in a little corner: he wist not what to do. For to go thither in person with the LACE-DEMONIANS that were footmen heavy armed, he thought that was no way to help them. So he proved to put some ambitious desire and envy of honour, among the private Captains and Generals of the Army of the other GRECIANS, which were then about him: to fee if he could move any mans courage and defire, to offer himself willingly to aid the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deaf ears, but Arifides, who promifed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodors into the Field (one of the valiantest Captains that served under him) with his Company of three hundred chosen men, and certain Shot mingled amongst them. These Souldiers were ready in a moment, and marched straight in Battle ray, a great pace towards the barbarous People. Manifitus General of the Horiemen of the Persians, a goodly tall man, perceiving their coming towards him: turned his Horse, and galloped to them. The ATHENIANS tarried him, and Horsenen of kept their ground, and the encounter was very hot, because both the one and the other side did the the Persuant. beft they could at this first onser to put the rest of the Battle in jeopardy: and they fought so long, that Massium Horse was shorthrough the body with an Arrow, that put him to such pain, as he never left flinging, till he cast his Master on the ground, armed as he was at all pieces. So being on the ground, he could not rife again, as well for the weight of his Armour, as for that the ATHE-NIANS came fo fuddenly upon him. And notwithstanding there were many about him to hew him in pieces, yet they could find no way how to kill him, he was fo throughly armed and loaden with Gold, Copper, and Iron, not onely upon his body and his head, but allo on his legs and arms: untill at the length there was one that thrust the head of his Dart through his Bever, and so killed him.

Mafiftius Dain by the Atheni-

ARISTIDES The PERSIANS perceiving that, fled immediately, and forfook the body of their General. Shortly after it appeared to the GRECIANS, that they had fped well at this Skirmish, not because shey had sain many Enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous People made for the loss of Massifism. For his death did so grieve them, that they polled themselves, they clipped off their Horfe and Mules hairs, and filled belides all the Field thereabouts with pitifull cries and fhrieks, as those that had lost the valiantest and chiefest man of Authority of all their Camp, next unto Mardonisu the Kings Lieutenant. After this first Skirmish, both the one and the other side kept their Camp, and would not come into the Field many days after: for the Soothfayers did promife both sides the Victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GRECIANS, so they did but onely defend; and contrariwife, they did threaten them to be overthrown, that did affault. But Mardonius finding Victuals waxed feant, and that they were ftored but for few days, and moreover how the GRE-CIANS daily grew stronger by continual repair to their Camp, the longer he delayed : in the end he resolved to tarry no longer, but to pass the River Aso Pus the next morning by break of the day, and suddenly to set upon the GRECIANS. So he gave the Captains warning the night before what they should do, because every man should be ready. But about midnight there came a Horseman without any noise at all, so near to the GRECIANS Camp, that he spake to the Watch, and told them he would speak with Aristides General of the ATHENIANS. Aristides was called for straight, and when he came to him, the Horseman said unto Aristides: I am Alexander King of Macedon, who for the long and great good will I bear you, have put my felf in the greatest Kingof Mac-danger that may be, to come at this present time to advertise you, that to morrow morning Mardon, revealeth donism will give you Battle: because your Enemies sudden coming upon you, should not make you afraid, being suddenly charged, and should not hinder also your valiant fighting. For it is no new secret counter anno Arifider. hope that is come to Mardonism, that makes him to fight, but onely fearcity of Victuals that forceth him to do it, confidering that the Prognosticators are all against it, that he should give you Battle, both by reason of the ill tokens of their Sacrifices, as also by the answers of their Oracles, which bath put all the Army in a marvellous fear, and stand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at a venture, or else if he will needs lie still, to be starved to death for very famine. After King Alexander had imparted this secret to Aristides, he prayed him to keep it to himself, and to remember it in time to come. Arifides answered him then, that it was no reason he should keep a matter of fo great importance as that from Paufanias, who was the Lieutenant General of their whole Army: notwithstanding, he promited him he would tell it no man else before the Battle, and that if the gods gave the GRECIANS the Victory, he did affurehim, they should all acknowledge his great favour and good will shewed unto them. After they had talked thus together, King Alexander left him, and returned back again : and Ariftides also went immediately to Pausania Tent, and told him the talk King Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the private Captains were feat for straight to Council, and there order was given, that every man should have his Bands ready, for they should fight in the morning. So Paufaniau at that time (as Herodotus writeth) faid unto Arifides, that he would remove the ATHENIANS from the left to the right Wing, because they should have the Persians themselves right before them, and that they should fight so much the luftier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also because they had overcome them before in the first encounter: and that himself would take the left Wing of the Battle, where he should encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS side. But when all the other private Captains of the ATHENIANS understood it, they were marvellous angry with Paufanias, and faid he did them wrong, and had no reason to let all the other GRECIANS keep their place where they were alwaies appointed, and onely to remove them, as if they were Slaves, to be appointed at his pleasure, now on the one side, then on the other, and to set them in fight with the valiantest Souldiers they had of all their Enemies. Then faid Arifides to them, that they knew not what they faid, and how before they misliked, and did strive with the TEGEATES, onely for having the left Wing of the Battle; and when it was granted, they thought themselves greatly honoured that they were preferred before them, by order of the Captains : and now where the LACEDEMONIANS were willing of themselves to give them the place of the right Wing, and did in manner offer them the preheminence of the whole Army: they do nor thankfully take the honour offered them, nor yet do reckon of the vantage and benefit given them to fight against the PERSIANS selves, their ancient Enemies, and not against their natural Countrey men ancienty descended of them. When Aristides had used all these persuasions unto them, they were very well contented to change place with the LACEDEMONIANS; and then all the talk among them was to encourage one another, and to tell them that the Persians that came against them, had no better hearts nor Weapons, then those whom they before had overcome, in the Plain of MARATHON. For faid they, they have the fame Bows, the fame rich imbroidered Gowns, the same golden Chains and Carcanets of womanish persons, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint hearts: where we have also the same Weapons and bodies we had, and our hearts more lively and couragious then before, through the fundry Victories we have fince gotten of them. Further, we have this advantage more, that we do not fight as our other Confederates the GRECIANS do, for our City and Countrey onely, but also to continue the Fame and Renown of our former noble fervice, which we wan at the Journeys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA; to theend, the World should not think that the Glory of these Triumphs and Victories was due unto Militades onely, or unto Fortune, but unto the courage and worthiness of the ATHENIANS.

Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied to change the order of their Battle in hafte. The THEBANS on the other fide that took part with Mardonius, receiving intelligence of the alter- The Treaton of ing of their Battle, by Traytors that ran between both Camps, they straight told Mardonius of the Thebons. it. He thereupon did suddenly also change the order of his Battle, and placed the right Wing of the Persians against the left Wing of his Enemies: either because he was afraid of the ATHE-NIANS, or else for greater glory, that he had a defire to fight with the LACEDEMONIANS, and commanded the GRECIANS that took his part, that they should fight against the ATHENI-ANS. This alteration was fo openly done, that every man might fee it: whereupon Paufanias removed the LACEDEMONIANS again, and fet them in the right Wing. Mardonius feeing that, removed the PERSIANS again from the right Wing, and brought them to the left Wing (where they were before, against the LACEDEMONIANS: and thus they consumed all that day in changing their men to and fro. So the Captains of the GRECIANS fate in Council at night, and there they agreed, that they must needs remove their Camp, and lodge in some other place where they might have water at commandment : because their Enemies did continually trouble and spoil that water they had about them, with their Horses. Now when night came, the Captains would have marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed : but the People went very ill willing, and they had much ado to keep them together. For they were no fooner out of the Trenches and Fortifications of their Camp, but the most part of them ran to the City of PLATEES, and were marvelloully out of order, dispersing themselves here and there, and set up their Tents where they thought good, before the places were appointed for them: and there were ther Tens where they mought good south the LACEDEMONIANS onely, and that was againft their wills. The flubbornfor one of their Captains called Amompharetus, a marvellous hardy man, that feared no danger, nels of Amompharetus, and longed fore for Battle, he was in such a rage with these trifling delays, that he cryed it out in the pharents Cap-Camp, that this removing was a goodly running away, and sware he would not from thence, but tain of the Lawould there tarry Mardonius coming with his Company. Paulanias went to him, and told him he codemonians. must do that the other GRECIANS had consented to in Council, by most voices. But Amonpharetus took a great stone in his hands, and threw it down at Pausanias seet, and told him, There is the fign I give to conclude Battle, and I pass not for all your cowardly conclusions. Amompharetus stubborness did so' amaze Pausanias, that he was at his wits end. So he sent unto the ATHENIANS that were onwards on their way, to pray them to tarry for him, that they might go together, and therewithall made the rest of his men to march towards the City of PLATÆES. supposing thereby to have drawn Amompharetus to have followed him, or else to let him remain alone behind. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonins understanding that the GRE-CLANS did forfake their first lodging, he made his Army presently march in Battleray to set up. The Battle of on the LACEDEMONIANS. So the barbarous People made great shouts and cries, not thinking the Grecians to go fight but to fack and final the Grecians should away as indeed they did little better with the Perfections. to go fight, but to fack and spoil the GRECIANS slying away, as indeed they did little better, with the Persiant the City For, Paulanias feeing the countenance of his Enemies, made his Enfigns to ftay, and commanded of Plataes. every man to prepare to fight: but he forgot to give the GRECIAN'S the fignall of the Battle, either for the anger he took against Amompharetus, or for the sudden onset of the Enemies, which made them that they came not in straight, nor all together to the Battle after it was begun, but stragling in small Companies, some here, and some there. In the mean time, Pausanias was buste in facrificing to the gods, and feeing that the first Sacrifices were not acceptable unto them, by the Soothfayers observations they made, he commanded the Spartans to throw their Targets at their feet, and not to ftir out of their places, but onely to do as he bade them, without relifting their Enemies. When he had given this straight order, he went again and did Sacrifice, when the Horsemen of the Enemies were at hand, and that their Arrows flew amongst the thickest of the LA-CED.EMONIANS, and did hurt divers of them, and specially poor Callicrates among the rest, Callicrates that was one of the goodliest men in all the GRECIANS Hoast and Army. He having his deaths sain without wound with an Arrow, before he gave up the ghost, said, His death did not grieve him, because he fighting. came out of his Countrey to die for the defence of GREECE; but it grieved him to die fo cowardly, having given the Enemy never a blow. His death was marvellous Tamentable, and the conftancy of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they never stirred out of their places, nor made any countenance to defend themselves against their Enemies that came upon them, but suffered themselves to be thrust through with Arrows, and slain in the Field, looking for the hour the gods would ap- Spartan Soulpoint them, and that their Captains would command them to fight. Some write alfo, that as die sunto Paulanias was at his Prayers, and doing Sacrifice unto the gods a little behind the Battle, cer-death. tain of the Lydians came upon him, and overthrew and took away all his Sacrifice; and that Paufanias, and those that were about him (having no other Weapons in their hands) drave them away with force of Staves and Whips. In memory whereof, they fay there is a folemn Proceffion kept at Sparta on that day, which they call the Lydians Procession, where they whip and beat young Boys about the Altar. Then was Paufanian in great diftress, to see the Priests offer Sacrifice upon Sacrifice, and that not one of them pleafed the gods: at the laft he turned his eyes to

other gods (Patrons and Protectors of the Country of the PLATEIANS) that if it were nor the will of the godsthe GRECIANS should have the Victory, yet that the Conquerors at the least

infomuch as the Priests and Soothsayers came to promise him victory. Thereupon, he straight gave commandment to march toward the Enemy, which flew from man to man incontinently that they fhould march. So as he that had feen the Squadron of the LACEDEMONIANS, would have faid it had been like the body of a fierce Beaft railing up the briffles, preparing to fight. Then the barbarous Battle betwire People faw they should have hot Battle, and that they should meet with men that would fight it out to the death; wherefore they covered their bodies with great Targets after the Persian fashion, and beftowed their Arrows luftily upon the LACED & MONIANS, but they keeping close together, and covering themselves with their Shields, marched on still upon them, until they came to joyn with the Enemy to luftily, that they made their Targets fly out of their hands with the terrible thrufts and blows of the Pikes and Spears upon their breafts, and overthwart their faces, that they slew many of them, and laid them on the ground. For all that, they died not cowardly, but took the La-CEDEMONIANS Pikes and Spears in their bare hands, and brake them in two by firength of their arms: and then they quickly pluckt our their Cimiters and Axes, and luftily laid about them, and wrung the LACED & MONIANS Shields out of their hands by force, and fought it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now whileft the LACEDEMONIANS were builty fighting with the barbarous People, the ATHENIANS stood still imbattelled far off, and kept their ground. Bur when they faw the LACEDEMONIANS tarry so long, and that they came not, and heard a marvellous note of men as though they were fighting, and befides that there came a speedy Melianger unto them fent from Paufanias, to let them understand they were fighting: then they marched with all speed they could to help them. But as they were coming on, a great pace over the Plain, unto that part where they heard the noise, the GRECIANS that were on Merdonisus fide came against them. Arifides feeing them coming towards them, went a good way before his Company, and cried out as loud ashe could for life, and conjured the GRECIAMS in the name of the gods, the Protectors of GREECE, to leave off these Wars, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to help them that ventured their lives, to defend the Commonwealth and fafety of all GREECE. But when he faw they would needs fight for any request and conjuration he could use, and that they came still upon them, bending themselves to give Charge: then he stayed his going to relieve the La-CEDEMONIANS, and was compelled to make head against those that set upon him and his Company, they being about hity thouland men; of the which, the most part notwithstanding went their ways. and left the Army, specially when they understood the Persians were overthrown and fled. The fury of the Battle and cruellest Fight (as they say) was where the THEBANS were : because the Nobility and chiefest men of the Countrey fought very earnestly for the PERSIANS, but the People results, lity and chiefest men of the Countrey fought very earnestly for the PERSIANS, but the People results being led by a small number of the Nobility that commanded them. So they fought that day in two places, the LACEDEMONIANS being the first that overthrew the Persians, and made them fly: and they flew Mardonius the Kings Lieutenant, with a blow of a stone one Arimnessus a SPARTAN Plain by Arim-gave him upon his head, rightly as the Oracle of Amphiaram had prophecyed before unto him. For Mardonius before the Battle had fent thither a Lydian, and a Carian unto the Oracle of Throblow of a stone the man of LyDIA lay within the Sanctuary of Amphirrans, where he thought in his dream that one of the Priefts of the Temple willed him to go out of the place he was in, and he denying it, the Prieft took a great stone and threw it at his head, and so thought he was slain with the blow. And thus it is Written. And furthermore, the LACEDEMONIANS did chase the PERSIANS flying into their Fortifications they had in a Wood: and the ATHENIANS also thortly after overthrew the THEBANS, whereof they slew in the Field three hundred of the nobleft and chiefest of them. For even as the THEBANS began to turn tail, newscame unto the ATHENIANS, that the PERSIANS had entrenched themselves within their Fort and strength in the Wood, where the LACEDEMONIANS did besiege them. The ATHENIANS fuffered the GRECIANS that fled to fave themselves, and they went to help the LACEDEMONIANS, to take the Fort of the barbarous People: who went before but flenderly a bout it, because they had no experience to make an assault, nor force upon a Wall. But so foon as the ATHENIANS came in to them, they straight took it by assault, and made great staughter of the Persians and barbarous People. For of three hundred thousand fighting men that Mardonius hadin his Camp, there were faved onely but forty thousand, led under Artabazus: and of the GRECIANS and investore fide there were not flain above thirteen hundred and threefcore in all 3 amongst which also there were thousand Per- fide there were not flain above thirteen hundred and threefcore in all 3 amongst which also there were two and fifty ATHENIANS, all of the Tribe of & Hamides, the which had done more valiantly that day than any other Tribe, as Clidemus writeth. And this is the cause why the Lamides made a solema Sacrifice unto the Nymphs Sphragitides, at the common charge, according to the order given than one interescore Grecians flain, by the Oracle of Apollo, to give them thanks for this Victory. Of the Lacede Monians there died fourfcore and eleven : and of the TEGEATES fixteen. But I marvell, Herodotus faith, that none but these People onely sought in that Journey against the barbarous Nation, and no other GRECIANS belides: for the number of the dead bodies, and their graves also do shew that it was a general Victory and Exploit of all the GRECIANS together. And moreover, if there had been but these three People onely that had fought against them, and that all the rest had stood and looked on, and done nothing: fure there had been no fuch Epigram as this engraven upon the Altar or Tomb that was for

up in the place of the Battle: When the Victorious Greeks, had driven out of their Land The Persians by force of Arms, which long did them withstand,

They

They built to mighty Jove, this holy Altar here. And made it common for all Greece, as plainly may appear, In guerdon of the good, which he did them restore, In querdon of their liberty, which lik'd them evermore,

This Battlewas fought the fourth day of the Moneth which the ATHENIANS call Badronion, that is, about the Moneth of July, or after the BOEOTIANS account, the fix and twentieth of the Moneth they call Panemus, on which day there is kept a common Affembly of the Estates of GREECE, in the City of PLATEES, where the PLATEIANS make a folemn Sacrifice unto Jupiter, Protector of their Liberty, to give him thanks alwaies for this Victory. It is no marvell that there was such difference then betwixt the Moneths and Days, confidering that even now when Aftronomy is more perfectly understood than it was then, some do yet begin and end their Moneths at one day, and some at another. After this great Battle and Overthrow of the barbarous People, there arose a great strife betwirt the Strife betwirt ATHENIANS and the LACEDEMONIANS, touching the reward and honour of the Victory. For the Athenians the ATHENIANS would not give place unto the LACEDEMONIANS, nor fuffer them to fet up any and Lucetema-Tokens or Signs of Triumph. Whereupon the GRECIANS running to Arms in mutiny together, nour of the by this occasion they had almost spoiled one another: had not Aristides through his wisdom and wise victory. perswasions, stayed and quieted the other Captains his Companions, and specially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wan with such discreet and gentle words, that they were contented to refer it wholly unto the Arbitrement and Judgment of the other People of GREECE. So the GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their Controversies. In this Council holden there, Theogiton a Captain of the MEGARIANS, faid for his opinion, that to avoid the Civil War might grow between the GRECIANS upon this quarrell: he thought it more requifite, to appoint over the reward and honour of this Victory unto some other City, then to any of the two that fell our about it. After him role up Cleocritu CORINTHIAN, feeming to every man there that he would have requested this honour for the City of CORINTH, being indeed the third City in estimation of all GREECE, Corinth that next unto Sparta and Athens: howbeit he made an Oration in commendation of the Platel third City of ANS, which was marvelloufly liked, and well thought of by every man: for his opinion went flatly estimation in with the PLAT EIANS, that to end this ftrife, they should give the honour of this Victory unto the City of PLAT ÆES, and fo would neither of both parties be angry that they should be honoured. Up- dibent. on his words Ariftides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalf, and then Paufanias for the LACE- Cerimb. DEMONIANS, That the PLATEIANS should have the Reward. Now they both being agreed, be- The Grecians fore the spoil was divided between them, they set aside sourcore Talents that were given to the PLA. grant the home to the PLA grant the home to the PLA grant the home to the PLA grant the home to the plant of the notify the plant of the notify the plant of the notify the plant of the plant T.EIANS, with the which they built a Temple unto Minerva, and gave her an Image, and fet out Victory unto all her Temple with Pictures that remain whole untill this day: and the LACEDEMONIANS notwith- the Plateians, standing, did fet up their tokens of Victory by themselves, and the ATHENIANS their salfo by themfelves. So the fending unto the Oracle of Apollo in the City of DELPHOS, to know unto what gods, and how they should do sacrifice: Apollo answered them, that they should build up an Altar unto Jupiter, Protector of their liberty; howbeit that they should put no sacrifice upon it, untill they had first put out all the fire through the whole Countrey, because it had been polluted and defiled by the Barbarous People; and then, that they should fetch pure and clean fire at the common Altar, whereon they do facrifice unto Apollo Pyrbias, in the City of DELPHOS. This answer being delivered, The great Lords and Officers of GREECE went through all the Countrey to put out the fire every where. And there was a man of the fame City of PLATES at that time called Euchidan, that came and offered himself, and promised he would bring them fire from the Temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speed that might be. So when he came to the City of DELPHOS, after he had sprinkled and purified his body with clean Water, he put a Crown of Laurell upon his Head, and went in that manner to take fire from the Altar of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him again as The wonderfast as he could run for life, unto the City of PLATÆES, and came thither before the Sun was set, ha- full speed of faft as be could run for life, unto the City of PLATÆES, and came ununer perore the sun was set, having come and gone that day a thouland furlongs. But after he had faluted his Citizens, and delivered Euclidate the Plataian, on them the fire he brought, he fell down dead at their feet, and gave up the Ghost. The PLATEIANS foot. lift him up ftark dead, and buried him in the Temple of Diana Euclia, to fay, of good renown: and caused afterwards this Epitaph following to be graven upon his Tomb.

> Engraved here doth lie, Euchidas speedy man, Who in one day both too and fro, to Delphos lightly ran: Even from this self same place, which thou dost here behold, Such hafte, post haste, he swiftly made; thereof thou maist be bold.

Diana Euclis Euchilas Epitaph.

Many think that this goddels Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other hold opinion she was the Daughter of Hercules, and Myrto the Nymph Menatius Daughter, and Patroclus sister, that died a Virgin, and was honoured afterwards as a goddels of the BOEOTIANS, and of the Lo-CRIANS. For in all their Cities and Towns in open places, they find an Altar and Image dedicated unto her: and all that are married, do facrifice to her upon that Altar. Afterwards there was a Ge. Agencial neral Council holden by all the Grecians, in the which Ariffides made a motion that all the arthe Cities of Grecian deal and a motion of the arthe City of Cities of GREECE should yearly fend their deputies at a certain day appointed, unto the City of Platace.

PLATEES, there to make their prayers and facrifices unto the gods: and that from five years, to five years, they should celebrate common Games, that should be called the Games of Liberty: and that they should also levy through all the Provinces of GREECE, for maintenance of the Wars against the Persians and barbarous People, ten thousand Footmen, a thousand Horsemen, and a Fleet of an hundred Sail. Also that the PLATEIANS thenceforth should be taken for deyour and holy men, and that no man should be so hardy as to hurt or offend them; and that they should onely tend the Sacrifices unto the gods, for the health and prosperity of GREECE. All which Articles were enacted in form and manner aforelaid, and the PLATEIANS bound themselves yearly to keep folemn Sacrifices and Aniverfaries for the Souls of the GRECIANS that were flain in their Solemn Secri- Territories, fighting for defence of the liberty of the GRECIANS: And this they observe yet unto nce and runerals kept by the this day in this fort. The fixteenth day of the Moneth of Memalterion (which the BOEOTIANS Plusianayers call Alalcomenies, and is about the Moneth of January) they go a Proceilion, and before the Procession goeth a Trumpeter that soundeth the Alarum: Then there follow certain Chariots loaden with citar that were branches of Firr-tree, and with Nofegays and Garlands of Triumph: then a black Bull, and certain young Gentlemen noble mens Sons, that carry great Cawdrons with two ears full of Wine and Milk, fuch as they use to pour upon the Graves of dead men for propitiatory Oblations; and other young Boys free born, that carry Oyls, Perfumes, and other fweet Odours in Vial Glasses: for no Servant or Bondman may lawfully be admitted to have any Office about this Myftery, for that those whose Memory they honour, died all fighting for defence of the Liberty of GREECE. After all this shew, followeth the Provost of the PLATEIANS for that time being, last of all : who may not all the rest of the year befides, fo much as touch any Iron, nor wear any other coloured Gown but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a Purple-coloured Coat, and holdeth a Funeral Pot in one of his hands, which he taketh in the Town-House, and a naked Sword in the other hand, and so goeth through the City in this fort after all the Pomp aforefaid, unto the Church-yard where all their Graves be that were slain at that Battle. So when he cometh thither, he draweth water out of a Well that is there, and with the same he washeth the foursquare Pillars and Images that stand upon those Tombs, and then anointeth them with Oyls and sweet Savours: afterwards, he facrificeth a Bull, and layeth him upon a heap of Wood hard by him, as they do when they burn the bodies of dead men; and making certain Prayers and Petitions unto Jupiter and Mercury, gods of the Earth, he doth folemnly invite the fouls of those valiant men that died fighting for the liberry of Greek, unto the Feat of the Funeral Sacrifice. Then he taking a Cup full of Wine in his hand, and spilling it all upon their Tombs, he speaketh these words aloud 1 I drink to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in defence of the liberty of GREECE. This folemn Ceremony and Aniverfary, the PLATÆIANS do duly observe unto this present day. Now when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Arifides pre-Arifides perceiving the People were bent to stablish a Popular State, where the People might bear righter pie- bit whole Rule and Authority, judging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noferreth the po- the whole Rule and Authority, judging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noferreth the poble Service and valiant courage they had shewed in this War: and considering also that they would hardly be brought to like of any other Government, being yet in Arms, and very frout, by realon of the famous Victories they had obtained : he caufed a Law to be made, that all Authority of Government should run in equality among the Citizens, and that thenceforth all Burgesses (as well poor as rich) should be chosen by voices of the People, and promoted to Offices within the City. And moreover, when Themistocles told in open Assembly, that he had a thing in his head, would be greatly to the profit and commodity of the State, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for divers respects: the People willed him to tell it unto Aristides onely, and to take his advice in it, to know whether it was meet to be done, or not. Then Themsfrocles told him fecretly between them, vice of Themi- that hethought to fet the Arcenall on fire, where all the GRECIANS Ships lay: alleadging, that by this means the ATHENIANS should be the greatest men of power in all GREECE. Aristides hearing that, without any more, came prefently to the People again, and told the whole Council openly, that nothing could be more profitable indeed for the whole Commonwealth, and withall more wicked and unjust, then that Them. stocles thought good to do. When the People heard Aristides Answer, they willed Themistocles to let his device alone whatsoever it were: fo great Justicers were the ATHENIANS, and so much did they trust Aristides wisdom and equity besides. So they made Arifides afterwards General of the Army of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, and fent them to make War against the barbarous People. Aristides at his coming thither, seeing Paufanias, and the other Captains that were Generals over the whole Army, dealing hardly gainst the bar- and churlishly with the People their Confederates, he on the contrary side, spake gently unto brooms People, and courning with the ecopic them as he could possible, making his drillides in them, and shewed himself as courteous and familiar to them as he could possible, making his drillides in flice and vertue companion also familiar to all, and just to every body, not oppressing some to ease other, indetook from the fraying the charges of the Wars. Arifides taking this course, it was not noted how by little Lecchemanian and little he cut off the Rule and Authority of the LACEDEMONIANS in GREECE, not by all their Rule and Authority force of Arms, nor by Ships, nor by number of Horses, but onely by his grave and wife Government. For if the Juffice and Vertue of Ariffides, and the mildness and courtesse of Cimon, made the Government of the ATHENIANS to be liked of and accepted of all the other People of GREECE: the coverousnels, pride and fiercenels of Paufanias, made it much more to be defi-

No man durst go forrage, neither for Straw, nor Reeds to make them Couches of, nor durst water their Horse before the SPARTANS: for he had fet Scouts for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Aristides thought to have spoken to him, and to have told him something, he fromned upon him : and faid he had no leifure to speak with him now, and so would not hear him : whereupon the Captains of the other GRECIANS, and specially those of CHIO, of SAMOS, and of LESBOS, did afterwards follow Arifides, and perswaded him to take upon him the charge and Authority to command the other People of GREECE, and to take into his protection the Allies and Confederates of the fame, who long fithence wished to revolt from the Government of the LACEDAMONIANS, and onely to submit themselves unto the ATHENIANS. Aristides anfwered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they faid, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the ATHENIANS might have good ground and affu- Arifiiles fine rance of their undoubted fidelity and good fervice, they should deliver them manifest testimony and trial of Trayaffurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the LACEDEMONIANS, whereby their tors. Countrey, than to have fet upon him as they had done. But they answered him, and bade him get him away quickly if he were wife, and let him thank Fortune hardly, that granted the GRECI-ANS victory at the Battle of PLATÆES under his leading : and that it was nothing else but the onely reverence and respect of the same, that had made the GRECIANS hold their hands till now, from giving him that just punishment his pride and arrogancy had deserved. So the end was, they left the LACEDEMONIANS, and stuck unto the ATHENIANS : wherein was eafily discerned the great courage and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACEDEMONIANS. For when they faw The tempetheir Captains were marred and corrupted, through the over-great Authority and liberty they had, rance of the they willingly gave up their commandment over the other GRECIANS, and did no more fend their Lacedamentans Captains to be Generals of the whole Army of GREECE: thinking it better for their Citizens, that they should be obedient, and in every point observe the Discipline and Law of their Countrey, than if they had been otherwise the onely Rulers and Lords over the whole Countrey. Now at what time the LACEDEMONIANS did command all GREECE, as Lords, the Cities and People of GREECE, did pay a certain fum of Money, towards defraying of the charges of the Wars against the barbarous People. But after that their Seigniority and Rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented a Tax should be levied, and that every City should be reasonably felled, according to their wealth and ability: because every City might know what they should pay, And for this purpole, they prayed the ATHENIANS they would appoint Ariftides to take order Ariftides did for it, unto whom they gave full Power and Authority to tax and felsevery City indifferently, felsithe Cities considering the greatness of the Territory, and the Revenues of the same, as every one was reason- of Greece. ably able to bear it. But if Arishides were poor when he entred into that great charge and Office of Authority, wherein all GREECE in manner did refer themselves unto his discretion : he came out of that Office more poor, and had made his Affessinent and Taxation not onely justly and truly, but also Aristides a fo indifferently according to every mans ability, that there was no man could find fault with his true Seffor. doings. And like as the ancient men in old time did celebrate and fing out the bleffedness of those that lived under the Reign of Saturn, which they called the Golden Age: even fo did the People and Confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwards honour the Affeffment made my Ariftides, calling it the fortunate and bleffed time of GREECE, and specially, when shortly after it did double, and treble on the sudden. For the Tax Aristides made, came to about four hundred and threescore Talents: and Pericles raised it almost unto a third part. For Thucydides writeth, that at the beginning of the Wars of PELOPONNESUS, the ATHENIANS levied fix hundred Talents yearly upon their Confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the Orators and Counfellors for matters of State, did raile it up higher by little and little, untill it mounted to the fum of thirteen hundred Talents. And this was not because the Wars did rise to so great a charge, by reason of the length of the same, and of the loffes the ATHENIANS had received: but for that they did accustom the People to make diffributions of Money by hand unto every Citizen, to make them fet up Games, and make goodly Images, and to build up sumptuous Temples. Thus was Aristides therefore justly honoured, praised and effecmed above all others, for his just imposition of Taxes, saving onely of Themistocles: who went up and down fleering at the matter, faying it was no meet praise for an honest man, but rather for a Coffer well barred with Iron, where a man might fafely lay up his Gold and Silver. This he spake to be even Taunts bewith Arifides, which was nothing like the sharp gird Arifides gave him openly, when Themistocles tween Themitalking with him, told him it was an excellent thing for a Captain to be able to know, and to pre- footes and Avent the counsels and doings of the Enemies: And so it is, faid Aristides again, not onely a needfull, ristides. but an honest thing, and meet for a worthy General of an Army, to be clean fingered, without Bribery or corruption. So Ariftides made all the other People of GREECE to fwear, that they would truly keep the Articles of the Alliance, and he himself as General of the ATHENIANS, did take their Oaths in the name of the ATHENIANS: and fo pronouncing execrations and curfes against them that should break the League and Oath taken, he threw Iron Wedges red hot into the against them that include the state of the s ing, afterwards in my opinion, when there fell out great alteration in the State, and that the ATHE-NIANS were forced to rule more firaightly than before: Ariftides then willed the ATHENIANS to lethim bear the danger and burden of perjury and execration, and that they should not let for sear thereof to do any thing what foever they thought meet or necessary. To conclude, Theophrassus teth, that Arifides was not onely a perfect, an honest, and just man, in private matters betwist party and party: but in matters of State, and concerning the Commonweal, he did many things often times according to the necessity of the time, and troubles of the City, wherein violence and injustice Ariflides pre- was to be used. As when the question was asked in open Council, to know whether they might take feried necessity away the Gold and Silver, that was left in the Isle of Delos fafely laid up in the Temple of Apollo, of time, before to bear out the charges of the Wars against the barbarous People, and to bring it from thence unto Law and Res ATHENS, upon the motion of the SAMIANS, although it was directly against the Articles of the Alliance, made and sworn among all the GRECIANS; Ariftides opinion being asked in the same, he answered : it was not just, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Ariftides had brought his City to rule and command many thousands of People, yet was he ftill poor for all that, and till his dying day he gloried rather to be praifed for his poverty, then for all the famous Victories and Battles he had won: and that plainly appeared thus. Callia Ceres Torch-bearer, was his near Kiniman, who through Enemies came to be accused, and stood in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Judges, his Acculers very faintly, and to little purpole, uttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other by-matters, left the chief matter, and spake thus to the Judges: My Lords, you all know Ariftides the Son of Lyfimachus, and you are not ignorant allo that his Vertue hath made him more effectmed, than any man elfe is, or can be, in all GREECE. How think ye, doth he live at home, when you fee him abroad up and down the City, in a thread-bare gown all to be tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starve at home for lack of meat and lief, whom we all see quake for very cold, being so ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Calliss here his Coulin-german the richeft Citizen in all ATHENS, is to milerable, that notwithstanding Arifides hath done much for him, by reason of his great Credit and Authority among you, he suffered him and his poor Wife and Children ready to beg and starve for any help he giveth them. Callian perceiving the Judges more angry with him for that, then for any matter elfe he was accused of: he prayed Arifides might be fent for, and willed him to tell truly, whether he had not offered him good round fums of Money, many a time and oft, and entreated him to take it; which he ever refused, and anfwered him alwaies, That he could better boaft of his Poverty, than himfelf could of his Riches: (which he faid many did use ill, and few could use them well) and that it was a hard thing to find one man of a noble mind, that could away with Poverty, and that fuch onely might be ashamed of Poverty, as were poor against their wills. So Aristides confirmed all he spake to be true: and every man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poor as Ariftides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by Afchines the Socratian Philosopher: and Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithflanding there were many other famous and noble men of ATHENS, yet he gave Ariffides praise above them all. For others, said he, (as Themificits, Cimon, and Pericles) have beautified the City with stately Porches, and sumptuous Buildings of Gold Ariftiles com and Silver, and with store of other fine superfluous devices; but Arifides was onely he, that vertuously difposed himself and all his doings, to the furtherance of the State and Commonweal. His Justice and good nature appeared plainly in his doings, and behaviour towards Themistecles. For though Themiflooles was ever against Ariftides in all things, and a continual Enemy of his, and that by his means and practife he was banished from ATHENS: yet when Themistocles was accused of Treason to the State, having divers sharp Enemies against him, as Cimon, Alemaon, with divers other, Arifides fought not revenge, when he had him at his advantage. For he neither spake nor did any thing against him at that time to hurt him : neither did he rejoice to fee his Enemy in mifery, no more then if he had never Arifiides death envied him in his prosperity. And touching Aristides death, some write that he died in the Realm of PONTUS, being fent thither about matters of the State: and other think he died an old man in the City of ATHENS, greatly honoured and beloved of all the Citizens. But Crateria the MACEDONIAN writeth of his death in this fort : After that Themisfocles (faith he) was fled, the People of ATHENS became very flubborn and infolent: whereupon, many lewd men grew to be common appeachers and accusers of the Noble men and chiefest Citizens, and to stir up the malice and ill will of the common People against them, who were waxen proud by reason of their Prosperity, and Dominion that was enlarged. Among the reft, Arifider was condemned for Extortion and ill behaviour in the Commonwealth, upon one Diophantes acculation, of the Village of AMPHITROPE: who burdened him, that he took Money of the IONIANS, to make the annual Tribute Cels which they payed unto ATHENS: and so Crateris faith, that because Arifides was not able to pay the Fine they set upon his head (which was five Minas) he was driven to forfake ATHENS, and to get him into IONIA, where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to prove this true he writeth; as his pleading, his Sentence and condemnation, or any Decree passed against him, although he used great diligence elle in collecting all fuch matters, and vouching his Authors. Furthermore, all other Writers that have fpecially noted the faults and offences committed by the People of ATHENS in former times against their Captains and Governours: they do declare Themissocles exile, Militades captivity that died in Prifon, Pericles Fine wherein he was condemned, and Paches death that flew himfelf in the Pulpit for

Orations, when he faw he was condemned: and tell divers fuch Stories, adding too also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no matter of mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh of. Moreover, Arifides Tomb is to be feen at this day upon the Haven of PHALERUS, which was fet up for him at the charge of the Commonwealth, as it is reported, because he died so poor a man, as they Arifides tomb found nothing in his house to bury him with. Furthermore, when this Lysimachus died, he lest alive children, one onely Daughter called Polycrite, whom the People appointed, as Calishenes writeth, as much Provision to live withall, as they gave to any that wan the Olympian Games. And sithence, Demetrim PHALERIAN, Hieronymus RHODIAN, Ariftoxensu the Musitian, and Aristotle the Philosopher, at least if the Book intituled of Nobility be any of Aristotles Works: all these agree together, pner, attent in the Doughters Daughters, was married to the wife Socrates, who took her to that one Myrto, Arifides Daughters Daughters Daughters was a poor. It is very true, that the selffame Demetrins PHALERIAN, when he reformed the State of ATHENS, ordained that his Mother and Sifter should have each of them a Drachma by the day to find them withall, out of the common Chamber of the City. And it is no new nor strange thing, that the People of ATHENS were so commended carefull to help and to relieve the Women that dwelt in their City: confidering that in times paft, A- for their liberistogiton having a little Daughter in the Isle of LEMNOS, in very hard and poor estate, and that rality. could not be bestowed in marriage for her Poverty, they cansed her to be brought to ATHENS, and married her in one of the Noblest Houses of the City, and made her a Joynter besides in the Village of

THELIFEOF MARCUS CATO the Cenfor.

Ann. Mund. 3758.

Arcus Cato and his Ancestors, were (as they say) of the City of Thuscu-LUM: but before he went unto the Wars, and dealt in matters of the Commonwealth, he dwelt and lived in the Countrey of the SABYNS, upon certain Land his Pather left him. And though to many his Ancestors were known to have been obscure: yet he himself did highly commend his Father Marcus, by bearing his name, and faying he was a Souldier, and had ferved valiantly in the Field. And he relleth also of another Caro that was his great Grandfather, who for his valiant fervice had been oft rewarded of the Generals, with fuch honourable gifts, as the ROMANS did use to give unto them that had done fome famous act in any Battle: and how that he having loft five Horfes of fervice in the Wars, the value of the fame was reftored to him again in Money of the common Treasure, because he had shewed himself trusty and valiant for the Common-Caso called an wealth. And where they had a common speech at ROME, to call them upftarts that were no Gentlemen born, but did rife by vertue: it fortuned Caro to be called one of them. And for his part he did confels it, that he was the first of his House that ever had honour, and Office of State: but by reason of the noble acts and good service of his Ancestors, he maintained he was very ancient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Prifem: but afterwards by reason of his great wisdom and experience, he was furnamed (ato, because the ROMANS call a wise man, and him that hath seen much, Cato. He was somewhat given to be red-saced, and had a pair of staring eyes in his head, as this man tellethus, that for ill will wrote these Verses of him after his death :

Pluto (the god) which rules the Furies infernall, Will not receive the damned ghost, of Porcius in his hall. His sawcy coppered nose, and fierce staring eyes, His common standerous tales, which he did in this World devise, Made Pluto stand in dread, that he would brawl in Hell, Although his bones were dry and dead; on Earth he was so fell.

Furthermore, touching the disposition of his body; he was marvellous strong and lusty, and all Cato's manners because he did use to labour and toil even from his youth, and live sparingly, as one that was ever brought up in the Wars from his youth: fo that he was of a very good conflitution, both for ftrength of body, and for health. As for utterance, he efteemed it as a fecond body, and most necessary gift, not onely to make men honest, but also as a thing very requisite for a man that should bear (way and Authority in the Commonwealth. He practifed to speak well in little Villages near home, whither he went many times to plead mens Caules in Courts judicial, that would retain him of Counfell: so as in short time he became a persect Pleader, and had tongue at will, and in pro-Caro an ercel- cess of time became an excellent Orator. After he was thus well known, they that were familiar lent Orstor. With him, began to perceive a grave manner and behaviour in his life, and a certain noble mind in him, worthy to be employed in matters of State and great importance, and to be called into the Commonwealth. For he did not onely refuse to take Fees for his pleading and followed the Causes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckoning of the estimation he wan by that manner and practife, as though that was not the onely Mark he shot at. But his desire reached further, rather to win himself Fame by Service in the Wars, and by valiant fighting with his Enemy, then with fuch a quiet and pleafing manner of life. Infomuch as when he was but a young ftripling in manner, he had many cuts upon his breaft, which he had received in divers Battles and Encounters against the Enemies. For he himself writeth, that he was but seventeen years old, when he went first unto Catoa Soulcier the Wars, which was about the time of Hannibals chief prosperity, when he spoiled and destroy- at sevences ed all ITALY. So when he came to fight he would strike lustily, and never stir foot nor give back; years of age. and would look cruelly upon his Enemy, and threaten him with a fearfull and terrible voice, which and would look cruelly upon his Enemy, and threaten nim with a rearruit and terrible voice, which he used himself, and wifely raught other also to use the like; for such countenances, faid he, many A grim look.

When he were any Tournau, he giveth terrout to the such as times do fear the Enemies more than the Sword ye offer them. When he went any Journey, he tothe Enemy. ever marched on foot, and carried his Armour upon his back, and had a man waiting on him, that carried his Victuals with him, with whom he was never angry (as they fay) for any thing he had pre-pared for his Dinner or Supper, but did help to drefs it himself for the most part, is he had any leifure, when he had done the duty of a private Souldier in fortifying the Camp, or fuch other needfull business. All the while he was abroad in Service in the Wars, he never drank other than clean Water, unless it were when he found he was not well, and then he would take a little Vinegar; but if he saw he were weak, he would then drink a little Wine. Now it fortuned that Manius Curius This Manius the ROMAN, who had triumphed thrice, had a pretty House and Land hard by Cato, where he kept Carist overthe ROMAN, who that triumpned tirrice, had a pretty fronte and band had to be written acept in times paff, which Cato for a while would visit oft. And he considering how little Land he had to his threw King in times paff, which Cato for a while would wish to be a pretty being the worked with him Cato Pyrru being House, and what a little House he had withall, and how poorely it was built, wondred with himself General of the what manner of man Curius had been, that having been the greatest man of ROME in his time, and Turentines. having subdued the mightiest Nations and People of all ITALY, and driven King Pyrrus also out of Carothe elder the same; yet himself with his own hands did manure that little patch of ground, and dwell in so wondred at the same; yet himself with his own hands did manure that little patch of ground, and dwell in so wondred at the same with the same w the failte: yet minical with insown many more and interest of the same of the presented him a marvellous deal of Gold, from their State and Commonalty. But Curius returned on of Mania: them again with their Gold, and told them, that fuch as were contented with that Supper, had no Gariat. need of Goldnor Silver: and that for his part, he thought it greater honour to command them that had Gold, than to have it himself. Cato remembring these things to himself, went home again, and began to think upon his House, of his Living, of his Family and Servants, and also of his Expences, and to cut offall superfluous charges, and tell himself to labour with his own hands, more then ever he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus took the City of TAREN-TUM again, Cato served under him being very young, where he fell into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the Pythagorian Philosopher, in whom he took marvellous delight to hear him talk of Philosophy. Which Nearchus held the same opinion of pleasure, that Plato did, by calling it the sweet Poyson, and chiefest Bait to allure men to ill: and saying that the Body was the first plague unto the Soul, and that her onely Health, Remedy, and Purgation, stood Philosopher upon rules of Reason, good Examples and Contemplations, that drive sinfull thoughts and car- Cato's School nal pleasures of the body, far off from her. Cato moreover gave himself much to sobriety and master. temperance, and framed himself to be content with little. They say he fell in his very old age to Plan's opinion the study of the Greek Tongue, and to read Greek Books, and that he profited formathly to of pleasure. the study of the Greek Tongue, and to read Greek Books, and that he profited somewhat by Catolesand Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his Matter, and also to be eloquent : which the Greek plainly appeareth in all his Books and Writings, full of Authorities, Examples, and Stories taken Tongue in his pramy appeared and the Books and Wilnigh, and Morals, his Adages and quick Anfivers, old age.
Cate profitted one of the Greek Additions; and many of the second of the fame word for word. Now there was a Noble man of Rome at that time, much by Deone of great Authority, and a deep wife man besides, who could easily discern buds of Vertue mulbens elosprouting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable disposition to help for quence. ward, and to advance such: his name was Valerius Flaccus, a near neighbour unto Cato, who was Valerius Flacinformed by his Servants of Cato's ftrange life, how he would be doing in his Ground with his own car a grave hands: and how he would be gone every day betieve in the morning to little Village thereadon. wife man. hands: and how he would be gone every day betimes in the morning to little Villages thereabouts. Moreover, they told him also a world of such manners and fashions he used, that shewed him to be a marvellous plain man, without pride, and of a good nature. Then they told him what no able wife Sayings and grave Sentences they heard him speak. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to Supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiving he was of a very good Nature, and well given, and that he was a good graff to be fet in a better Ground, he perswaded him to come to Rome, and to pra-Aife there in the Affembly of the People, in the common (auses and Affairs of the Commonweal. MARCUS CATO. lerius Flaceus gavehim. For first of all, by voice of the People he was chosen Tribune of the Souldiers (to fay, Collonel of a thouland Footmen) and afterwards was made Treasurer: and fo went forwards, and grew to fo great credit and authority, as he became Valerius Flaceus Companion in the chiefest Offices of State, being chosen Consul with him, and then Censor. But to begin withall, Cato made choice of Quintus Fabius Maximus, above all the Senators of Rome, and gave himself to follow him altogether: and not fo much for the credit and estimation Fabius Maximus was of (who therein excelled all the ROMANS of that time) as for the modefty and diferent government he faw in him, whom he determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour and example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and evil will of Scipto the Great, who did strive at that present being but a young man, with the authority and greatness of Fabius Maximus, as one that seemed to envy his riling and greamels. For Cato being lent Treasurer with Scipio, when he undertook the journey into Africk, and perceiving Scipio's bountifull nature, and disposition to large gifts withour mean to the Souldiers: he told him plainly one day, that he did not fo much hurt the Commonwealth in wasting their treasure, as he did great harm in changing the ancient manner of their ancestors: who used their Souldiers to be contented with little, but he taught them to fpend their superfluous mony (all necessaries provided for) in vain toits and trifles to serve their pleasure. Scipio made him ved him for his answer, he would have no Treasurer should controll him in this fort, nor that should look so nar-wallfull expenlowly to his expences: for his intent was to go to the Wars, with full fails as it-were, and that he would (and did also determine) to make the State privy to all his doings, but not to the money he spent, Caro hearing this answer, returned with speed out of SICILE unto ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio spent infinitely, and that he tended Plays, Comedies, and Wreftlings, as if he had not been fent to make Wars, Invations, and Attempts upon their Enemies. Upon this complaint the Senate appointed certain Tribunes of the People, to go and fee if their informations were true: and finding them to, that they should bring him back again to Rome. But Scipio shewed far otherwise to the Commissioners that came thister, and made them see apparent Victory, through the necessary preparation and provision he had made for the Wars: and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great business, and was at any leisure, he would be privately merry with his Friends: and though he was liberal to his Souldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duty and charge in any matter of importance. So Scipto took shipping, and failed toward Africk, whither he was fent to make War. Now to return to Cato. He daily increased still in authority and credit by means of his eloquence, so that divers called him the Demofibenes of ROME: howbeit the manner of his life was in more estimation than his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did feek to attain to his eloquence and commendation of words, and one envied another which of them should come nearest: but few of them would file their hands with any labour as their Forefathers did, and made a light Supper and Dinner without fire or provision, or would be content with a mean gown, and a poor lodging, and finally would think it more honourable to defie Fancies and Pleasures, then to have and enjoy them. Because the State was waxen now of fuch Power and Wealth, as it could no more retain the ancient difcipline, and former aufterity, and straightness of life it used : but by reason of the largeness of their Dominion and feigniority, and the numbers of People and Nations that were become their subjects, it was even forced to receive a medly of fundry Countrey fashions, examples, and manners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Cato's Vertue, when they saw other straight wearied with pains and labour tenderly brought up like pulers; and Cato on the other fide never overcome, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coveted honour, nor in his age also when he was gray Headed and bald after his Consulthip and triumph: but like a conqueror that had gotten the maftery, he would never give over labour even unto his dying Caro's wonder- day. For he writeth himfelf, that there never came Gown on his backthat cost him above an hundred pence, and that his Hinds and Workmen alwaies drunk no worfe Wine, when he was Conful and General of the Army, than he did himself: and that his Cater never bestowed in Meat for his Supper, above thirty Affes of ROMAN money; and yet he faid it was, because he might be the ftronger, and apter to do fervice in the Wars for his Countrey and the Commonwealth. He faid furthermore, that being heir to one of his Friends that died, he had a piece of tapeftry by him with a deep border, which they called then the BABYLONIAN border, and he caused it straight to be fold: and that of all his Houses he had abroad in the Countrey, he had not one Wall plaistered, nor rough cast. Moreover he would fay, he never bought Bondman or flave dearer, then a thousand five hundred Pence, as one that fought not for fine made men and goodly perfonages, but ftrong fellows that could away with pains, as Carters, Horle-keepers, Neat-heards, and fuch like: and again le would fell them when they were old, because he would not keep them when they could do no service. To conclude, hewas of opinion, that a man bought any thing dear, that was for little purpole: yea, though he gave but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to befrow so little, for that which needed not. He would have men purchase Houses, that had more store of arable Land and Pasture, then of fine Hortyards or Gardens. Some say, he did thus for very misery and covetoufnefs: other think, and took it that he lived fo fparingly, to move others by his example to cut off all superfluity and waste. Nevertheless, to sell slaves in that fort, or to turn them out of doors when you have had the fervice of all their youth, and that they are grownold, as you use brute Beafts that have ferved whilft they may for age: methinks that must needs proceed of too fevere and greedy a nature, that hath no longer regard or confideration of humanity, then whilf MARCUS (ATO.

one is able to do another good. For we fee, gentleness goeth further then justice. For Nature teacheth us to use justice onely to them, but gentleness sometimes is shewed unto brute Beasts: and that cometh from the very Fountain and Spring of all courtefie and humanity, which should never dry up in any man living. For to fay truly, to keep cast Horses spoiled in our service, and Dogs also. not onely when they are Whelps, but when they be old, be even tokens of love and kindness. As the ATHENIANS made a Law, when they builded their Temple called Hecatompedon: that they should suffer the Mules and Mulets that did service in their carriages about the building of the same, Agente Law to graze every where, without let or trouble of any man. And they say there was one of their Athenian in Mules thus turned at liberty, that came her self to the place to labour, going before all the other favour of their draught Beafts that drew up Carts loaden towards the Caftle, and kept them company, as though labouring the feemed to encourage the rest to draw : which the People liked fo well in the poor Beaft, that they Mules. appointed the should be kept whilst the lived, at the charge of the Town. And yet at this present are the graves of Cimons Mares to be feen, that wan him thrice together the Prize of the Horserace at the Games Olympian, and they are hard by the grave of Cimon himself. We hear of divers also that had buried their Dogs they brought up in their house, or that waited on them : as among other, old Xanthippus buried his Dog in the top of a cliff, which is called the Dogs pit till Xanthippus this day. For when the People of ATHENS did for fake their City at the coming down of the King buried his Dog Xeraes, this Dog followed his Mafter, swimming in the Sea by his Galleys side, from the firm Land that swimmed unto the Isle of SALAMINA. And there is no reason, to use living and sensible things, as we would by his Galleys use an old shoe or rag, to cast it out upon the Dunghill when we have worn it, and can serve then to Salaus no longer. For if it were for no respect else, but to use us alwaies to humanity, we must ever shew mint, and died our felves kind and gentle, even in such small points of pity. And as for me, I could never find when he landed in my heart to fell my draught Ox that had ploughed my Land a long time, because he could plough no longer for age; and much less my Siave, to sell him for a little Money, out of the Countrey where he had dwelt a long time, to pluck him from his old trade of life, wherewith he was best acquainted, and then specially, when he shall be as unprofitable for the buyer, as also for the seller. But Cato on the other fide gloried, that he left his Horse in Spain he had served on in the Wars during his Confulship, because he would not put the Commonwealth to the charge of bringing him home by Sea into ITALY. Now a question might be made of this, and probable reason of either side, whether this was nobleness or a niggardliness in him: but otherwise to say truly, he was a man of a wonderfull abstinence. For when he was General of the Army, he never took allowance Cato's straight but after three bushels of Wheat a Moneth of the Commonwealth, for himself and his whole Fa- life. mily; and but a bulhel and a half of Barley a day, to keep his Horse and other Beasts for his Carriage. On a time when he was Prator, the government of the Isle of SARDINIA fell to his lot : Cato Prator in and where the other Przetors before him had put the Countrey to exceeding great charge, to furnish Sardinist, them with Tente, Bedding, and Clothes, and such like stuff, and burdened them also with a marvellous Train of Servants and their Friends that waited on them, putting them to great expence in feafting and banquetting of them: Cato in contrary manner brought down all that excels and fuperfluity, unto a marvellous near and uncredible faving. For when he went to vifit the Cities, he Cato's nearness came on foot to them, and did not put them to a peny charge for himself: and had onely one Of- in his Circuit ficer or Bayliff of the State that waited on him, and carried his Gown and a Cup with him, to offer up Wine to the gods in his Sacrifices. But though he came thus fimply to the Subjects, and eafed them of their former charges, yet he shewed himself severe and bitter to them in matters concerning Juflice: and spared no man, in any commandment of service for the State and Commonwealth: for Cato's severity he was therein fo precise, that he would not bear with any little fault. So by this means, he brought the SARDINIANS under his government, both to love and fear the Empire of Rome, more than ever they had before: as appeareth plainly by the manner both of his speaking and writing: Cato's speech because it was pleasant and yet grave: sweet and fearfull: merry and severe: sententious and yet and writing. familiar, fuch as is meet to be spoken. And he was to be compared unto Socrates : who (as Plato The praise of faith) at the first fight was a plain simple man to them that knew him but outwardly, or else a plea- Socrates. fant Taunter or Mocker: but when they did look into him, and found him throughly, they faw he was full of grave Sentences, goodly Examples, and wife Perswasions, that he could make men water their Plants that heard him, and lead them as he would by the ear. Therefore I cannot fee any reason that moves men to say, Cato had Lysia grace and utterance. Notwithstanding, let us refer it to their judgements that make profession to discern Orators graces and stiles: for my part, I shall content my felf to write at this present, onely certain of his notable Sayings and Sentences, perswading my self that mens manners are better discerned by their words, then by their looks, and to do many think. On a time feeking to diffwade the People of ROME, which would needs make a thankfull diffribution of Corn unto every Citizen, to no purpose, he began to make an Oration with this Preface. It is a hard thing (my Lords of Roma) to bring the belly by per- Cato's fayings swafions to reason, that hath no ears. And another time, reproving the ill Government of the City of Roun, he faid: it was a hard thing to keep up that State, where a little Fish was fold dearer then an Ox. He faid also, that the ROMANS were like a flock of Sheep: for faith he, as every Weather when he is alone, doth not obey the Shepheard, but when they are all together they one follow another for love of the foremost : even so are you; for when you are together, you are all contented to be led by the nofes by fuch, whose counsell not a man alone of you would of Rome had over their Husbands, he faid other men commanded their Wives, and we command Men, and our Wives command us. But this laft of all he borrowed of Themistacles pleasant sayings. For his Son making him do many things by means of his Mother: he told his Wife one day: The ATHENIANS command all GREECE, I command the ATHENIANS, you command me, and your Son ruleth you. I pray you therefore bid him use the liberry he hath with some better diferetion, fool and als as he is, fithence he cando more by that Power and Authority, then all the GRECIANS besides. He said also that the People of ROME did not onely delight in divers forts of Purple, but likewise in divers sorts of Exercises. For faid he, as divers commonly die that colour they fee best esteemed, and is most pleasant to the eye : even so the lustry Youths of ROME do frame themselves to such Exercise, as they see your selves most like and best esteem. He continually advifed the ROMANS, that if their Power and Greamels came by their Vertue and Temperance, they should take heed they became no changelings, nor waxworle: and if they came to that Greatnels by Vice and Violence, that then they should change to better, for by that means he knew very well they had attained to great Honour and Dignity. Again he told them, that fuch as fued ambitiously to bear Office in the Commonwealth, and were common Suters for them, did feem to be afraid to lofe their way, and therefore would be fure to have Ushers and Serjeants before them, to shew them the way, lest they should lose themselves in the City. He did reprove them also, that often chose one man to continue one Office still: For it seemeth, faith he, either that you pass not much for your Officers, or that you have not many choice men you think worthy for the Office. There was an Enemy of his that led a marvellous wicked and an abominable life, of whom he was wont to fay, that when his Mother prayed unto the gods that she might leave her Son behind her, she did not think to pray, but to curfe: meaning to have him live for a plague to the World. And to another also that had unthrittily fold his Lands which his Father had left him, lying upon the Sea side, he pointed unto him with his finger, and made as though he wondred how he came to be so great a man, that he was stronger than the Sea: for that which the Sea hardly consumeth and eateth out by little and little a long time, he had confumed it all at a clap. Another time, when King Eumenes was come to ROME, the Senate entertained him marvellous honourably, and the nobleff Citizens did strive, envying one another, who should welcome him best. But Caso in contrary manner shewed plainly, that he did suspect all this featting and entertainment, and would not come at it. When one of his familiar friends told him, I marvell why you fly from King Eumenes company, that is fo good a Prince, and loves the ROMANS fo well : Yea, faid he, let it be fo, but for all that, a King is no better then a ravening Beaft that lives of the prey : neither was there ever any King to happy, that deserved to be compared to Epaminondas, to Pericles, to Themisfocles, nor to Manius Curius, or to Hamylear, furnamed Barca. They fay his Enemies did malice him, because he used commonly to rife before day, and did forget his own business to follow matters of State. And he affirmed that he had rather lose the reward of his well-doing, then not to be punished for doing of evil: and Cate would put that he would bear with all other offending ignorantly, but not with himself. The Romans having chosen on a time three Ambassadors to send into the Realm of BYTHINIA. one of them having chosen on a time three Ambassadors to send into the Realm of BYTHINIA, one of them having the Gout in his Feet, the other his Head full of Cuts and great galhes, and the third being but a Fool: Caro laughing said, the ROMANS sent an Ambassade that had neither Feet, Head nor * Heart. Scipio sued once to Caso at Polybian request, about those that were banished from ACHAIA. they judged the the fear of The matter was argued afterwards in the Senate, and there fell out divers opinions about it. Some that the fear of would have had them reftored to their Countrey and Goods again: other were wholly against it, So Cato rifing up at the last, said unto them: It seems we have little else to do, when we stand beating of our brains all day, disputing about these old GRECIANS, whether the ROMANS or the ACHAIANS shall bury them: In the end, the Senate took order they should be restored unto their Countrey again. Whereupon Polybins thought to make petition again unto the Senate, that the banished men whom they had restored by their order, might enjoy their former Estates and Honours in ACHAIA, they had at the time of their banishment : but before he would move the Suit unto the Senate, he would feel Cato's opinion first, what he thought of it. Who anfwered him, fmiling: Methinks Polybiss thou art like Ulyffes, that when he had fcaped out of (3clops Cave the Giant, he would needs go thither again, to fetch his Hat and Girdle he had left behind him there. He faith also, that wife men did learn and profit more by fools, then fools did by wife men. For wife men, faith he, do fee the faults fools commit, and can wifely avoid them: but fools never fludy to follow the example of wife mens doings. He faid also, that he ever liked young men better that blushed, then those that ever looked whitely: and that he would not have him for a Souldier, that wags his hand as he goeth, removes his feet when he fighteth, and rowteth and snorteth lowder in his sleep, then when he cryeth out to his Enemy. Another time when he would taunt a marvellous fat man: See, faith he, what good can such a body do to the Commonwealth, that from his chin to his codpiece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was given to pleasure, and desired to be great with him: My Friend, said Cato, as resusing his acquaintance: I cannot live with him that hath better judgement in the palate of his mouth, A Lorerliveth than in his heart. This was also his faying, That the Soul of a Lover lived in anothers Body And that in all his life time he repented him of three things. The first was, if that he ever told fecret to any Woman: the fecond, that ever he went by Water, when he might have gone by Land: the third, that he had been idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Also when he saw a vicious old man, he would fay to reprove him : O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, help it not besides with your vice. And to a seditious Tribune of the People that was suspected to be a poyloner, and would needs pals fome wicked Law by voice of the People, he would fay: O young man, I know not which of these two be worse, to drink the Drugs thou givest, or to receive the Laws thou offerest. Another time, being reviled by one that led a lewd and naughty Life: Go thy way, said he, I am no man to foold with thee: for thou art so used to revile, and to be reviled that it is not dainty to thee: but for my felf, I never use to hear scolding, and much less delight to fcold. These be his wife sayings we find written of him, whereby we may the easlier conjecture his manners and nature. Now when he was chosen Confull with his friend Falerius Cato and Va-Flacens, the Government of Spain fell to his Lot, that is on this fide of the River of BETIS. Lyting Flacens So Cato having subdued many People by force of Armes, and won others also by friendly means: so-Cato's doings dainly there came a marvellous great Army of the Barbarous People, against him, and had environ- in Spain. ed him fo, as he was in marvellous danger, either shamefully to be taken Prisoner, or to be slain in the field. Wherefore he fent presently unto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aid of them, who were next neighbours unto the marches where he was. These Celtiberians did ask him two hundred Talents to come and help him : but the ROMANS that were about him, could not abide to hire the Barbarous People to defend them. Then Cato told them straight, there was no hurt in it, nor any dishonour unto them. For said he, if the Field be ours, then we shall pay their wages we promifed, with the spoil and Money of our Enemies; and if we lose it, then our selves and they lie by it, being left neither man to pay, nor yet any to ask it. In the end he wan the Battell after a fore conflict, and after that time he had marvellous good Fortune. For Polybins writeth, that all the Walls of the Cities that were on this fide the River of B.ETIS, were by his commandment razed in one day, which were many and full of good Souldiers. Himfelf writeth, that he took mo Cities in Spain, then he remained there days : and it is no vain boaft, if it be true that is written, that there were four hundred Cities of them. Now, though the Souldiers under him had gotten well in this journey, and were rich, yet he caused a Pound weight of Silver to be given to every Souldier besides : saying he liked it better that many should return home with Silver in their Purses, then a few of them with Gold onely. But for himself he affirmed : that of Calo's abstiall the spoil gotten of the Enemies, he never had any thing, faving that which he took in Meat spoil and brid and Drink. And yet faid he, I speak it not to reprove them that grow rich by such spoils : beiv. but because I would contend in vertue rather with the best, then in Money with the richest, or in covetousnels with the most avaritious. For not onely he himself was clear from bribes and extortion, but his Officers also under him kept the same course. In this Spanish journey he had five of his fervants with him , whereof one of them called Pacom , bought three young Boys that were taken in the Wars, when the spoil was sold to them that would give moft. So Cato knew it. But Pacens being afraid to come near his Mafter , hanged himself: and then Cato fold the Boys again, and put the Money made of them into the Treasurie Chefts of faving at ROME. Now while Cato was in SPAIN, Scipto the Great that was his Enemy, and fought to hinder the course of his prosperity, and to have the Honour of conquering all the rest of Discord be-SPAIN, he made all the friends he could to the People, to be chosen in Cato's place. He was twint Cato and no fooner entred into his charge, but he made all the possible speed he could to be gone, that Scipio. he might make Cato's Authority cease the sooner. Cato hearing of his hasty coming, took onely five Enfigns of Footmen, and five hundred Horimen to attend upon him home; with the which, in his journey homeward, he overcame a People in Spain called the Laceta Ni-ANS, and took fix hundred Traitours also that were fled from the ROMANS camp to their Cato overcame Enemies, and did put to death every Mothers Child of them. Scipio storming at that, faid Cato the Lacetanidid him wrong. But Cato to mock him finely, faid : It was the right way to bring Rome to ans. flourish, when Noble born Citizens would not suffer mean born men, and upstarts as himfelf was, to go before them in Honour : and on the other fide when mean born men would contend in Vertue, with those that were of Noblest race, and far above them in calling. For all that , when Caro came to ROME , the Senate commanded that nothing should be changed nor altered otherwise, then Cato had appointed it, whilest he was in his Office. So that the Government for which Scipio made fuch earnest fute in Spain, was a greater disgrace unto him. then it was unto Cato: because he passed all his time and Office in peace, having no occasion offered him to do any notable fervice worthy memory. Furthermore, Cato after he had been Confull, and had granted to him the Honour to Triumph, did not as many others do, that feek not after Vertue, but onely for worldly Honour and dignity: who, when they have been called to the highest Offices of State, as to be Confuls, and have also granted them the Honour to Triumph, do then leave to deal any more in matters of State, and dispose themselves to live merrily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themselves any more. Now Cato far otherwise be- Cato's Acts afhaved himfelf: for he would never leave to exercise Vertue, but began afresh, as if he had been tet his Consula young Novice in the world, and as one greedy of Honour and reputation, and to take as much this and Tripains and more then he did before. For, to pleasure his friends or any other Citizen, he would umph. come to the Market-place, and plead their causes for them that required his counsell, and go with his friends also into the Wars : as he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Confull, and was one of the Lieutenants at the conquest of the Countrey of THRACE, and unto the Provinces adjoyning to the River of DANUBY upon those marches. After that, he was in GREECE also Colonell of a thousand Footmen, under Manius Aquilius, against King Antiochus surnamed the Great , who made the ROMANS fo much afraid of him , as ever they were of Enemy , but Hamibal. For when he had Conquered all the Regions and Provinces of Asia, which Selencin Ricanor enjoyed before, and had subdued many Barbarous and Warlike Nations: he was so proud hearted, as he would needs have Wars with the ROMANS, whom he knew to be the onely worthy men, and best able to fight with him. So he made some honest shew and pretence of Wars, faying it was to fet the Grecians at liberty, who had no cause thereof, considering they lived after their own Laws , and were but lately delivered from the bondage of King Philip, and of the Macedonians, through the goodness of the Romans. Notwithstanding , he came out of ASIA into GREECE with a marvellous great Army, and all GREECE was straight in Arms and in wonderfull danger, because of the great promites and large hopes the Governours of divers Cities (whom the King had won and corrupted with Money) did make unto him. Whereupon Manisu dispatched Ambassadours unto the City, and sent Titu Quintus Flaminius among others, who kept the greatest part of the People from rebelling (that were easily drawn to give ear to this innovation) as we have expressed more amply in his Life: And Cato being sent Ambassadour also, perswaded the Corinthians, those of Patras, and the ÆGIANS, and made them flick flill to the ROMANS, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some fay they find an Oration of his written in the Greek tongue, which he made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their Ancestors : wherein he said, he took great pleasure to see ATHENS, for the beauty and Stateliness of the City. But this is falle: for he spake unto the ATHENIANS by an Interpreter, though he could have uttered his Oration in the Greek tongue if he had been disposed: but he did like the Laws and customs of his own Countrey, and the ROMAN tongue fo well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greek tongue. As he did Cato mocked Posthumins Albiums, who wrote an History in the Greek tongue, praying the readers Posthumins Albiums, Polithumius Alfor writing a to, he had deferved pardon indeed; if he had been forced to have written his Story in the Greek tongue, by the order of the States of GREECE, called the Councill of the Amphictions. They Greek tongue, fay the ATHENIANS wondered to hear his ready tongue. For what he had uttered quickly in few words unto the interpreter, the Interpreter was driven to deliver them again with great circumstances and many words. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words lay all in their lips, and the ROMANS words in their heads. Now King Antiochus kept all the straights and narrow passages of the Mountains called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary way and entrie into GREECE) and had fortified them as well with an Army that Camped at the foot of the Mountain, as also with Walls and Trenches he had made by hand, befides the naurall ftrength and fortification of the Mount it felf in fundry places : and fo he determined to remain there, trufting to his own firength and fortifications aforelaid, and to turn the force of the Wars fome other way. The ROMANS also they dispaired unterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembring with himself the compass the Persi-

ANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GREECE, he departed one night from the Camp with part of the Army : to prove if he could find the very compais about the Barbarous People had made before. But as they climed up the Mountain, their guide that was one of the Prisoners taken in the Countrey, lost his way, and made them wander up and down in marvellous steep Rocks and crooked ways, that the poor Souldiers were in marvellous ill taking. Cato feeing the danger they were brought unto by this lewd guide, commanded all his Souldiers not to ftir a foot from thence, and to tarry him there and in the mean time he went himself alone, and Lucius Manlius with him, (a lusty man, and nimble to climbe upon the Rocks) and so went forward at adventure, taking extream and uncredible pains, and in much danger of his Life, grabling all night in the dark without Moon-light, through wild Olive Trees, and high Rocks (that let them they could not fee before them, neither could tell whether they went) untill they stumbled at the length upon a little path way , which went as they thought directly to the foot of the Mountain, where the Camp of the Enemies lay. So they fet up cerrain marks and tokens, upon the highest tops of the Rocks they could choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off upon the Mountain called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned back again to fetch the Souldiers, whom they led towards the Marks they had fet up: untill at the length they found their path-way again, where they put their Souldiers in order to march. Now they went not far in this path they found, but the way failed them straight and brought them to a bog: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater fear, not knowing they were to mear their Enemies, as indeed they were. The day began to break a little, and one of them, that marched foremost, thought he heard a noise, and that he faw the GREEKS Camp at the foot of the Rocks, and certain Souldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Caro made them flay, and willed onely the FIRMANIANS to come unto him, and none but them, because he had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandment. They were with him at a trice, to know his pleafure: fo Cato faid unto them: My fellows, I must have fome of our Enemies taken Prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keep that passage, what number they be, what order they keep, how they Cate Oration are Camped and Armed, and after what fort they determine to fight with us. The way to work to his Souldiers this feat standeth upon swiftness and hardiness to run upon them suddainly, as Lyons do, which being naked fear not to run into the middest of any heard of fearfull Beafts. He had no sooner spoken these words, but the FIRMANIAN Souldiers began to run down the Mountains as they were , upon those that kept the Watch: and so setting upon them , they being The boldness out of order, made them flie, and took an Armed man prisoner. When they had him, they and valiant atout of order, made them Inc., and took an Armed man principal. The unit may have the strong thempt of a fraight brought him unto Cato, who by Oath of the priloner, was advertised how that the frength tempt of Galliers. of their Enemies Army was lodged about the person of the King, within the straight and valley to a Souldress. of the faid Mountain: and that the Souldiers they faw, were fix hundred ETOLIANS, all brave of the firencia Souldiers whom they had cholen and appointed to keep the top of the Rocks over King of King Anti-Antiochus Camp. When Caro had heard him , making imall account of the matter, as well for thus Camp. their small number, as also for the ill order they kept; he made the Trumpets sound straight, and his Souldiers to march in battell with great cries, himself being the foremost man of all his Troop, with a Sword drawn in his hand. But when the ÆTOLIANS saw them coming down the Rocks towards them, they began to fly for life unto their great Camp, which they Cate work the filled full of fear; trouble, and all diforder. Now Manieu at the fame prefent also, gave an affault fireight unto the Wallsand fortification the King had made overthwart the vallies and straights of the Thorse is Mountains: at which affault King Antiochus self had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake King Antiochus Mountains: at which affault King Antiochus teit mad a plow on the face with a fronce, that finance fome of his Teeth out of his mouth, fo that for very pain and anguith he felt, he turned his Horfe the free authors. back, and got him behind the prefs. And then there were none of his Army that made any more house, refiftance, or that could abide the fiercenels of the ROMANS. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying, because it was unpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high Rocks on the one fide of them, and with bogs and deep marithes on the other fide, which they must needs fall into if their Feet slipped, or were thrust forward by any ; yet they fell one upon another in the straights, and ran so in heaps together that they cast them-Telves away, for fear of the ROMANS Swords that Mehted upon them in every corner. And there Marcin Cato, that never made Ceremony or nicenels to praise himself openly, nor rec Cato's Victory koned it any shame to do it, did take a present occasion for it; as falleth out money all Victory and of King Antiokoned it any shame to do it, did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out upon all Victory and on Ki famous exploits: and so did set it out with all the oftentation and brave words he could give. Cate would For he wrote with his own hands; and fuch as faw him chase and lay upon his flying Enemies praise his own that day, were driven to fay, that Cato was not bound to the ROMANS, but the ROMANS doings. bound unto Cato. And then Manisu the Confull felf, being in a great heat with the fury of the Battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hot with chasing of the Enemy, and spake aloud with great joy before them all, that neither he, nor the People of ROME could recompence Cato, for his valiant service that day. After this Battell, the Confull Manius sent Cato to ROME, Manius sendto be the meffenger himself to report the News of the Victory. So he imbarked incontinently, eth Case to and had such a fair wind, that he passed over the Seas to BRINDES without any danger, and News of the went from thence unto TARENTUM in one day, and from TARENTUM in four days more to Victory. ROME. And so he came to ROME in five days after his landing in ITALY, and made such speed that himself was indeed the first messenger that brought News of the Victory. Whereupon he filled all ROME with joy and Sacrifices, and made the ROMANS fo proud, that ever after they thought themselves able men to conquer the world both by Sea and Land. And these be all the martiall deeds and Noble Acts Caro did. But for his doings in civil policy and State, he feemed to be of his opinion: that to accuse and pursue the wicked, he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good governour of the Commonwealth could employ himself unto : for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, he did always stir up some accuser, as he did Petilina against Scipio, But Scipio, by reason of other. his Nobility, the greatness of his House, and the magnanimity of his mind, passed not for any acculation they could lay against him : being out of all fear, they should be able to condemn him : and so let fall the accusation he had against him. Notwithstanding, he joyned with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his own Brother, and followed the matter to fore against him. that he caused him to be condemned in a great sum of Money to the Common-wealth: who being unable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the People revoked his condemnation. It is faid that Cato coming through the Market-place one day, and meeting with a young man by the way that had overthrown his adversary in fuit and put one of his late Fathers greatest Enemies to open shame and foil before the People, he embraced him with a good countenance, and faid unto him : Oh my Son, Sacrifices that good Children should offer to their Fathers soul, be not Lambs nor Kids, but the Tears and condemnations of their Enemies. But as he vexed other, fo he fcaped not free himfelf from danger, in administration of the Common-wealth. For if they could eatch the least vantage in the world of him, his Enemies straight accused him: so as they say he was accused almost fifty times, and at times accused. the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of fourscore years. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: That it was a harder thing to give up an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whom he lived. And yet was not this the last fute he followed: for four years after, when he was fourfcore and Ten years of age, he accused Servine Galba. And thus he lived as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, always in continuall fuit and action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the African about matters of

State and Common-wealth, he went on unto the time of the second, that was adopted by the first

For among other authorimay fay, the Room of all glory and Honour of their Common-wealth. For among other authorities, the Centor had power to examine mens lives and manners, and to punith every offendor. ries, me cemor man power to commit many, that they would not have men marry, beger Children, live ror the ROMANS were of that the same and another pleafure, but that they should stand privately by themselves, and make Feasts and Banquets at their pleasure, but that they should stand privately by the magniferate : and that it was not good to give evein rear to be reproved and conquired to by the same that it was not possed by give very body liberty, to do what they would, following his own luft and fancy. And they judging ry body noerry, to do what they work in such things, then in all other things that are that mens naturall dispositions do appear more in such things, then in all other things that are openly done at Noon days, and in the fight of the world, used to choose two Cenfors, that were How the Cen- two Surveyors of manners, to fee that every man behaved himself vertuously, and gave not hem-How the Centivo outreyors of manners, to break the Laws and customs of the Common-wealth. These Officers fors were cho-felves to pleasure, nor to break the Laws and customs of the Common-wealth. were called in their tongue, Cenfores, and always of cuttom, one of them was a PATRICIAN, were cancum men tongot, the two had power and authority to differede a Knight, bytaking away his Horie, and to put any off the Senate, whom they faw live diffolinely and difforderly. It way nis morie, and to put any on the schale whom they have been estimation of their goods; to was their Office also, to fels and rate every Citizen according to the estimation of their goods; to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of every man, and to keep books of them, befides many other prerogatives they had belonging to their Office. Therefore when Cate came to fue for this Office among other, the chiefest Senators were all bent against him, Some of them for very envy, and Nobility thinking, it shame and dishonour to the Nobility, to suffer men that were meanly born, and upflarts (the first of their Houle and Name, that ever came to bear Office in the State) to be called and preferred unto their highest Offices of State in all their Commonwealth. Other also that were ill livers, and knowing that they had offended the Laws of their Countrey, they feared his cruelty-too much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, having the Law in his own hands. So when they had confulied together about it, they did fet up feven Competitors against him, who flattered the People with many fair words and promifes, as though they had need of min, who hancicu me recopie wan many and record of things to pleafe them. But Cato contrariwife, shewing no countenance that the would use them gently, in the Office, but openly in the Pulpit for Oing no commentance man no rounded that had lived naughtily and wickedly, he cried out; that they must reform their City, and perswaded the People not to choose the gentlest, but the sharpest Physicians : and that himself was such a one as they needed , and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Fluctur another, in whose company he hoped (they two being chosen Centors) to do great good unto the Common-wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydra's Heads) all vanity and voluptuous pleafores, that were crept in amongst them a and that he saw well enough, how all the other futers fought the Office by dishonest means, searing such Officers as they knew would deal justly and uprightly. Then did the People of ROME shew themselves Nobly minded, and worthy of Noble governours. For they refused not the sowreness or severity of Cato, but rejected these Meal-mouthed men, that feemed ready to please the People in all things: and thereupon chose Marcin Cato Cenfor, and Valerim Flacem to be his fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had been present Officer, and no suter for the Office, being in themselves to give it to whom they thought good. The first thing he did after he was stalled in his Cenforship, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus his friend and fellow Cenfor with him, Prince of the Senate: and among Case put Lucius many other also whom he thrust out of the Senate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Senany other and whom he current out of the original he had been Confull feven years before, and was Brother also unto Titus Quintius Flaminius off the minius off the minius that overcame Philip King of MacEdon in Battell, which was greater glory to him, minius that overcame Philip King of MacEdon in Battell, which was greater glory to him, Senate.

The cause why then that he had been Consull. But the cause why he pur him off the Senate, was this: This The came why then that he had been commin. Due the came why he put him of the decision, was this 3 time of the better tenance and credit unto, as to any of his best familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a mate. time whilest Lueisu Quinism was Confull and Governour of a Province, that he made a Feaf, and this Boy being set at his Table, hard by him, as his manner was he began to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he was prettily merry and foothing him, told him he loved him fo dearly, that upon his departing from ROME, when the Sword-players were ready to fight for life and death with unrebated Swords, to shew the People pastime, he came his way, and left the fight of that he never faw, that was very desirous to have seen a man killed. Then this Luciua Quintius, to make him see the like, said: care not for the sight thou hast lost, Boy, for I will let thee see as much. And when he had spoken these words, he commanded a Prisoner condemned to die, to be setched and brought into his Hall before him, and the Hang-man with his Axe: which was forthwith done according to his commandment. Then asked he the Boy, if he would straight see the man killed: Yea sir said the Boy: and with that he bad the Hang-man strike off his head. Most writers report this matter thus: And Cieero to confirm it allo, wrote in his Book de Senellute, that the same was writtenin an Oration Cato made before the People of ROME. Now Lucius Quintim being thus shamefully put of the Senare by Cato, his Brother Time being offended withall, could not tell what to do, but belought the People that they would command Caro to declare the caule, why he brought fuch shame unto his House. Whereupon Caro openly before the People made recital of all this Feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming it was not fo: Cato would have him sworn before them all, that it was not true they had burdened him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who faid he would not fwear : whereupon the People judged straight that he deserved well that shame. So not long aster, certain Games being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond the ordinary place that was appointed for those that had been Confuls, he went to fit aloofe off amongst the multitude. The People took pity on him, and made such ado about him, as they forced him to rife, and to go fit among the other Senators that had been Confuls : falving the best they could, the shame and dishonour happened unto so Noble a House. Cato put out of the Mantius put off best they could, the maine and dimonois happened unto to two a route. Case ple out of the Senate for Senate also, one Manlius, who was in great towardlines to have been made Confull: the next kissing his year following, onely because he kissed his Wife too lovingly in the day time, and before his Wise before Daughter: and reproving him for it, he told him, his Wife never kiffed him, but when it thun- his Daughter. dered. So when he was disposed to be merry, he would say it was happy with him when Fupiter thundered. He took away Lucius Scipio's Horse from him, that had triumphed for the Victories Merry with thundered. He took away Lucius Sespon Frone from many that had triampled for the victoria married men he had won of the great King Antiochus: which wan him much ill will, because it appeared when subject when subject with subject with the subje to the world he did it of purpose, for themalice he did bear Scipio the African, that was dead. when Jupite But the thing that most grieved the People, of all other extremities he used, was his putting down Banquetting of all Feafts and vain expences. For a man to take it clean away, and to be openly feen in it, it and Feafts put was unpossible, because it was so common a thing, and every man was given so to it. Therefore down by Caso. Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise every Citizens goods, and rated their Apparell, their Cate to fetch it about indirectly, and prane every curzens goods, and factor that Apparent und Cate's counfel Coaches, their Litters, their Wives Chains, and Jewels, and all other moveables and Houshold-for reforming stuff, that had cost above a thousand five hundred Drachmes a piece, at ten times as much as they excess at were worth : to the end that fuch as had bestowed their money in those curious trifles, should pay so Rome. much more subsidie to the maintenance of the Common-wealth, as their goods were overvalued at. Moreover he ordained for every thousand Asses that those trifling things were praised at, the owners thereof should pay three thousand Asses to the common treasurie: to the end that they who were grieved with this Tax, and faw other pay less subsidie (that were as much worth as themselves, by living without fuch Toyes) might call home themselves again : and lay aside such foolish bravery and finels. Notwithstanding, Caro was envied every way. First, of them that were contented to pay the Tax imposed, rather then they would leave their vanity: and next, of them also. that would rather reform themselves, then pay the Tax. And some think that this Law was devised rather to take away their goods, then to let them to make any shew of them; and they have a fond opinion befides, that their riches are better feen in superfluous things, then in neces. Superfluous fary. Whereat they fay Ariffoile the Philosopher did wonder more, then at any other things reckonthing: how men could think them more rich and happy that had many curious and edfor riches. superfluous things, then those that had necessary and profitable things. And Scopus the Scopus goods THESSALIAN, when one of his familiar Friends asked him I Know not what trifling were all in thing, and to make him grant it the fooner, told him it was a thing he might well spare, and did him no did him no good : Marry faid he , all the goods I have, are in fuch Toyes as do me no good. So this good. covetous desire we have to be rich, cometh of no necessary desire in nature, but is bread in us by a false opinion from the Common fort. Now Cato caring least of all for the exclamations they made against him, grew to be more straight and severe. For he cut off the pipes and quils private men had made to convey Water into their Houses and Gardens, robbing the City of the Water that came from their common Conduit heads, and did pluck down also mens Porches that were made before their Doors into the Street, and brought down the prifes of common works in the City, and moreover raised the common Farms and customes of the City, as high as he could. all which things together made him greatly hated and envied of most men. Wherefore Titus Flaminius, and certain other being bent against him in open Senate, caused all Cato's covenants and bargains made with the Mafter Work-man, for repairing and mending of the common buildings and Holy places, to be made void, as things greatly prejudiciall to the Common-wealth. And they did also stir up the boldest and rashest of the Tribunes of the People against him because they should accuse him unto the People, and make request he might be condemned in the fum of two Talents. They did marvelloully hinder also the building of the Pallace he built at the charge of the Common-wealth, looking into the Market place under the Senate-house : which Pallace was finished notwithstanding, and called after his Name, Basilica Porcia: as who would Basilica Porcia fay, the Pallace Porcim the Cenfor built. Howbeit it feemed the People of Rome did greatly like built by Cato. and commend his government in the Cenforship: for they set up a Statue of him in the Temple set of the control of the goddess of Health, whereunder they wrote not his Victories nor triumph, but onely ingra- Temple of the ved this inscription word for word, to this effect by translation: For the honour of Marcus Cato goddess of the Censor: because he reformed the discipline of the Common-wealth of ROME (that was far Health. out of order, and given to licentious life) by his wile precepts, good manners, and Holy inflitu-changeth contions. Indeed, before this Image was fet up for him, he was wont to mock at them that delighted, dirions. and were defirous of fuch things: faying, they did not confider how they bragged in Founders, Painters, and Image-makers, but nothing of their Vertues: and that for himself, the People did always carry lively Images of him in their hearts, meaning the memory of his life and doings. When some wondered why divers mean men and unknown persons had Images set up of them, and there were none of him, he gave them this answer: I had rather men should ask why Cate had no Image fet up for him, then why he had any. In the end, he would have no honest No man man abide to be praifed, unless his praife turned to the benefit of the Common-wealth: and yet was should shide he one of them that would most praise himself. So that if any had done a fault, or stept awrie, but for the and that men had gone about to reprove them, he would fay they were not to be blamed, for Common. they were no Cato's that did offend. came (hort of his manner, he called them left handed Cato's. He would fay that in most dangerous times the Senate used to cast their eyes upon him, as passengers on the Sea do look upon the Mafter of the Ship in a ftorm : and that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put What Care was over matters of importance, untill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true as well by other as by himfelf. His Authority was great in matters of State, for his wifedom, his eloquence, and great experience. Besides this commendation, they praised him for a good Father to his Children, a good Husband to his Wife, and a good faver for his profit: for he was never careless of them, as things to be lightly passed on. And therefore me thinks I must needs tell you by the way some part of his well doing, to follow our declaration of him. First of all he married a Gentlewoman more Noble then rich, knowing that either of both would make her proud and frout enough : but yet he thought the Nobler born, would be the more ashamed of dishonesty, then the meaner born : and therefore they would be more obedient to their Husbands, in all honeft manner and reasonable things. Furthermore, he said : that he that bear his Wife or his Child, did commit as great a facriledge, as if he polluted or spoiled the holiest things of the world: and he thought it a greater praise for a man to be a good Husband then a good Senatour. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of old Secrates, then his patience, in using his Wife well, that was such a shrew, and his Children that were to hare-braind. After Caro's Wife had brought him a Son, he could not have so earnest business in hand, if it had not touched the Common-wealth, but he would let all alone to go home to his house, about the time his Wife did unswaddle the young Boy to wash and shift him : for she gave it suck with her own Breasts, and many times would let the slaves Children fuck of her also, because they might have a natural love towards her Son, having fucked one milk, and been brought up together. When his Son was come to age of difcretion, and that he was able to learn any thing, Cato himfelf did teach him, notwithftanding he had a slave in his House called Chilo (a very honest man, and a good Grammarian) who did also teach many other: but as he said himself, he did not like a slave should rebuke his Son, nor pull him by the ears, when peradventure he was not apt to take very fuddenly that was taught him: neither would he have his Son bound to a flave for fo great a matter as that, as to have his learning of him. Wherefore he himfelf raught him his Grammar, the Law, and to exercise his Body, not onely to throw a Dart, to play at the Sword, to vault, to ride a Horse, brought up his and to handle all forts of Weapons, but also to fight with fifts, to abide cold and heat, and to fwim over a fwift running River. He faid moreover, that he wrote goodly Histories in great letters with his own hand, because his Son might learn in his Fathers House the Vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell them. He faid also that he took as great heed of speaking any foul or uncomely words before his Son, as he would have done if he had been before the Vestall Nuns. He never was in the hot House with his Son : for it was a common use with the ROMANS at that time, that the Sons in Law did not bathe themselves with their Fathers in Law, but were ashamed to see one another naked. But afterwards they having learned of the GREEKS to wash themselves naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe even with their Wives. There lacked no towardliness, nor good disposition in Cato's Son, to frame himself Vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himself willing to follow whatsoever his Father had taught him. Howbeit he was fuch a weak puling, that he could not away with much hardness, and therefore his Father was contented not to bind him to that ftraight and painfull life, which himfelf had kept. Yet be became valiant in the Wars. For he fought marvellous froutly in the Battell , in which Perfeus King of Macedon was overthrown by Paulin Amyline: where his fword being siricken our of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweaty besides, he fell into a great sury, and prayed some of his friends to help him to recover it; So they all together ran upon the Enemies in that place where his fword fell out of his hand, and came in so fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them; and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much ado, being under fuch a heap of dead Bodies and other weapons as well ROMANS as MACEDONIANS, one lying on another. Paulus Emylius the General hearing of this act of his, did highly commend the young man. And at this day there is a Letter extant from Cato to his Son, in the which he praifeth this worthy Fact and toil of his, for the recovering of his sword again. Asterwards, this Cato the younger married Tertia, one of Paulus A mylisu Daughters, and Sifter unto Scippo the second, and so was matched in this Noble House, nor onely for his own Vertues fake, but for respect of his Fathers dignity and authority: whereby the great care, pains and fludy that Cato the Father took in bringing up his Son, in Vertue and Learning, was honourably rewarded in the happy beftowing of his Son. He ever had a great numing, was honourably rewarded in the happy beftowing of his Son. ber of young little flaves which he bought, when any would fell their Prisoners in the Wars. He cons was the constraint that young because they were apt yet to learn any thing he would train them unto, and that a man might break them like young Colts, or little Whelps. But none of them all, how many foever he had, did ever go to any mans house, but when himself or his Wife did fend them. If any man askt them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when Gato's opinion they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or else they must sleep: for he loved them well that were fleepy, holding opinion that flaves that loved fleep were more tractable and willing to do any thing a man would fet them to, then those that were waking.

And because he thought that nothing did more provoke slaves to mischief and naughtiness. then luft and defire of Women : he was contented his flaves might company with his bondwomen in his house, for a piece of money he appointed them to pay, but with straight commandement belides, that none of them should deal with any other woman abroad. At the first when he gave himself to follow the Wars, and was not greatly rich, he never was angry for any fault his Servants did about his person: saying that it was a foul thing for a Gentleman or Nobleman, to fall out with his Servants for his belly. Afterwards as he role to better flate, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a Dinner or Supper for any of his Friends and Familiars, they were no fooner his manner gone, but he would fcourge them with whips and leather thongs, that had not waited as they should and opinion have done at the boord, or had forgotten any thing he would have had done. He would ever craf- by Wealth. tily make one of them fall out with another : for he could not abide they should be friends , being ever jealous of that, If any of them had done a fault that deferved death, he would declare his offence before them all : and then if they condemned him to die, he would put him to death before them all : Howbeit in his latter time he grew greedy, and gave up his tillage, faying that it was more pleasant then profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his money furely, and bring Cato's good more pleafant then profitable. Incretore occause he would say out his mioney jurery, and oring a certain revenue to his Purfe, he befrowed it upon Ponds, and naturall hot bathes, and places fit for increasing for fullers craft; upon Medows and Paftures, upon copifes and young wood: and of all these his Wealth, be made a great and a more quiet revenue yearly, which he would say, Japiter himself could not diminish. Furthermore he was a great usurer, both by Land and by Sea : and theusury he took by Sea, was most extream of all other, for he used it in this fort. He would have them to whom he lent his money unto, that trafficked by Sea , to have many partners , to the number of fifty : and that Cato a great they should have so many Ships. Then he would venture among them for a part onely, where Herook erof Quinting his flave whom he had manumiffed, was made his factor, and used to fail and trait-tream usury by fick with the Merchants, to whom he had lent his money out to usury. And thus he did not ven-fea. ture all the money he lent, but a little piece onely for his part, and got marvellous riches by his ufurie. Moreover helent money to any of his flaves, that would therewith buy other young flaves. whom they taught and brought up to do service, at Cato's charge and cost: and then they fold them again at the years end, and some of them Cato kept for his own service, and gave his flaves as much for them as any other offered. Therefore to allure his Son in like manner to make profit of his money, he told him it was no wife mans part to diminish his Substance, but rather the part of a Widow. Yet this was a token of a most greedy covetous mind, that he durst affirm him to be divine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimony more then his Father left him. Furthermore when Cato was grown very old Carneades the ACADEMICK, Carneades and and Diogenes the STOICK, were fent from ATHENS as Ambaffadors to Rome, to fue for a re- Diegenes Phiand Diogenes the STOICK, were than from A they had imposed on the ATHENIANS upon a con-losophers sent lease of a fine of five hundred Talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS upon a con-losophers sent the suppose of the StoyOby. Ambuffiedough demnation passed against them for a contempt of appearance, by the sentence of the SICYONI-ANS, at the fuit of the OROP BIANS. Immediately when thefe two Philosophers were arrived in the to Rome. City of ROME, the young Gentlemen that were given to their Books, did visit and welcome them. and gave great reverence to them after they had heard them speak, and specially to Carneades: whole grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no less then the fame ran of him. and specially when he was to speak in so great an audience, and before such a State, as would not suppress his praise. Rome straight was full, as if a wind had blown this rumour into every mans ear: that there was a GRECIAN arrived, a famous Learned man, who with his eloquence would lead a man as he lift. There was no other talk a while through the whole (ity, he had so inflamed the young Gentlemens minds with love and defire to be learned: that all other pleasures and delights were let aside, and they disposed themselves to no other exercise, but to the study of Philosophie; as if some secret and divine inspiration from above had procured them to it. Whereof the Lords and Senators of ROME were glad; and rejoyced much to fee their youth fo well given to knowledge, and to the study of the Greek tongue, and to delight in the company of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcu Cato, even from the beginning that young men began to study the Greek tongue, and that it grew in estimation in Rome, did dislike of it : fearing left the youth of ROME that were defirous of learning and eloquence, would utterly give over the honour and glory of Armes. Furthermore, when he saw the estimation and same tongue. of these two personages did increase more and more, and in such fort that Caim Aquiliu, one of the chiefest of the Senate made sute to be their interpreter : he determined then to convey them out of the City by some honest mean and colour. So he openly found fault one day in the Senate, that the Ambaffadours were long there, and had not dispatch: confidering also they were cunning men, and could eafily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect. this onely might perswade them to determine some answer for them, and so to fend them home again to their Schools, to teach their Children of GREECE, and to let alone the Children of ROME, that they might learn to obey the Laws and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake thus to the Senate, not of any private ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought : but because he generally hated Philosophy , and of ambition despited the Muses and knowledge of the Greek tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had said, the ancient. Sperates was but a buffe man, and a stirrer up of sedition, and sought by all means possible to usurp Tyranny and rule in his Countrey, by perverting and changing the manners and customes of the fame, and alluring the subjects thereof to a disliking of their Laws and ancient customes; MARCUS (ATO.

And he laughed at Socrates School, that taught the art of Eloquence: faying his Schollers waxed old, and were still so long in learning, that they meant to use their Eloquence and plead Causesin another world before Minos, when they were dead. Therefore to pluck his Son from the fludy of the Greek tongue, he faid to him with a strained voice, and in a bigger found then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecy or inspiration) that so long as the ROMANS disposed themselves to study the Greek tongue, so long would they marre and bring all to nought, And yet time hath proved his vain words falle and untrue. For the City of Rome did never flourish fo much, nor the ROMAN Empire was ever so great, as at that time, when Learning and the Greek tongue most flourished. Howbeit Caro did not onely hate the Philosophers of GREECE, but did millike them also that professed Physick in Rome. For he had either heard or read the answer Hippocrates made, when the King of Persia sent for him, and offered him a great fum of Gold and Silver, if he would come and ferve him: who sware he would never serve the barbarous People that were naturall Enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed it was an Oath that all other Physitians sware ever after : wherefore he commanded his Son to slie from Cate: Physical Redding them allalike, and faid he had Written a little Book of Physick, with the which he did heal those of his House when they were fick, and did keep them in Health, when they were whole. He never forbade them to eat, but did always bring them up with Herbs, and certain light Meats, as Mallard, Ring-doves and Hares: for fuch meats, faid he, are good for the fick, and light digeftion, faving that they make them dream and Snort that eat them. He boafted also how with this manner of Physick, he did always keep himself in Health, and his family from fickness. Yet for all that I take it, he did not all that he bragged of : for he buried both his Wife and his Son alfo. But he himself was of a strong nature, and a lusty body, full of strength and Health, and lived long without fickness: fo that when he was a very old man and past marriage, he loved Women well and married a young Maiden for that cause onely. After his first Wise was dead, he married his Son unto Paulus Emplius Daughter, the Sufter of Scipio, the fecond African. Cato himself being a Widower, took pains with a pretty young Maid that waited in his House, and came by ftealth to his Chamber: howbeit his haunt could not long continue fecret in his House, and specially where there was a young Gentlewoman married, but needs must be spied. So one day when the young Maid went fomewhat boldly by the Chamber of young Cato, to go to his Father, the young man faid never a word at it: yet his Father perceived that he was fomewhat ashamed, and gave the Maid no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his Son and Daughter in Law were angry with the matter, faying nothing to them of it, nor fhewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the Market place (as his manner was with a train that followed him, amongft whom was one Salosion that had been his Clark, and waited upon him as the reft did. Cato calling him out aloud by his Name, asked him if he had not yet bestowed his Daughter. Sawith Salonius lovinus answered him, he had not yet befrowed her, nor would not before he made him privy to it, Then Cate told him again: I have found out a Husband for her, and a Son in law for thee, and of his Daughit will be no ill match for her unless the mislike the age of the Man; for indeed he is very old, but otherwise there is no fault in him. Salonius told him again, as for that matter he referred all to him, and his Daughter also, praying him even to make what match he thought good for her; for the was his humble Servant, and relyed wholly upon him, ftanding in need of his favour and furtherance. Then Cato began to discover, and told him plainly he would willingly marry her himself. Salan au therewith was abashed, because he thought Caro was too old to marry then, and himself was no fit man to match in any honourable Houfe, specially with a Consull, and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the end, when he faw Cate meant good earnest, he was very glad of the match, and fo with this talk they went on together to the Market place, and agreed then upon the marriage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the Son taking fome of his kin and friends with him, went unto his Father, to ask him if he had offended him in any thing, that for spite he should bring him a Step-mother into his House. Then his Father cried our, and faid : O my Son , I pray thee fay not to , I like well all thou doeft ; and I find no cause to complain of thee : but I do it , because I desire to have many Children , and to leave many fuch like Citizens as thou art, in the Common-wealth. Some lay that Pififtratus the Tyrant of ATHEMS, such a like answer made unto the Children of his first Wife, which were men grown Cato's answer when he married his fecond Wife Timonassa, of the Town of Argos; of whom he had (as it is reported) Jophon, and Thessaless. But to return again to Cato, he had a Son by his to his Son of his fecond fecond Wife, whom he named after her Name, Cato SALONIAN: and his Eldest Son died in .marriage. Care married his Office being Prator, of whom he often speaketh in divers of his Books commending him Salonius for a very honestman. And they say, he took the death of him very patiently, and like a grave Daughter, bewife man, not leaving therefore to do any fervice or business for the State, otherwise then he did being a very old man and had a fore. And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus, and Metellus turnamed Pius, did afterwards; who gave Son by her. up medling any more with matters of Government and State, after they were waxen old. For he thought it a charge and dury, whereumto every honest man whilest he lived was bound in all piety. paffed his age. Nor as Seipis African had done before him, who perceiving that the glory and fame of his deings did but purchase him the ill will of his Citizens, he changed the reft of his life into quietnets, and forfook the City and all dealings in Commonwealth , and went and dwelt in the Countrey.

But as there was one that told Diony is the Tyrant of Syracus A, as it is written, that he could not die more honourably, then to be buried in the Tyranny : even fo did Caro think, that he could not wax more honeftly old, then in ferving of the Common-wealth unto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was defirous a little to recreate and refresh himself, he passed his time away in making of Books, and looking upon his Husbandry in the Country. This is the cause why he wrote fo many kinds of Books, and Stories. But his tillage and Husbandry in the Countrey, he did tend and follow in his youth, for his profit. For he faid he had but two forts of revenue. Tillage and sparing: but in age whatsoever he did in the Countrey, it was all for pleasure, and to venue. learn something ever of nature. For he hath written a Book of the Countrey life; and of Tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make Tarts and Cakes, and how to keep fruits: he would needs thew fuch fingularity and skill in all things. When he was in his House in the Country, he fared a little better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and fuch as had Land lying about him, to come and Sup with him, and he would be merry with them: fo that his company was not onely pleasant and liking to old folks as himself, but also to the young- Cato's compaer fort. For he had feen much, and had experience in many things, and used much pleasant talk ny pleasant profitable for the hearers. He thought the boord one of the chiefest means to breed love amonest both to old and men, and at his own Table would always praife good men and vertuous Citizens, but would fuffer young. no talk of evil men, neither in their praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable act and good means fervice he did in the Commonwealth, was the overthrow of CARTHAGE: for indeed he that to procure wan it and razed it utterly, was Scipio the second, but it was chiefly through Cato's counsell and ad-love, and how vice, that the last war was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, and chanced upon should be used. this occasion. Cato was fent into Africk to understand the cause and controversie that was between the CARTHAGINIANS and Maffinifa, King of Numidia, which were at great Wars the last Wars together. And he was sent thither because King Massimisa had ever been a friend unto the Ro- against the MANS, and for that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates fince the last Carthaginians. Wars . in the which they were overthrown by Scipio the first, who took for a fine of them a great part of their Empire, and imposed upon them besides, a great yearly tribute. Now when he was come into that Country, he found not the City of CARTHAGE in milery, beggery, and out of heart, as the ROMANS supposed: but full of lusty youths, very rich and wealthy, and great store of Armour and munition in it for the Wars, fo that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE carried a high fail, and stooped not for a little. Wherefore he thought that it was more then time for the ROMANS to leave to understand the controversies betwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Maffiniffa, and rather to provide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that hath ever been an ancient Enemy to the ROMANS, and ever fought to be revenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now grown to that greatness and courage in so short time, as in manner it was incredible; fo as it was likely they would fall into as great enmity with the ROMANS. as ever they did before. Therefore fo foon as he returned to ROME, he plainly told the Senate, that the losses and harms the CARTHAGINIANS had received by the last Wars they had with them, had not so much diminished their Power and Strength, as the same had shewed their own folly and lack of wildom; for it was to be feared much, left their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakned them for the Wars. And that they made Wars now with the Numidi-ANS to exercise them onely, meaning afterwards to War with themselves: and that the peace they had made with them, was but an intermission and stay of Wars, onely expecting time and opportunity to break with them again. They fay moreover, that belides the perswasions he used. he brought with him of purpole Africk Figs in his long fleeves, which he shook out amongst them in the Senate: and when the Senators marvelled to fee fo goodly fair green Figs, he faid: the Countrey that beareth them, is not above three days fayling from ROME. But yet this is more strange which they report of him besides: that he never declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that , but this was ever the one end of his tale : Me thinketh still CARTHAGE would be utterly destroyed. Publisa Scipio Nasica, used ever in like manner the contrary speech: that he thought it meet CARTHAGE should stand. This Publim Scipio faw, in my opinion, that the Ro- scivio Natice. MANS through their pride and infolency were full of absurdities, and carried themselves very against Cato, high by reason of their happy success and Victories, and were so losty minded, that the Senate could for the destroyhardly rule them: and that by reason of their great authority, they imagined they might bring their mage. City to what height they would. Therefore he spake it that the fear of CARTHAGE might always continue as a Bridle, to rain in the infolency of the People of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no fufficient power to make Wars with the ROMANS, nor yet to overcome them: and even so were they not wholly to be despised, and not to be seared at all. Cato still replyed to the contrary, that therein consisted the greatest danger of all: that a City which was ever of great force and Power, and had been punished for former Wars and misery, would always have an eye of revenge to their Enemies, and be much like a Horfe that had broken his Halter, that being unbridled, would run upon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor found advice, fo to fuffer the CARTHAGINIANS to recover their strength, but rather they ought altogether to take away all outward danger, and the fear they flood in to loofe their conquest: and specially, when they left means within the City self to fall still again to their former rebellion. And this is the cause why they suppose Cato was the occasion of the third and last War died, and before his death he prophessed, as man would say, who it should be that should end those Wars. And it was Scipio the second, who being a young man at that time, had charge one-the ROMANS had against the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the War was begun, Cato Cato's dente.

ly as a Collonel over a thousand Footmen: but in all Battels, and wherefoever there was Wars, he thewed himfelf ever valiant and wife. Infomuch as News being brought thereof continually unto ROME, and Cato hearing them, spake (as they say) these two Verses of Homer: This onely man right wife reputed is to be,

All other feem but fradows, fet by fuch wife men as be. Cato's poster! Which Prophecy Scipio soon after confirmed true by his doings. Moreover, the issue Cato lest behind him, was a Son he had by his second Wife: who was called (as we faid before) Caso SA-LONIAN, by reason of his Mother, and a litle Boy of his Eldest Son that died before him. This Cato SALONIAN died being Prator, but he left a Son behind him that came to be Confull, and was Grandfather unto Cate the Philosopher, one of the most vertuous men of his time.

The end of MARCUS CATO'S Life the Cenfor.

THE COMPARISON OF ARISTIDES with MARCUS CATO.

Aristides and Cato's accels to the Common-wealth.

that we have fet down in writing, these notable and worthy things of memory: if we will confer the Life of the one, with the Life of the other, perhaps the difference between the one and the other will not easily be discerned, seeing there be so many similitudes and refemblances one of another. But if we come to compare them in every particularity, as we would do Poets Works, or Pictures drawn in Tables: first, in this we shall find them much alike, that having had nothing else to prefer and commend them , but their onely Vertue and Wildom, they have been both Governours in their Common-wealth, and have thereby atchieved to great honour and estimation. But me thinks when Arifides came to deal in matters of State, the Commonwealth and Seigniority of ATHENS being then of no great Power, it was easie for him to advance himself, because the other Governours and Captains of his time, and that were Competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great Authority, For the Tax of the richest Persons then at ATHENS in revenue, was but at five Hundred bushels of Corn and upwards, and therefore were such called Pentacosiomedimni, The second Tax was but at three hundred bushels, and they were called Knights. The third and last was at two hundred bushels, and they called them Zeugitz. Where Marcus Cato coming out of a little Village from a rude Countrey life, went at the first dash (as it were) to plunge himfelf into a bottomless Sea of Government in the Common-wealth of Rome: which was not ruled then by such Governours and Captains, as Curius Fabricius, and Ofilius were in old time. For the People of ROME did no more bestow their Offices upon such mean labouring men, as came but lately from the Plough and the Mattock : but they would look now upon the Nobility of their Houses, and upon their riches that gave them most Money, or sued earnestly to them for the Office. And by reason of their great Power and Authority, they would be waited upon and fued unto, by those that sought to bear the honourable Offices of the State and Commonwealth. And it was no like match nor comparison, to have Themissocles an adversary and Competitor, being neither of Noble House, nor greatly rich (for they say that all the goods his Father left him, were not worth above four or five hundred Talents, when he began to deal in State) in respect as to contend for the chiefest place of Honour and Authority against Seifio African, Serviliu Galba, or Quintim Flaminim, having no other maintenance, nor help to trust unto, but a tongue speaking boldly with reason and all uprightness. Moreover, Aristides at the Battles of MARATHON, and of PLATEES, was but one of the Ten Captains of the ATHENIANS: where Cato was chosen one of the two Consuls among many other Noble and great (ompetitors, and one of the two Cenfors, before feven other that made fuit for it, which were all men of great reputation in the City, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Arifides was never the chiefer in any Victory. For at the Battell of MARATHON, Militades was the Generall: and at the Battell of SALAMINA, Themistocles: and at the journey of PLATÆES, King Pansania as Herodosm faith, who writeth that he had a marvellous Victory there. And there were that strived with Arifides for the second place, as Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Conegirus, every one of the which did notable valiant service at those Battels. Now Cato was Generall himself, and chief of all his Army in worthiness and Council, during the War he made in Spain while martial afhe was Confull. Atterwards also in the journey where King Antiochus was overthrown in the fairs excelled Countrey of THERMOPYLES, Cato being but a Colonell of a thousand Footmen, and serving un- Arifiidet. der another that was Confull, wan the Honor of the Victory, when he did fuddenly fet upon Antiochus behind, whereas he looked onely to defend himself besore. And that Victory without all doubt was one of the chiefest Acts that ever Cato did, who drave ASIA out of GREECE, and opened the way unto Lucius Scipio to pass afterwards into Asia. So then for the Wars, neither the one nor the other of them was ever overcome in Battell: but in peace and civill Government, Ariftides was supplanted by Themistocles , who by practise got him to be banished Athens for a time. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greatest and Noblest men of ROME that were in Arististe and his time, fworn Enemies unto him, and having always contended with them even to his last Cato's difhour, he ever kept himself on found ground, like a front Champion, and never took fall nor pleasures in foil. For he having accused many before the People, and many also accusing him, himself was wealth.

never once condensed, but always his tongue was the Buckler and defence of his Life and innocency. Which was to him so necessary a weapon, and with it he could help himself in so great The power of matters, that (in my opinion) it was the onely cause why he never received dishonour, nor was un- innotency and justly condemned: rather then for any thing elfe he was beholden to Fortune, or to any other Eloquence. that did protect him. And truly, Eloquence is a fingular gift, as Anipater witneffeth, in that he wrote of Arifotle the Philosopher after his death : faying that amongst many other fingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could periwade what he lifted. Now there is a rule confessed of all the world, that no man can attain any greater vertue or knowledge, then to know how to govern a multitude of men, or a City : a part whereof is Occono. Occonomia mia, commonly called House-rule, considering that a City is no other, then an assembly of many housholds and Houses together; and then is the City commonly strong and of Power, when as the Townsmen and Citizens are wise and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that banished Gold and Silver from LACEDEMON, and coyned them Money of Iron, that would be marred with fire and Vinegar when it was hot, did not forbid his Citizens to be good Husbands: but like a good Lawmaker, exceeding all other that ever went before him, he did not onely cut off all superfluous expences that commonly wait upon riches , but did also provide that his People should lack nothing necessary to live withall, fearing more to see a begger and needy person dwelling in his Cithe priviledges of the fame, then a proud man by reason of his riches. So methinks, Cato was as good a Father to his houshold, as he was a good Governour to the Common-wealth: for he did honeftly increase his goods, and did teach other also to do the same, by saving, and knowledge of good Husbandry, whereof in his Book he wrote fundry good rules and Precepts: Arifides contrariwife, made juffice odious and slanderous by his poverty, and as a thing that made men poor, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans felf that used justice. And yet Hestodus the Poet, that commendeth justice so much , doth wish us withall to be good Husbands, reproving floth and idleness, as the root and original of all injustice. And therefore me thinks Homer spake wisely when he faid :

In times past, neither did I labour, cark nor care For business, for family, for food, nor yet for fare: But rather did delight , with ships the Seas to fail.

To draw a bow, to fling a Dart in Wars, and to prevail. As giving us to understand, that justice and Husbandry are two relatives, and necessarily linked one to the other: and that a man who hath no care of his own things nor House, doth live unjustly, and taketh from other men. For juffice is not like Oyl, which Physitians say is very wholsom The Naure for mans Body, if it be applied outwardly : and in contrary manner very ill, if a man drink it : net- of Oyl. ther ought a just man to profit strangers, and in the end not to care for himself nor his. Therefore me thinks this governing Vertue of Aristides had a fault in this respect, if it be true that most No man wife, Authors write of him : that he had no care nor forecast with him to leave so much , as to marry that is not his Daughters withall, nor wherewith to bury himfelf. Where those of the Houle of Cato, continued Prators and Confuls of ROME even unto the fourth descent. For his Sons Sons, and yet lower, his Sons Sons Sons came to the greatest Offices of dignity in ROME. And Ariffides, who was in his time the chiefest man of GREECE, lest his posterity, in so great poverty, that some were compelled to become Soothfayers (that Interpret Dreams , and tell mens Fortune) to get their li- Whether ving', and other to ask Almes: and left no mean to any of them to do any great thing worthy poverry be an him. But to contrary this, it might be faid, poverty of it felf is neither ill nor dishonest; evilthing.

but where it groweth by idleness, careless life, vanity and folly, it is to be reproved. For when our where it growers by interest, caretes inc., raint, and liveth well, that taketh pains, is very diligent, luft, it lighteth upon any man that is honeft, and liveth well, that taketh pains, is very diligent, luft, National of the state of the st for it is unpoffible that man should do ony great things, that had such a base mind as to think always upon trifles : and that he should releeve the Poor greatly, that lacketh himself relief in many things. And fure, riches are not so necessary for an honest man that will deal truely in the (ommy tunings. And ture, transparent, as is sufficiency; which being a contentation in it self, and desirous of no fuperfluous thing, it never withdraweth a man from following his business in the Commonwealth, that enjoyeth the fame. For God is he alone, who simply and absolutely hath no need of any thing at all : wherefore the chiefest Vertue that can be in man, that cometh nearest unto God, ought to be efteemed that, which maketh man to have need of leaft things. For like as a lufty Body, and well complexioned, hath no need of superfluous fare and curious Apparell : even fo a clean Life, and found House, is kept with a little charge: and fo should the goods also be proportioned, according to use and necessity. For he that gathereth much, and spendeth little, hath portioned, according to the analysection, 1701 in that gameters much, and penaled much, then he is a Fool to travell to get never enough. But admit he hath no defire to feed much, then he is a Fool to travell to get never enough. Dut auum ne nam no define it, and dare not for niggardlines fpend part of that he more then he needeth; and if he do defire it, and dare not for niggardlines fpend part of that he laboureth for, then he is miferable. Now would I ask Cato with a good will, if riches be made but to use them, why do you boast then you have gotten much together, when a little doth suffice you? And if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you find, to drink of the fame Tap Work-men and Labourers do, not to care for Purple died Gowns, nor for Houses with plastered Walls: it followeth then, that neither Aristides, nor Epaminondae, nor nor for rioutes with plantered vyains; it is nonoweth their, that healther arristrats, for Epaminonal, flor Manine Curim, nor Caim, Fabritim, have forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not the nor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man not for getting of that which they would not the nor occupy. For it was to no purpose for a man hat effected Roots and Parfenips to be one of the best dishes in the world, and that did feeth that they have the control of the third that they have the control of the control of the third that they have the control of them himself in his chimney, whilest his Wife did bake his Bread, to talk fo much of an asse, and to take pains to write, by what Art and industry a man might quickly inrich himself. For it is true, that fufficiency and to be contented with a little, is a good and commendable thing; but it is because it taketh from us all defire of unnecessary things, and maketh us not to pass for them. And therefore we find that Ariffides faid, when rich Callian case was pleaded, that such as were poor against their wills, might well be ashamed of their poverty; but such as were willingly poor, had good cause and might justly rejoyce at it. For it were a mad part to think that Arifides poverty proceeded of a base mind and slothfulness, since he might quickly have made himself rich without any dishonesty at all , by taking onely the spoil of some one of the Barbarous People whom he had overcome, or any one of their Tents. But enough for this matter. Furthernore, touching the Victories and Battels Cato had won, they did in manner little help to increase the Empire of ROME: for it was already to great, as it could almost be no greater. But Arifides Whether Ari-Victories are the greatest Conquest and Noblest Acts that the GRECIANS ever did in any Wars: as the journey of MARATHON, the Battell of SALAMINA, and the Battell of PLATÆES. And Cato's did most benefit yetthere is no reason to compare King Anischus with King Xerxes, nor the Walls of the City of SPAIN which Cato overthrew and razed, unto fo many thousands of Barbarous People, which were then overthrown and put to the Sword by the GRECIANS, as well by Land as by Sea, In all which fervices, Arifidate was the chiefest before all other, as touching his valiantnels in fighting: notwithstanding he gave other the glory of it, that defired it more then himself, as he did easily leave the Gold and Silver unto those that had more need of it then himself. Wherein he shewed himself of a Nobler mind then all they did. Furthermore, for my part, I will not reprove Cate's manner, to commend and extoll himself so highly above all other, fince he himself saith in an Oration he made, that to praise himself is as much folly, as also to dispraise himself; but this I think, his Vertue's more perfect that desireth other should not praise him, then he that commonly doth use to praise himfelf. For not to be ambitious, is a great shew of humanity, and necessary for him that will live amongst men of Government: and even so, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great envy unto him that is infected withall. Of the which Arifiides was clear, and Caro far gone in it. For Arifides did help Themifocles his chiefest Enemy, in all his Noblest Acts, and did ferve him (sar man would say) like a private Soulder that guarded his Person, when Themifocles was General, being the onely Instrument and mean of his glory : which was indeed the onely cause that the City of ATHENS was faved, and restored again to her former good State. Cato contrariwise, croffing S. ipio in all his enterprifes, thought to hinder his voyage and journey dinto CARTHAGE, in the which he overcame Hannibal, who untill that time was ever invincible : and fo in the end, continuing him ftill in jealousie with the State and ever accusing of him, he never left him till he had driven him out of the City, and caused his Brother Lacina Scipio to be shamefully condemned for theft, and ill behaviour in his charge. Furthermore, for temperancy and modefly which Cato reproved Cato did ever commend so highly, Ariffides truly kept them most fincerely. But Cato's second Wife, who married a Maid (that was neither fit for his dignity and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a letcherous man, and not without manifest cause. For he cannot be excused with honesty, that being a man past marriage, brought his Son that was married, and his fair Daughter in Law, a Step-mother into his House, and but a Clerks Daughter, whose Father did write for Money, for any man that would hire him. Take it Caro married her to fatisfie his luft, or else for spite to be revenged of his Son, because his Son could not abide his young filth he had before : either of these turneth still to his shame, as well the Effect as also the Cause. Again, the excuse he made to his Son why he married, was a lye. For if he had grounded his defire indeed to have gotten other children, as he faid, that might be as honeft men as his eldeft. Son: then furely he had done well after the death of his first Wife, if he had fought him another Wife foon after, that had been of an honest House; and not to have Iyen with a young Harlotry filth, till his Son had foied him : and then when he saw it was known, to go and marry her, and to make alliance with them , not because it was honourable for him to do it , but easieft to be obtained

THE LIFE OF THILOPOEMEN.

Ann. Mund. 3757.

Am. Christ.

N the City of MANTINEA, there was a Citizen in old time called Caffander, one that was as nobly born and of as great authority in Government there, as any man of his time what foever. Notwithstanding, fortune frowned on him in the end, infomuch as he was driven out of his Countrey, and went to lie in the City of MEGALIPOLIS, onely for the love he bare unto Crausis, Philopamens Father, a rare man, and nobly given in all things, Crausis, Philoand one that loved him also very well. Now so long as Cranfie lived, Caf- pamens Father. funder was fo well used at his hands, that he could lack nothing : and when Cassander, Phihe was departed this world, Caffander, to require the love Cranfis bare him Inpaners in his lifetime, took his Son into his charge, being an Orphan, and taught Schoolmaßer. him, as Homer faid Achilles was brought up by the old Phanix. So this child Philopamen grew to Ecdemus and have noble conditions, and increased always from good to better. Afterwards, when he came to grow Demoblanes to mans flate, Ecdemon and Demophanes , both MEGALIPOLITANS, took him into their govern- read Philoloment. They were two Philosophers that had been hearers of Arcefilam, in the School of Academia, phy to Philoand afterwards employed all the Philosophy they had learned, upon their governing of the Common-pamen. wealth, and dealing in matters of State, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they delivered their City from the tyranny of Ariftodemus, who kept it in subjection, by corrupting those that killed him. And they did help Aratus also to drive the Tyrant Nicceles out of S. cr-ONE. At the request of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with civill diffention and factions among them, they went unto CYRENA, where they did reform the state of the Common-wealth, and flablished good Laws for them. But for themselves , they reckoned the education and bringing up of Philoparmen; the chiefest act that ever they did : judging that shey had procured an univerfall good unto all GREECE, to bring up a man of fo noble a nature, in the Rules and Precepts of Philosophy. And to say truly, GREECE did love him passingly well, as the last valiant man the Philopomes brought forth in her age, after so many great and samous ancient Captains; and did always in-the left samous create his Power and Authority; as his Glory did also rife. Whereupon there was a Roman, man of Greece.

who to praise him the more, called him the last of the GRECIANS: meaning that after him, GREECE wno to praise that the more, cause that the period of a Grectan. And now concernever brought forth any worthy period, deferring the name of a Grectan. And now concernever brought forth any worthy ning his person, he had no ill face, as many suppose he had; for his whole Image is yet to be seen in the City of DELPHOS, excellently well done, as if he were alive. And for that they report of his Hoffels in the City of Megara, who took him for a Serving-man: that was by reason of his courtefie, not flanding upon his reputation, and because he went plainly besides. For she understanding that the Generall of the ACHAIANS came to Inne there all night, the bestured her, and was very buffe preparing for his supper, her husband peradventure being from home at that time; and in the mean feafon came Philopamen into the Inne, with a poor cloak on his back. The simple woman feeing him no better apparelled, took him for one of his men that came before to provide his lodging, and so prayed him to lend her his hand in the Kitchin. He straight cast off his cloak, and began to fall to hew wood. So as Philopermen was bufie about it, in cometh her Husband, and finding him riving of wood: Ha ha ha, faid he, my Lord Philopamen, why what meaneth this? Truly nothing elle, faid he in his DORICAN Tongue, but that I am punished, because I am neither fair boy , nor goodly man. It is true that Titu Quintim Flaminim faid one day unto him , feeming to mock him for his personage: O Philopamen, thou hast fair hands and good legs, but thou hast no belly; for he was fine in the waste, and small bodied. Notwithstanding, I take it this jesting tended rather to the proportion of his Army, then of his body, because he had both good Horsmen and Footmen, but he was often without Money to pay them. These Jests, Scholars have taken up in Schools, of Philopamen. But now to descend to his nature and conditions: it feemed that the ambition and defire he had to win honour in his doings, was not without fome heat and wilfulnefs, For, because he would altogether follow Epaminondas steps, he shewed his hardiness to enterprize any thing, his wildom to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no money could corrupt him : but in Civill matters and controverfies, be could hardly otherwhiles keep himfelf within the bounds of modesty, patience, and courtesse, but would often burst out into choler, and wilfulness, Wherefore it feemeth, that he was a better Captain for Wars, then a wife Governoor for peace. And indeed, even from his youth he ever lored Souldiers and Armes, and delighted marvelloully in all Martiall Exercites: as in handling of his Weapon well rading of Horses gallantly, and in vaulting nimbly. And because he seemed to have a naturall gift in wrestling, certain of his friends, and fuch as were carefull of him, did wish him to give himself most unto that exercise. Then he asked War and Mar-till Exercises, them, if their life that made such profession, would be no hindrance to their Martiall Exercises. Andelighted in fiver was made him again. That the indisposition of the person, and manner of life that Wrestlers used and fuch as followed like Exercifes, was altogether contrary to the life and difcipline of a Souldier, and specially touching life and limb. For wrettlers studied altogether to keep themselves in good plight, by much ileeping, eating, and drinking; by labouring, and taking their eafe at certain hours, not miling a jor of their Exercises; and besides, were in hazard to lose the force and strength of their body, if they did furfeit never so little, or passed their ordinary course and rule of diet : where Souldiers contrariwise are used to all change and diversity of life; and specially be taught from their youth, to away with all hardnefs and fearcity, and to watch in the night without fleep. Philopanen hearing this, did not onely for fake those Exercises, and scorned them, but afterwards being Generall of an Army, he fought by all infamous means he could to put down all wreftling and fuch kind of exercife, which made mens bodies unmeet to take pains, and to become Souldiers to fight in defence of their Countrey, that otherwise would have been very able and handsome for the same. When he first lest his Book and Schoolmasters, and began to wear Armour in Invasions the MANTI-NEANS used to make upon the LACEDEMONIANS, to get some spoil on a sudden, or to destroy a part of their Countrey: Philopames then would ever be the foremost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leisure, he used much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his body with toyl and travell, or else he would be digging of his Grounds. For he had a fair Manor, not passing twenty surlongs out of the City, whither he would walk commonly after dinner Philippemens not not paining twenty intrings on the was bed time, he would lie upon fome ill-favoured mar-pains how they or supper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lie upon some ill-favoured marwere employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneft labourer he had, and in the morning by break of the day, he went out either were employed trefs, as the meaneful head of the meaneful head of the day head and sometimes returned again to the City, and followed matters of the Common-wealth, with his friends and other Officers of the same. Whatsoever he could spare and get in the Wars, he spens it in buying of goodly Horses, in making of fair Armours, or paying his poor Countreymens ranfom , that were taken Prifoners in the Wars : but for his goods and Revenue, he fought onely to increase them by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the justest and best way of getting of Goods. For he did not trifle therein, but imployed his whole care and study upon it, as one that thought it fit for every Nobleman and Gentleman fo to travell, , govern, and increase his own, that thudy and care he should have no occasion to covet or usurp another mans. He took no pleasure to hear all kind of matters, nor to read all fort of Books of Philosophy: but those onely that would reach himmost to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to read Homers Works, faving those places onely that stirred up mens hearts most unto valiantness: But of all other Stories, he specially delighted to read Evangelus Books, which treated of the discipline of Wars, how to set Battels, and declared the acts and jefts of Alexander the Great, faying, that men should ever bring words unto deeds, the Discipline unless they would take them for vain stories, and things spoken, but not to profit by. For in ef Wars.

his Books of the seas of War, and how Battels should be ordered, he was not onely contented the season of t to fee them drawn and fet out in Charts and Maps, but would also put them in execution, in the plan ces themselves as they were set out. And therefore when the Army marched in order of Battell in the Field, he would confider and fludy with himself, the sudden events and reproaches of the Enemies, that might light upon them, when they coming down to the Valley, or going out of a Plain, were to pals a River or a Ditch, or through some straight; also when he should spread out his Army, or else gather it narrow: and this he did not onely forecast by himself, but would also argue the fame with the Captains that were about him. For Philopamen doubtless was one of the odd men of the World, that most esteemed the Discipline of War (and sometime peradventure more then he needed) as the most large Field and most fruitfull Ground, that valiantness could be exercised in : so that he despised and contemned all that were no Souldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty years of age, Cleamenes King of LACEDEMON, came one night upon the fudden, and gave an affault to the City of MEGALIPOLIS, fo luftily that he drave back the Watch and got into the Market-place, and wan it. Philopamen hearing of it, ran immediately to the refcue. Nevertheless, though he fought very valiantly, and did like a noble Souldier, yet he could not repulse Philosomen fathe Enemies, nor drive them out of the City: but by this means he got the Citizens leifure, and some ved the Megalitime to get them out of the Town to fave themselves, staying those that followed them: and made politant from Cleamenes still wait upon him, fo that in the end he had much ado to save himself, being the last man Cleamenes and very fore hurt, and his Horse also slain under him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being advertised Philosomen that the MEGALIPOLITANS were gotten into the City of MESSINA, he fent unto them to let very fore hurt. them understand, that he was ready to deliver them their City, Lands, and Goods again. But Philopamen feeing his Countreymen very glad of these news, and that every man prepared to return again In hafte, he flaid them with these periwasions, shewing them that Cleomenes device was not to deliver them their City, but rather to take them together with their City: foreseeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keep naked walls and empty houses, and that himself in the end thould be compelled to go his way. This perswasion staid the MEGALIPOLITANS, but withall it gave Cleomines occasion to burn and pluck down a great part of the City, and carried away a great tum of Money and a great Spoil. Afterwards when King Antigonus was come to aid the ACHA- King Antigo-IANS against Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of the Mountains of Sellasia, and aid the Advaikept all the paffages, and ways unto them out of all those quarters : King Antigonus set his Army ans against kept all the pattages, and ways unto them out of an interest of the pattages, and the pattages who had the pattages. King of Later-Philopamen was at that time amongst the Horsemen with his Citizens, who had the ILLYRIAN'S King of damon, on the fide of them, being a great number of Footmen and excellent good Souldiers, which did shut in the tail of all the Army. So they were commanded to ftand ftill, and to keep their place, untill fuch time as they did shew them a red Coat of Armes on the top of a Pike, from the other Wing of the Battell, where the King himself stood in person. Notwithstanding this straight commandment. the Captains of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to fee if they could force the LACEDEMONIANS that kept on the top of the Mountains. The ACHAIANS contrariwife, kept their place and order, as they were commanded. Endidas, Cleomenes Brother, perceiving how their I nemies Footmen were fevered from their Horsemen, suddenly sent the lightest armed Souldi- Philopamens ers and luftieft fellows he had in his Bands, to give a Charge upon the ILLYRIANS behind, to prove fact in the Batif they could make them turn their faces on them, because they had no Horsemen for their guard, tell against King Chome-This was done, and these light armed men did marveshously trouble and disorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopamen perceiving that, and confidering how these light armed men would be easily broken and driven back, fince occasion felf enforced them to it: he went to tell the Kings Captains of it, that led his men of Arms. But when he faw he could not make them understand it, and that they made no reckoning of his realons, but took him of no skill, because he had not yet attained any credit or estimation to be judged a man that could invent or execute any stratagem of War the went thither himfelf, and took his Citizens with him a and at his first coming, he so troubled these light armed men, that he made them flie, and flew a number of them. Moreover, to encourage the better King Anigonus men, and to make them give a lufty Charge upon the Enemies, whilest they were thus troubled and out of order, he left his Horse and marched on foot up hill and down hill, in rough and ftony ways, full of fprings and quavemires, being heavily armed at all pieces as a man at Arms, and fighting in this fort very painfully and uneafily, he had both his thighs past through with a Dart, having a leather thong on the middest of it. And though the blow did Philopamen not take much hold of the flesh, yet was it a strong blow; for it pierced both thighs through and hurrin fight. through, that the iron was feen on the other fide. Then was he fo cumbred with this blow as if he had been shackled with irons on his feet, and knew not what to do : for the leather fastned in the middest of the Dart, did grieve him marvellously, when they thought to have pulled the Dart out of the place where it entred in, so as never a man about him durst set his hands to it. Philipamen on the other fide, feeing the Fight terrible on either fide, and would foon be ended: it spited him to the guts, he would so fain have been among them. So at the length he made fuch strugling, putting back one thigh, and setting forward another, that he knapped the staff of the Dart afunder, and made them pull out the two truncheons, the one on this fide, and the other on the other fide. Then when he saw he was at liberty again, he took his Sword in his hand, and ran through the midst of them that fought, unto the foremost ranks, to meet with the Enemy: fo that he gave his men a new courage, and did fet them on fire with envie, to follow his valiantness. After the Battell was won, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN Captains,
